

Mr. J. C. Holsman.

THE ARGONAUT

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 4, 1879.

VOL. IV. NO. 1. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

A SINGED CAT.

By E. H. Clough.

(CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.)

VIII.—THE KITTEN CLAWS ITS MOTHER.

Silas Inch did not creep home until dawn was struggling with the thick, black clouds that hung in heavy masses along the Eastern horizon. He approached the house stealthily, and raising a rear window crawled through without disturbing any of the family. The rain had abated, but the wind still whistled under the eaves and rattled the swinging doors of the out-houses, drowning, to some extent, the noise of his falling footsteps as he stumbled to his bed. He had spent the night in debauchery, and the long walk through the drenching rain had only partially sobered him. He flung himself half-dressed upon the bed, and slept until nearly noon the next day. When he entered the kitchen after a hasty toilet, and gulped down a dipperful of cold well water to cool his parched and burning throat, his mother and sister did not require the evidence of bloodshot eyes, husky voice, or trembling hands, to convince them that Silas had been on an unusually "glorious tear."

"Out agin las' night, Silas," remarked his mother, in a sarcastic tone preparatory to beginning the usual lecture. "I wasn't," retorted Silas; "I came in at ten o'clock."

"Silas, you're lyin' an' ye know it. I was up this mornin' at two o'clock, an' you wasn't in bed then."

"I don't b'lieve you was up at two o'clock. What call'd you have to be up at that time I'd like to know?"

"I don't want none of yer slack, Silas, an' what's more I aint to have any, nuther. 'Taint any of yer bizness what I was up fur—you wasn't in bed at two o'clock, an' thet's enough."

"Well, s'pose I wasn't, what then?"

The tone of the young man was defiant.

"I don't want none of yer sass, I say, young man. It's enough for ye to go howlin' around with yer drunken, thievin', fightin' gang o' scapegraces, not to come home at daylight, and arter ye've slep' off yer whisky sass yer po' ol' mother ez ye do."

The mother bent forward a moment, and a tear stole into the corner of her great blue eye.

"I guess I'm old enough to take care of myself, and I don't ask no woman to tell me what I'm to do."

"No, you unbidable wretch, you go round carousin' all night, disgracin' yerself, an' yer ol' father an' mother, an' then come home an' sass 'em. Who brought ye into the world, ye ongrateful whelp? Who brought ye up, and cared fur ye, an' tended ye; who sat up with ye when ye was sick, an' tried to train ye up as ye should go? Who's done all this for ye? But what do you keer? Ye'd drink yerself blin' drunk over yer ol' mother's coffin, an' go spreein' off 'ith yer scalloway frien's while my po'r wutless corpse was a layin' in it's shroud. What'd you keer? She's dead an' gone, an' thet's the last of her. She's brought me to manhood, an' nussed me, an' wep' tears o' blood over my goin's on, but what o' thet—the ol' Jizabel's gone, an' she'll never correct me agin' for my doin's. Let the coyotes tear her from her grave fur all I keer."

"Go on, old woman, go on. I like to hear you rail. It stirs me up and makes me feel as if you was dead already. You're better'n a gin cocktail to liven up a feller."

"Oh, you young wretch, you low dog, you reprobate, you gutter-wallowin', whisky swillin', card playin', street runner! Do ye durr talk back to me this way?" And the furious woman shook her fist in the face of her wretched offspring.

"It's born in the blood, I reckon."

"Born in the blood! Does your mother drink, you scoundrel, you villain! Does your father drink, you whelp?"

"No, but he does worse—he swindles everybody that he can get his clutches on. And look here, old woman, where's Tom—where's my brother? How'd ye train him up, as ye call it?"

This was a cruel thrust, and the homely old woman buried her face in her hands and sobbed as if her heart would break. The heartless young man followed up his triumph with fiendish success.

The mother sprang to her feet in an ecstasy of rage.

"Oh, you devil! Devil! No the imps in hell wouldn't act az you're actin' now. Go! Leave my sight. Go; yer no child o' mine, Silas Inch. I disown ye. Leave the house! I curse ye! I hope thet the great God'll send down his wrath upon ye, an' thet, afore ye die, ye'll suffer all the torments o' the damned. Silas Inch, a mother curses ye while she is yer mother, an' a woman curses ye in the name o' mothers arter she's disowned ye ez her son. I curse ye, I curse ye, I curse ye!"

The mother's face, for an instant, became still more livid. She threw up her hands, the blood rushed from her heart to her head, and she fell forward, apparently lifeless, just as the daughter entered the room. With a shriek, that echoed throughout the house and brought Hiram, weak as he was, to his feet, she threw herself upon the prostrate form of the heart-broken woman and swooned away, murmuring:

"You've killed her, you've killed her!"

Silas was stupefied. Even his unnatural hardihood was shocked, and he would have given the best years of his life to have recalled the last few moments.

"Silas Inch, ef I hed the strength I'd brain ye whar ye stand. Leave the house, an' don't ye never darken my door agin. Ef ye do, I'll kill ye ez I would a dog."

Silas cast one look at his father, standing unsteadily on the threshold, and then slunk out of the house like a whipped cur.

At the gate he stopped a moment and looked at the now silent house of his parents. A hot flush of shame swept across his face, and then remorse took possession of him; not the remorse that bows the head and causes the scalding tears to flow, but the remorse that implants within the breast a wild, reckless thirst for unnatural excitement; the remorse that has, in thousands of instances, sent men from the scene of their first wickedness to the perpetration of horrible crimes. The heart of Silas Inch was black with hatred for himself, hatred for his family, hatred for the world. He hurried down the road, feeling that he was now an outcast and caring but little what became of himself.

IX.—DIED WITH HIS BOOTS ON.

The interview between Ikes and Inch did not last long, but it was fraught with important matter.

"You can shoot if you want to, Inch," repeated Ikes, after throwing off his cloak, "but I think you'd better not."

"Why?" asked Inch.

"Because I've got something to tell you, that will show you I'm not so case-hardened after all, if I did wing you in that scrimmage the other day."

Inch did not reply, and Ikes continued:

"Now, what I want to say is this: Bill Staghart is at the bottom of the whole business. You got the best of him in a little transaction, I believe, and he feels mighty sore over it. It galled him to think that you'd beat him, but that ain't what put murder into his head; he thinks that you hold papers (blackmailing papers, he calls them) of his that might send him to San Quentin or damage him some way, so he hired me to pick a quarrel with you and get you out of the way. That was easy enough, specially after that game of poker you and I played. He paid me for that last attempt of mine, and to-night he agreed to pay me fifteen hundred dollars in advance if I'd finish the job. But I'm sick of the whole business. I've got into the scrape with you and that's enough. Now, what I propose is this: You're getting well—you'll be all right in a few days; and if you'll only let up on me—don't prosecute me—I'll keep you posted on Staghart's game. He'll hire a Mexican or somebody else when I back out, and he'll give you trouble, if he don't cook your goose."

"The fifteen hundred," said Inch, blinking at his visitor.

"Oh, let that go. I don't want it. I've earned enough money of that kind."

"Go for it," answered Inch.

"Go for it!" exclaimed Ikes. "What do you mean?"

"Pays in advance, don't he?"

"Yes; but I've got to sign a paper agreeing to kill you. I've got to give Staghart a guarantee that I'll croak you."

"Sign it."

"What do you mean?" Ikes was beginning to get a glimpse of Inch's design, but it did not tend to reassure him.

"Sign the agreement," said Inch.

"And shoot at you?" queried Ikes.

"No; divide with me." And the shrewd old trader blinked more rapidly than ever; he even snuffed, which was an indication that he was particularly well pleased with himself.

"All right, Inch," answered Ikes, after a moment's thought. "I'll do it on one condition—Staghart can't blow the business, because that would fix his own case. If you'll promise to give that little affair of ours the go by, I'll make Staghart pungle and divide the swag with you."

The details of this little affair were soon settled, and Ikes left the house with a lighter heart than when he entered it.

The next day he arose late, and after breakfast loitered about town until he saw Staghart enter an office up the street.

Not wishing to delay his business any longer than possible, he hurried toward the office, and while passing the street leading into the "Tigre" came face to face with Silas Inch.

"You're just the d—d hound I wanted to see," said Inch, glaring at Ikes with a malignant scowl.

"Let me pass, Inch, I haven't got time to talk to you; besides, our quarrel's over."

"Not by a d—d sight," hissed Inch; "it's only just begun."

"Let me pass; you've been drinking."

"You're mighty right, I have, and I'm ready for you, Bob Ikes. You're the cause of all my trouble, and I'm going square accounts right now, you hear me, you lying, thieving coward."

"Don't talk to me that way, Inch; I won't stand it," replied Ikes, moving off.

"I don't care whether you stand it or not; I'll make you stand it."

"I tell you, Inch, I don't want to quarrel with you; our quarrel's over. Ask your father."

"My father!" sneered Inch. "You're a nice duck to talk about my father after shooting him in the back, you d—d sneaking coward."

"Let up, Inch, or you'll be sorry for it," answered Ikes, warningly.

"Who'll make me sorry? Not you. I can whip any coward that will shoot any man in the back, and I'm going to do it right here."

With these words Inch stepped toward Ikes and dealt him a stinging blow in the face. Ikes staggered, and the blood streamed from his nostrils. Before he could recover Inch had struck him again, and to prevent falling into the gutter that ran along the edge of the sidewalk Ikes was compelled to jump into the street. He stood for a moment dazed by the blows he had received, but as soon as he realized the situation and observed Inch advancing upon him anger took the place of bewilderment, and he rushed upon his assailant with all the ferocity of a wounded animal. Both men met in mid career and separated after the shock, to reel back and fall to the earth. They were upon their feet again instantly, and Inch, blinded as to consequences by a passion that was uncontrollable, drew a pistol and fired at Ikes as he came toward him. The rapid movements of Ikes and the unsteadiness of Inch's aim saved the life of the former, and before Silas could repeat the shot Ikes had drawn his own weapon and cocked it as he rushed at his adversary.

The scene that ensued was one of wildest excitement. The crowd of men who had gathered at the beginning of the fight fled in every direction, shouting and gesticulating. Some dashed into the neighboring stores, others dodged around the corner—all eager to escape the flying bullets. When the sharp report of Ikes' pistol echoed through the street not a soul was in sight. In another instant the street was full of men, all rushing as rapidly toward the combatants as they had previously left them.

Inch's left arm hung useless at his side, and he ran down the street attempting to cock his revolver with his teeth. He was closely followed by Ikes, who fired two more shots in rapid succession. Opposite the postoffice, Inch, having succeeded in raising the hammer of his pistol, turned and emptied another chamber of his revolver at Ikes, who staggered and placed his hand convulsively on his thigh. Another bullet whizzed past his ear. The crowd yelled "stop them," and Ikes recovered himself sufficiently to raise his weapon and fire again. Inch fell forward upon his face as Ikes went down in the middle of the street, and the crowd of seeming maniacs closed in, and each man, yelling some order or exclamation at the top of his voice, jostled and elbowed in the attempt to get a nearer view of the fighters.

"Stand back! give him air!" shouted somebody near the prostrate form of Ikes.

"Is he dead?" screamed half a dozen in the throng around Inch.

"How can I tell when you all keep piling on top of me," said the man who was bending over Silas.

"Stand back! stand back!" frantically shouted every man in the crowd, at the same time pushing closer to the blood-stained centre.

By dint of strenuous efforts three or four men succeeded in raising the two young men and carrying them to the nearest drug store.

Ikes groaned at every step, but Inch lay motionless and silent in the hands of his bearers. Both men were stripped and their wounds examined.

"He's all right," said the physician who has assigned himself to the care of Ikes; "they're only flesh wounds."

The examination of Inch's injuries was of longer duration, and when it was concluded the matter-of-fact doctor arose to his feet with the grim remark:

"Pull off his boots, boys; he'll never need them again."

X.—THE CAT IN THE TOILS.

Two days after the killing of Silas Inch a mother and sister stood weeping over the long, dark box that contained his remains. In an hour that still form would be consigned to the grave, and these stricken women were gazing for the last time upon the face of the misguided, ill-trained boy—gazing through the scalding drops that well up from the hearts of women only. The mother may have been illiterate, rough in her manners, violent in disposition, and given to high words and unconsidered retorts, but she was a mother nevertheless, and to see her child stretched before her a corpse stirred the mother's nature to its profoundest depths. Forgotten were the hot sarcasms of the past; forgotten all the wickedness and willfulness of years—all forgotten in the sorrow of that, to her, supreme moment of grief for the loss of her child.

The sister, uncouth and homely, did not, perhaps, weep for the same reasons that moved the mother. Horror at the violent death and sudden fate of her brother mingled with the sorrow she felt for his loss. And there they stood—the only beings on the face of the earth who really loved this young reprobate—clasping each other's hands over his dead body; mingling their tears, which flowed for a heartless wretch who, one hour before his righteous fate overtook him, heaped insult after insult upon the truest friend he could ever hope to possess, leaving her, for the last time, senseless upon the hard, cold floor—not harder nor colder than the heart of the ingrate who had caused the flood-gates of passion to open and almost break the heart that now forgot his undutiful conduct.

The father stood at the door, moody and motionless, brooding over the fate of his son. He leaned upon a cane, and his pale face showed more expression now than it had since his arrival at Mammoth City. His sorrow partook of that angry, resentful character which fills the breast of those who regret their own shortcomings after those sins of omission have produced natural and inevitable results. He had never taught his children anything that tended to direct them in the paths of morality, because he knew but little of such paths himself. But he knew enough to realize that he was largely to blame for his child's wild career and ultimate death. He understood that the mother had, in her incoherent, illogical way, endeavored to wean the boy from evil associations and debauchery; and he now felt impressed with the idea that if he had coupled even the authority of a father, without a father's kindly counsel, with the mother's rude appeals and tirades, the result would have been different. But no; money had been his sole object, and to obtain it he had allowed his wayward boy to run his course—to sow the wind and reap the whirlwind. And then his thoughts reverted to another son, whose misdeeds in years gone by had disgraced even this shrewd confidence operator's scared and suspected reputation. These two boys seemed to have inherited all the innate wickedness of the father without a single trace of his prudence or forethought.

As Inch stood in the doorway two men came into the yard, and he heard one of them remark:

"There's the old cat now; he seems to have recovered the life he lost the other day."

"Yesh, dots der ol' gat, but he don't vash regover his lifes—he loosh von und haf eight more ter lif on," answered the other, chuckling at his feeble attempt to be witty.

Inch recognized the men as Levi Marks and a deputy Sheriff.

"Hullo, Inch!" shouted the deputy when he had approached near enough to be heard; "so the boy's passed in his checks, eh? Well, he didn't mount to much anyhow, an' I don't s'pose you'll pine away very much over it."

Inch made no reply to this brutal remark, and allowed the two men to pass into the house. The deputy did not appear to care whether he was regarded as an intruder or not, but stalked noisily to the door of the room where the body of Silas lay. Opening the door he walked in, followed by Marks and Hiram; and, unceremoniously seating himself in a chair, retaining his hat upon his head, waited with palpable impatience for the mother and sister to leave the coffin. As they did not manifest any disposition to cease their silent tribute to the dead the deputy at last arose, and, stepping toward them, said in a mocking tone:

"Sorry ladies to cut this weepin' business short, but it can't be helped."

The mother and daughter started when they heard the harsh tones of the officer, and unclasping their hands, stood facing the man who had thus rudely intruded upon the sanctity of their grief.

"It can't be helped, I say, madam," repeated the officer, addressing Mrs. Inch; "bizness is bizness, you know."

"I thought you was comin' this afternoon," she replied.

"Well, ye see ye was mistaken. Mistakes will happen, you know, in the best regulated families. But I guess you don't know me," and the deputy laughed as he thought of his real identity, and its effect upon Mrs. Inch, when revealed amused him immensely.

"Ain't you the undertaker?" inquired the bewildered woman.

"Well, that's purty good." The heartlessly facetious officer laughed again. "An undertaker! Do I look like an undertaker? Why, do you know, Mrs. Inch, if I thought I looked like an undertaker I'd go off an' drown myself, derned if I wouldn't. No, I ain't the undertaker; 'bout the only corpses I'm likely to handle is them that's been cut down by the Sheriff."

This horribly suggestive speech caused the face of Mrs. Inch to blanch and her eyes to flash. Her voice became slightly shriller as she demanded:

"Then who are you?"

"I'm Sam Swingle, a deputy-sheriff of this yer county, at your service." The deputy grinned until his yellow fangs were revealed between his thin lips.

"An' what do you want here?" asked Mrs. Inch, her rising tones indicating that she was rapidly becoming aware that she was being grossly insulted over the dead body of her child.

"Ah, now you're striking the right trail. What do I want here? Marksey, what do we want here, eh? It's the best joke of the season, an' nobody but an old pound-of-flesh Shylock like you would ever think of it."

"Isb dot so?" replied Marks, creeping closer to the deputy, and chuckling in an uneasy manner as he glanced from the already stormy face of Mrs. Inch to the now sternly immobile countenance of Hiram.

"Oh, you needn't pretend ignorance, old boy," said the deputy, drawing some papers from his pocket; "you're a slippery cuss, an' this little game of yours beats any thing I ever dropped on. You hound a man for interest and principal before he dies, an' then foller him into the grave. I b'lieve you'd swim the river Jordan to collect a note in the New Jerusalem from the angel who'd owed you down here, if you could. An' if he didn't pay ye, you'd tear up the golden sidewalk in front of his 'mansion in the sky' to liquidate the debt; you'd replevin the harp he was playin' on before the Great Jehovah, I b'lieve, ef you couldn't lug off the gold pavin' stones."

"Moshes and Aberam! I don't vash loosh der brinshibal off I could helup mineself, und I gits der interesht off it vash boshible."

Marks seemed to be so earnest that the deputy had to laugh again, which so incensed Mrs. Inch that she bent forward and, doubling her fists, hissed the question from between her teeth:

"What're ye snickering' at? What do ye want here? Aint it enough that ye come rollickin' into this yer house ez ef it was a barroom, but ye must laugh an' chuckle over the col' corpse o' my po' dead boy. What do ye want? 'Tend to yer bizness an' leave."

"If you'll give me half a chance, I'll tell you," replied the officer, somewhat surprised at the outburst he had just listened to.

"You see this precious son of yours, before he got his wind cut, borrowed a lot of money of Marks here—three hundred and seventy-two dollars altogether—here's the bill, and here's the notes. Marks, of course, didn't want to lose his money, so he commenced suit for it an' yesterday he got a judgment. I've come here to levy on his estate, an' as I don't see no property to speak of except this coffin and contents, I guess you'll have to postpone this fun'ral till we can realize on the box. What do you think it'll fetch, Marksey?"

The deputy was beginning to chuckle again, when he felt himself grasped by the beard and flung headlong across the room. The outraged mother felt the strength of a maniac, and with flaming eyes and burning cheeks resented the terrible insult. Having dashed her insult to the floor she stood over him like a maddened pythoness, swaying to and fro in the frenzy of her rage, and shrieking:

"Take the coffin o' my child for a debt! Oh, ye low-born dog! Where's yer own mother? No, sir, afore ye lay a han' on thet coffin I'll brain ye. I'll choke ye to death, woman ez I am, and throw yer mean carcass to the coyotes. That po'r dead boy was my child, I nussed him w'en he was a baby, I tried to larn him the right, but the devils o' hell, an' the devils of arth—like you, you cowardly pup, an' you, you sneak-in' Jew—dragged him down to perdition. But he was mine, an' sich ez you shall never lay a finger on his corpse. Hiram, kick these dogs out o' the house, fur if ye don't, I will."

The deputy sheriff had arisen by this time, and having recovered from the shock of his fall, became more insulting than ever.

"Madam, you have resisted an officer of the law in the discharge of his duty, and you shall answer for it. This writ of execution must be served, and will be served if I have to do it with a posse comitatus."

"Bring on your posse come at us!" shrieked Mrs. Inch, "an' see how many'll go back. I'll bar every door in this yer house, an' ez long ez powder and bullets lasts, or I've got strength enough to pull a trigger, I'll kill, I'll kill, I'll kill! D'ye hear me? I'll shoot ye down like carrion crows, as ye are."

"We'll see about that, old woman. But the present bizness must be settled first. Take that cadaver out o' there, or leave it in just as you like. I take possession of this coffin in the name of the law, and by virtue of a writ of execution duly issued from the proper court. Stand aside, old woman, I must have the box. If you don't—" Swingle raised his hand to grasp Mrs. Inch by the arm, and that was the last he knew. A stunning blow from some blunt instrument stretched him insensible upon the floor. At the same instant Hiram, weak as he was, struck the Jew, who stood gazing open-mouthed at the apparition of a tall, stalwart young man who had been standing in the doorway during Swingle's last speech until that brave officer of the law attempted to lay his hand upon the woman, when he leaped into the room, and felled him with the butt of a heavy navy revolver. Not content with the blow he had dealt he picked the senseless Swingle up in his arms and deliberately threw him out of the window. In the meantime Hiram had hustled the frightened Jew out of the house. The four who stood around the coffin after these violent measures had been concluded, looked at each other for a moment. Hiram strangely enough spoke first.

"Where'd you come from?"

"Out o' the hills over yonder, at the risk o' my liberty," the man replied. "An' it's lucky I dropped in ez I did, seein' ez how mother couldn't git away 'ith thet big galoot out there, an' I reckon you was too weak to take a hand, ol' man, or you wouldn't a stood an' see her abused."

"Oh, Thomas, you've come back to us at a dismal time," murmured Mrs. Inch, looking at Silas' calm, white face.

"I know it, mother, but it ain't the fust time I've bin hyar. I was hyar unbeknowns to you the night afore he was killed, an' I was hyar las' night arter ye'd gone ter bed, 'ceptin' the ol' man sittin' thar watchin', an' I'm hyar now ter say that I can't 'tend the fun'ral; dad knows why."

"Yes, I know why," muttered Hiram, casting a side glance at his son.

"But ef ye'll only say the word, I'll ride into Mammoth City an' finish the cuss thet laid Silas out, derned ef I don't," continued Thomas Inch.

"No you won't, Tom. No use makin' bad matters worse," answered Hiram.

"Jest ez you say, ol' man; I'm a rough rider an' a man o' the hills, but dern my immortal hide ef I wouldn't like to make a dash at the head o' ten good men thet I know of into thet town over yan, an' scatter the blame cusses a bit till I'd fixed the man thet did the bizness fur Silas."

"No, no, Tom, don't do thet," cried the mother; "they'd lynch us ez soon ez you'd cleared out. Besides, it wouldn't do no good."

"All right, mother, all right, let 'em rip; I'll get a chance at 'em some other time. But I mus' be gettin' back to the hills. Good-bye, dad, good-bye, sis, good-bye, mam—good-bye," and this wild, reckless criminal folded his mother and sister in his arms and kissed them.

"Don't take on 'bout Silas, mother; we've all got to go sooner or later, so what's the difference?" he continued, as he jumped through the window from which he had thrown Swingle.

"Good-bye," he shouted, as he mounted a black horse which he had left standing around the corner of the house. "I see ol' catch-em-lively hez dusted with the Jerusalem chap. You know whar to send fur me, ol' man, w'en you want me. Good-bye."

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

"Dead—Not Delivered."

Meeting the letter-carriers as they leave the post-office with their bulky sacks crowded with letters, one must wonder how they can distribute each and every one to its proper owner; but bless you! they go further than that. After they have been on a route for awhile they can tell much more about a family than they ever do. They know if one of the children is away, if visitors are coming, if any of the relatives are dead, and many other things hardly known to the nearest neighbor. An envelope is nothing but an envelope to you. You may criticize the handwriting and the orthography, but beyond that you care nothing. To the letter-carrier it is a book. He knows when father and mother are coming—where a truant boy is—whether the family are respected or not—and Sarah's beau can not blind the carrier by getting some one else so direct the envelope.

One day one of the oldest carriers had a letter left over after he had gone his usual round. It was directed to a woman living in a little old house standing back from the street, and as he studied the address he said to himself that he had never had an epistle for her before in all the six or seven years he had been on that route. The postmark was that of an office in the East, and the carrier mused to himself:

"This is from her son, and she will be crying before I am out of sight."

He delivered the letter to a white-faced woman of sixty, who seemed to be living there all alone, and she looked surprised as he placed it in her hand.

"A letter for me—I haven't a relative on earth!" she gasped.

But he left it with her.

In about three weeks a second letter came, and the old lady opened the door before the carrier was inside the gate. She did not say that it was from her son, but the carrier knew for all that, and he hoped that the truant boy had settled down for life, and was writing cheerful words and sending aid to his poor old mother. Regularly every three weeks, for half a year or more, there came a fat-looking letter for the old woman in the little cabin; and if the letter was a day late her white face at the window reproached the carrier more than words could have done. If it was a day earlier she was at the door to meet him, knowing his step from all others which passed that way.

The other day, when the carrier found the buff envelope, directed in the old, familiar, cramped hand, he said to himself:

"I will hurry around to-day, for the last time I saw her she seemed ill and weak, and a letter will give her new strength."

He opened the gate with a bang to give her warning, but no white face appeared at the window, and no hand raised the door-latch. The carrier knocked on the door for the first time, and after a moment a woman opened and said:

"She is dead, and she hasn't a relative in the city."

Among the letters to go to the Dead-Letter Office next week will be one across whose face is written whole chapters in three words: "Dead—Not Delivered." An old woman has passed away—a cottage is deserted—a letter returned. The world will see nothing in these simple facts, but yet in them is contained all the sentiment God has ever given to any human heart.

A poor Irishman at Rochester owed a rich man some money, and was unable to pay. The rich man obtained a judgment and an execution, but there was nothing on which the sheriff could levy. The Irishman had two large pigs, but the law allows a man two, and the sheriff could not take them. The rich man then bought two little pigs, had them presented to the Irishman, and thereupon took his two large ones.

With reference to his native land an American traveling is much like the son of a woman of the world—afraid that people may not speak about his mother, and again afraid that they may say something about her.

THANKSGIVING PIES.

A pumpkin rolled, and pushed, and lifted,
And pared, and sliced, and stewed, and sifted,
And made into a dozen pies,
Above the average in size.
Such baking, boiling, tasting, heating!
Such preparation made for eating!
Such unpremeditated joys
For little hungry girls and boys!
Oh, what a racket, what a bule!
Oh, what a strain on nerve and muscle!

"Oh, what a grandma! Pity sakes!
She's made about a hundred cakes!"
Said Winkle: "Did you ever, ever?"
And all agreed they "Never, never"
Did know a grandma to compare
With their dear grandma anywhere.
And so at last the day auspicious
Arrived, and everything delicious
Was browned and finished to a turn
With no suspicion of a burn.
And small and tall and pretty cousins,
All Grandma's darlings by the dozens,
With aunts and uncles by the score,
Came rapping, tapping at the door.
And soon the pantry was inspected,
Nor crack nor cranny left neglected,
By certain of that cousinhood,
And each thing was pronounced "good."
Those pies of pumpkin, twelve in number,
As I've remarked, and brown as umber,
All in a long, enticing row
Did sit and wait their fate to know.
Said Winkle Small to Pinkie Smaller:

"If only you's a little taller,
You'd see some awful splendid pies.
They come just even with my eyes!"
Then Pinkie, on her tip-toes standing,
With eager mouth and eyes expanding,
A most enticing view obtained;
But still a longing deep remained
For more minute investigation—
And you'll perceive that elevation
Was most essential in that case—
And so each found herself a place
Upon two butter-jars inverted.

"Oh, Winkle! I feel awful hurted
With hungriness. Perhaps I'll die,
Then you and everybody'll cry."
Was ever such appeal resisted?
Sweet sympathy was soon enlisted;
And Winkle hastened to suggest
That they might give the pies a test.
And, to avert that fatal crisis,
She fain had cut the pie in slices;

But, as her knife was poised in air,
She said to Pinkie: "I declare!
It 'curs to me, upon reflection,
That 'twould improve this pie's complexion
If I should skin it—there—just so!
I'm sure Grandma would never know."

Then Pinkie, tasting, said: "'Tis 'licious!"
And thereupon grew quite officious;
And both together, in a trice,
Those pies did skin; and then, like mice,
They nibbled all the edges crooked;
And then with critics' eyes they looked,
And with each other did agree
Those edges should more even be.

So, when the middle parts they'd finished,
And smoothed, and patted, and—diminished,
Each edge they evened with a will,
Till crust became invisible.

They nibbled round, they nibbled under,
They nibbled till it was a wonder
That anyone could classify
What did remain—and call it pie.
Oh! surely, 'twas not their intention
To do this harm; but I must mention
That not a solitary slice
Was left intact by these small mice.

And when those uncles, aunts, and cousins,
All Grandma's darlings by the dozens,
To eat those pies did congregate,
They found, alas! that 'twas too late.
Can pen depict the consternation
Of Grandmamma and her relation!
Was e'er so sad catastrophe?
Thanksgiving without pumpkin pie!

LIZZIE BURT, in Independent.

Soog.

There's a garden by a river,
Where the grasses bend and quiver
On the river's reedy edges,
Roses crimson all the hedges,
And a leafy lane runs down
Through the meadows to a town,
In a winding way.
But where lies that garden blowing,
Where that river, stilly flowing,
And the lane through meadows going,
I shall never say.

II.

Something fairer than a rose
In that unknown garden grows;
Something sweeter than the rhyme
Sung by birds in lilac-time;
Fairer than a dream of youth,
Thought all lost to care and ruth,
Something with a heart like May;
Rose and lily all in one;
Golden hair caught from the sun;
Eyes with laughter overrun
What? I'll never say.

III.

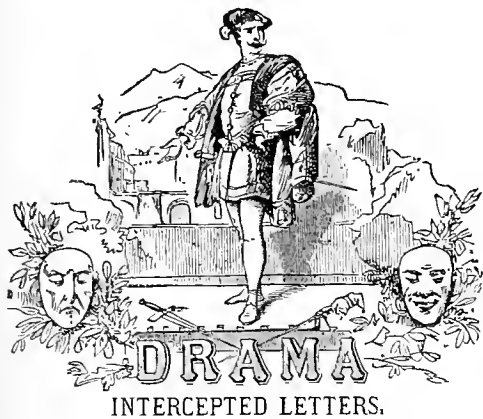

Dreamy face and rosebud mouth,
Breath like spring winds from the South,
Eyes disclosing more than lies
Hedged beneath the bended skies
Of a day in May.
So, when days grow longer, sweeter,
Grow the rare June hours complete;
And the winter's time for snowing
Leaves the June winds chance for blowing,
I will seek this garden, growing,
Where, I'll never say.

L. FRANK TOOKER, in Scribner.

Death comes to a good man to relieve him; it comes to a bad one to relieve society.

There is only one thing less endurable than a fool's folly—to wit, a wise man's.

Many foxes grow gray, but few grow

SAN FRANCISCO, January 3, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—The holiday hubbaloos, as good housewives say, is over at last. The litter of the Christmas trees has been carried out, so have been the lobster claws, the turkey bones, and the broken glasses from the New Year's table. How they found time to do it in the midst of all the eating and drinking, and gift-giving, I can not say, but all the world and his wife have been to see The Mighty Dollar. When I say all the world I suppose I need not mention his wife. Cela va sans dire, for it is the women who fill the theatres. How the men do hate to go—after they are married. I hardly blame them, poor fellows, when I glance around a well-filled dress-circle; they look as abject as the clawless tigers or the toothless lions in a menagerie. The husbands look like little black heaps dropped here and there among the dolmans and mandarin furs, while the wives loom up in a monumental sort of way, which is half bonnet and half a realization of the solemnity of the occasion. Great tall fellows, who look well enough anywhere else, sink into insignificant little chaps when sitting beside their wives in the theatre. I verily believe that in their silent communings with themselves they have found this out, and that it has something to do with their reluctance to go. I recommend that each Benedick carry with him a little contrivance like a señora's prayer cushion, that he may sit at least as high as his wife's bonnet, and appear like himself, and not like a small boy wedged in between two well-dressed dames to save appearances. What a struggle there must have been in many a household to fill the old California as it has been filled during the past week. But la! Madge, you know how these struggles always result, and with a set of toilets like Mrs. Florence's to be looked at, iron bars would not have kept them in doors. Mr. Florence is a wonderfully fine character actor, but there is a tremendous "draw" in his wife's millinery bills. Florence is said to have commenced his season with gloomy prognostications. I do not know of a better start off than an actor can have than a prognostication of bad. It always works like a charm, in this fair city at least, and Mr. Florence's prognostication on this occasion must have been a first-class article. For my own part I have never been able to find out what The Mighty Dollar was all about; and, out of mere politeness, I should not like to disconcert the author by asking him his plot, if I knew him. I only know that "Bardwell Slote" is a very funny old fellow, in a pair of very baggy breeches—I wish there was a prettier word for those articles—which the poetical critics used to call inspirational. Also, that he has become a degree more grotesque than he was—one of the marks of his prosperity, I presume, for whereas his red silk pocket handkerchief used to dangle but a quarter of a yard, it now floats in the breeze its entire length, and so on with like minutiae, straws which show which way the wind blows, but wind-blown straws nevertheless. As for "Mrs. General Gilflory," we met her, dear Madge, in Virginia City, at White Sulphur Springs, and many times in town, not so irreproachably dressed, not quite so Frenchy, but as vulgar, as rich, and as good-natured. I never like Mrs. Florence just at first. She has such a sharp, hard, inflectionless, didactic way of speaking that I imagine she is not paying any attention to what she is saying. But I discover that where there is a sharp point to her speeches she appreciates it, stale as they are. A little twinkle of meaning comes into the corner of her eye; she never permits herself to break into an open smile—except behind her fan. I do not know whether immovable gravity is a fixed principle with her, or whether a broad smile would lead to a panic in enamel. At all events, she flies colors such as the cunning hand of Nature never laid on. Her coiffure is a marvel, her every toilet a study. In a way she is a faultless dresser. She has reached the acme of artificiality. She is the absolute perfection of modern style. She is never a picture or poem in costume as was the naughty Aimée in Le Petit Faust, or Adelaide Neilson in Imogene. But, given a boxful of blonde locks, and a set of well-boned stays, satie pompadour slippers, jewels, silks and velvets, and satins, and lots of fringe—she makes a point of handsome fringe—and Mrs. Florence can probably step out of the pile with better comparative results than any woman living, for her figure is like that of the Juno in fullness, and like that of the Venus (in stays) in perfection. When a woman has a figure like that she can carry any amount of clothes well, even though she should have a face like a door-knocker. I shall not attempt a description of these toilets. I remember of one of them that it includes a handsome set of mosaic jewelry, and that the costume matched it. That is indefinite, yet exact, for who can describe a mosaic? Of the others I only know there were whole forests of vines in embroidery, chenille perhaps, crows' feet; that the fit was something exquisite; that there were waving masses of beautiful fringe; that there were slippers, and those such we see only now and then; there were gloves which, like Tennyson's brook, seemed "to go on and on for ever;" there were such myriads of buttons; that they were further embellished with monograms or initials in gold, which seemed to identify them more strictly with their owner; that there were jewels of many kinds, ending with a remarkably beautiful diamond; in fact, that a tremendous slice of The Mighty Dollar is shut up in Mrs. Florence's boxes every night. Now, you will think, Madge, that I saw nothing in The Mighty Dollar but Mrs. Florence. Oh, yes, I did. Such an awful lot of dry goods would take away any woman's breath, but the "Hon. Bardwell Slote" is such a funny old fellow, and Jack laughed till I thought he would have a spasm. So did I, but I think I was even more amused at Miss Prescott, who had evidently had a bad "Zicka" nightmare. She was cast for "Blanche Mossthorne," a rustic beauty who had captured the heart of a reporter. I suppose it is simply a dramatic license to assume that reporters have hearts. I am not familiar with the general course of action of rustic beauties, but this one, in the excess of her emotion, gritted her teeth, hissed her words through them, shot fire from her eyes, shed tears of anger, swayed and bended like the supple willow, and gave us the Jeffreys-Lewis stride to fill up the pauses. Upon my word I was a limp as a rag with sheer sympathetic exhaustion when she hurled a final anathema and made the most tragic of exits. I suspect she is training for the emotional drama. There were lots of girls in the cast, and Jack was happy. Miss de Forrest had on her most iron-bound, copper-toed manner, and wore billows upon billows of white Swiss muslin; so did Miss Prescott; so did Miss Cobb; so did Miss English; so even did Miss Alice Harrison, who looked comfortably familiar in her wonted place, and got the reception she did not get at the other house. She has some nice new red hair fricassees elaborately, and was about the only one who did not look like a Godey fashion plate for '59 besides Mrs. Gilflory. I wonder what commission Alice gets on "Sozodont!" She is rather a nice "Libby dear," but I am always astonished at the amusement people find in that pair of infantile lovers. The billing and cooing of a boy and girl are not vitally interesting, and as for timid lovers let the playwright add three decades to "Charley Brew's" age—I forgot to look at the bills and am not sure of the spelling of the name—and he will have the stuff of which timid lovers are made. There is a beautiful fearlessness about boy lovers—it is more grossly called cheek—which quite precludes the idea of this being as capital a copy from nature as some others in the cast. But Fitzgerald looked as if he were home from college on a Christmas vacation. What is this secret of perennial youth which is known to the stage alone? I would have given Fitzgerald twenty years on a pinch, and not a day over. Mr. Bassett, on the other hand, looked exceedingly well in a pair of white whiskers and a wig to match, and with most trifling exertion to himself labored through the part of the complaisant "Mr. Millionaire Dart." Horror! I should not have used that word; I shall have a lawsuit about my ears. Don't repeat it, Madge. Mr. Wells played "Roland Vance," the paralyzing reporter. Why do they always have two women fighting over one man? I know it is the proper thing according to statistics, but the stage is at liberty to reverse statistics, and I should so like to think there was one enchanted Angelica being fought for. The world does seem so awfully full of women when one goes to the theatre—all the Highlanders at Baldwin's, all the sailors and pages and half the soldiers at the Bush Street; while in the Surprise Party scarcely anyone wears skirts excepting pretty Miss Searle. The Josh Hart party, fates be thanked, will vacate Kennedy's pretty little Standard Theatre after next week, and then the Revelers will be rescued from the cave of blue gloom on Mission Street, and all will go merrily once more again. Little Oates is going away. Alas! I sigh that sigh right heartily. With all its faults we have enjoyed the long opera bouffe season. We like the light music, the lively plots, the striking costumes, and the always brilliant mise en scène. It is a place to go for relaxation; and, although Mrs. Oates has introduced some notes of queer quality, and has been altogether rather an unreliable little prima donna, I am sorry to give her good-bye. But I am consoled when I remember that Beverly goes too. We are to have Clara Morris again, if she is well enough to play. She will be well enough. What a striking woman she is with all her affectations and self-consciousness. I like an actress who can give me an electric shock of novelty, as she did when she entered in Article 47. Judge of my astonishment to see this fair-haired Saxon-faced creature transformed into a mulatto girl; not a quadron or octroon, as the text seemed to convey, but, in her black dress—which, of course, makes a brunette by artificial light look darker—a genuine mulatto. In her evening dress in the salon, a gorgeous combination of scarlet silk, rich enough to stand alone, and peacock blue, set off with bangles and gilt snakes, feather fans, fur-covered lounges, etc., the barbaric effect was carried out. I do not remember ever to have had so many consecutive chills down my back as in the mad scene. She plays it with revolting faithfulness. The gradations of her madness are something wonderful; and when she first gave that shrill maniac laugh, which she can only have learned from the mad themselves, I could fairly see people's blood curdle. Upon my word, I think it is wicked for a woman to play so repulsive a part so well. I have experienced more agreeable sensations in the theatre than curdling blood. Fortunately, the last act takes the edge off the horrors. It is a post-climax. I don't believe there is any such word as that, but that is what I mean. However, Article 47 always was an unmanageable sort of a play. It is bad at both ends, and good in the middle only. I do not like the new version, although the tedious court scene has been left out; but they have also left out the baroness, who was really the only pleasant party in the play. I should have liked to describe her to you, for she always dressed well, and you know, Madge, how you do dote on good clothes. But here I am, rambling along with news three weeks old. Forgive me, Madge; it is because I have not yet recovered from the effect of looking at that terrible madness. There is nothing new but the old new Mighty Dollar. But the Highlanders make their last bow at Baldwin's very soon, and we are to have a new troupe of minstrels at Locke's Theatre. So, as usual, we are to one thing constant never, always excepting

Yours, faithfully,

BETSY B.

Lady to her friend—I didn't forget that it was your birthday, and so I embroidered your this pocketbook. Isn't it just lovely? Take it, and whenever you use it, then, dearest, think of me.

A mysterious disease is making melancholy havoc among the mules of Nevada, but the journalists over there entertain a hope that its ravages may be confined to posterity.

WHAT OUR BEST SOCIETY IS ABOUT.

There have been but few parties given this winter, but last Friday before New Year's there was another of the Assemblies held at Steinway Hall, under the patronage of Mrs. Cole, Mrs. Freeborn, Mrs. M. Castle, and Mrs. Sanderson. Willie Cole led the German; Seward Cole, Charles F. Crocker, W. H. Talbot, and Miles J. Talbot were managers. Among the ladies there were Mrs. Ben Holliday, Mrs. Flora Keys, Miss Flora Sharon, Miss Dora Miller, Miss Mattie Solomon, Miss Lutie Cole, Miss Emma Cole, Mrs. J. C. Flood, Miss Jennie Flood, Miss Buckley, Miss Bessie Sedgwick, Mrs. John L. McMullen, Misses Lilla and Anna McMullen, Mrs. Robert Crockett, and the Misses Crockett, from Sacramento, also the Misses Belden from San José. Mrs. Colgate Baker gave a Martha Washington party for her pupils, and combined with it a quiet little charity for the "Old Ladies' Home." Each invited guest was to give fifty cents to that object. The young ladies, in powdered heads and their old-time costumes, gave quite a charming effect to the stately dance of those days. New Year's Day passed off very quietly. Many of our prominent young ladies received with quite a bevy of young ladies about them, and then finished the day with a charming dance in the evening. Mrs. John McMullen, beside her daughters, received with Miss Mattie Solomon, Miss Marshall, and Miss Emma Crockett. Two of our young brides, Mrs. McLung and Mrs. Fletcher, invited quite a number of friends, and finished up the New Year in a most pleasant way to her many guests. Mrs. William Gwin and her daughters received with the Misses Maynard and Mrs. Wilson. Mrs. John C. Fall received with her daughters, and some charming young ladies, among them Miss Nopie McDougal. Mrs. Dr. Toland also surrounded herself with some young ladies—the Misses Chamberlin, Miss Swearingen. Mrs. Michael Castle, received with Miss Banks, Mrs. Colonel Stewart and several others. Many of our pleasantest houses have been closed by recent family bereavements. Death has been among us, making a sad year for some. General and Mrs. Miller have just buried their only son. Then poor Neddy Hooper—all we old Californians knew him so well; he was sick so short a time—pneumonia; it is so rapid in its effects. At every social gathering of note his familiar face was always seen. Mr. Lawrence Hall is missing from his place; some of the funds of the London and San Francisco Bank are minus. I've heard Mr. Camilo Martin has been requested to make good the deficit; so he resigns. There is great sympathy expressed here for Mr. Hall's brothers—young men of excellent standing in this community, who are suffering keenly from the mortification their brother has inflicted upon them and their family. On next Tuesday, the 7th, the Loring Club will give one of their charming concerts; all the world of San Francisco are glad to receive invitations, for they have made them the fashion. There seem to be very few parties given this winter, so far, among people we know. I think the depression in stocks affects us all more or less. Mr. and Mrs. John F. Swift have returned from abroad. Colonel and Mrs. Weller and family have returned from San Rafael, and are at the Palace for the winter. Senator and Mrs. Jones, also Senator Sharon, have returned to Washington. Flora Sharon remains here. Mrs. and Miss Swearingen purpose leaving for the East next week.

MARY JANE.

Following is not the text of the memorial unanimously adopted by the Constitutional Convention: "To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:—The people of the State of California, by their delegates elected for another purpose, respectfully represent (1) that the number of Chinese in this State is 120,000; (2) that the number of adult whites in this State is 240,000; (3) that the 240,000 adult whites give employment to the 120,000 Chinese; (4) that directly or indirectly nearly every household in this State employs Chinese labor; (5) that the anti-Chinese sentiment (which employs 120,000 Chinese, as aforesaid) is a strong and sincere sentiment, which your honorable bodies are bound to respect; and (6) that if we did not patronize and employ the Chinese no legislation would be required to make them "go." (7) We petition your honorable bodies for such legislation as will make us stop patronizing and employing them. We dimly remember a story (by Artemus Ward, we think) of a man who was imprisoned for long, weary years in a room by himself, enduring all the nameless horrors of solitary confinement. One day when his luckless condition of isolation and solitude had become insupportable it occurred to the unhappy man to open the window and step out. The application of this anecdote to the Chinese question is, we think, sufficiently obvious; if we, the people of this sovereign commonwealth, are earnest in our dislike of Chinese cheap labor it may some day occur to us to stop purchasing it. Just now we occupy the somewhat ludicrous attitude of endeavoring to obtain from others, by alternate threats and entreaties, deliverance from a temptation which we have no disposition to resist. Our Satan will not get him behind us, and nobody is going to put him there; let us try turning our backs upon him.

One of the girl students of Girton college on being asked why she broke her engagement with a young Oxford fellow answered: "I can only say his views on the theosophic doctrine of Cosmogony are loose, and you will at once understand how impossible it is for any true woman to risk her happiness on such a person."

Strive to be the greatest man in your country, and you may be disappointed; strive to be the best, and you may succeed.

Garlic is said to be a sovereign remedy for gout. There is no remedy for garlic.

In the good time coming, the servant girl and the kerosene lamp can lie down together.

One codfish yields 1,000,000 eggs. This is what keeps up the aristocracy.

The upshot of the matter was that he fired his pistol in the air.

MUSIC AND ART.

"For Art may err but Nature can not miss."

Now that the holidays are over, I suppose we shall have the two Orchestral Matinees that still remain to be given to fill out the second series, but whether these are to be followed by any more seems still to be a matter of considerable doubt. The fact is, that not only have these concerts failed to pay Mr. Herold anything for the great trouble and anxiety with which they have been attended, but they have even caused him a pecuniary loss, and under these circumstances he feels a very natural reluctance to continue them. I can not but hope that some means will be found to place these performances on a sufficiently sound financial basis to enable Mr. Herold to go on with the good work that he has hitherto prosecuted under so many disadvantages and real sacrifices of time and money. It seems as if in a city of the size and pretensions of ours it ought to be an easy matter to keep alive a sufficient interest in good orchestral music to pay at least the bare expenses of its performance. It should be especially so when this expense is kept at the minimum through the disinterestedness of, firstly, Mr. Herold himself, who is perfectly content to give his services without any other satisfaction than he would have in the work, and, secondly, the members of the orchestra, who give their time to the rehearsals and performance at a mere pittance that barely pays them for the time lost from lessons, and in a number of instances does not even do that. The frequent opportunity of hearing the best orchestral compositions of the great composers is of inestimable value to our rising generation; it is an essential factor in the educational scheme which in so many other directions we foster with great solicitude and at great expense, and I doubt whether this important adjunct to a liberal education was ever before placed within the reach of so young a community as ours at so trifling an outlay or with so little effort at its encouragement as has been the case in these matinees. It is extremely unjust to an artist of Mr. Herold's eminent ability—not to speak of his almost life-long devotion to the culture of good music in this city—to permit him to be harassed in so excellent a work with the mere ways and means of paying expenses, and still more so to leave him with a part of those expenses to pay out of his own pocket. Surely out of our many art and music-loving dilettanti it seems as though some few might be found with sufficient liberality and pride in the matter to insure so worthy an undertaking against either the danger of loss or the necessity for catering to the questionable taste of the general public in order to avert disaster. There are several ways in which this might be done; a sufficiently large permanent subscription seems to me to be the best, inasmuch as it would leave the conductor free to select his own programmes and enable him to hold as many rehearsals as he might find requisite for the proper production of the music. But whatever is done, or however it is done, these concerts should not be permitted to die out.

In considering the musical tendency of our city—and this means the entire Pacific slope—and endeavoring to forecast the probabilities of a healthy progress in the future, one of the most encouraging signs that I meet is the fact that our leading publisher, Mr. M. Gray, finds that it will pay him to issue a very extensive series of the best Etudes of our day. I take it for granted, at least, that it will pay, since I can not suspect a business man of indulging his musical taste upon any other grounds; and when one considers the great outlay involved in engraving the plates for several hundred pages of music—apart from the cost of material and printing—it is at once apparent that in order to become a profitable investment there must be the prospect of a very considerable sale. It is in this sale of good Studies—and the prospect of its continuance, as seen through commercial eyes—that I find encouragement. The use of only good study material ought of itself to do much toward forming a healthy musical taste in pupils, and I am glad to say that the selection published by Mr. Gray contains very little that is not of the best. There are, firstly (in musical value), the Etudes of Stephen Heller—a beautiful and remarkably correct edition—of which in our day there is nothing more to be said. They are simply the best work of the kind that has ever been done, and are as fresh and beautiful to-day as the day they were first published. The series of Studies for technique begin, say, with Duvernoy—Ecole Primaire and de Mécanisme—includes the excellent little ones of Lemoine, and progresses through those of Brauer (very good of their kind), Berens, and Köhler (very dry, but useful if one can endure the musical stupidity of them), to Döring, whose work is intelligent and of a certain value, and Czerny, who is represented by his Etudes de la vélocité and the Kunst der fingerfertigkeit. The first of these sets, the Velocité, is being gradually superseded by the Op. 66 of Loeschorn, an excellent book, of somewhat more musical interest than that of Czerny, but which does not, after all, entirely fill its place. The Studies of Krause, Op. 2, are one of the best sets in the series, and deserves the widest possible circulation. Although styled Etudes de trille, they are by no means to be considered as devoted to this object alone; they are of the highest usefulness in developing the equality of the fingers, and have enough music in them to make them delightful study. This may also be said of those of Bertini and Alloys Schmitt, two composers who have been almost crowded out of the modern curriculum, but whose works have a special value of their own that renders them well nigh indispensable. Indeed, for the cultivation of a pure, legato style of playing, I should call these the most valuable studies that I know; they are at once admirable technical material and good sound music. A young pianist who has been carefully carried through these two authors alone—mind, I say carefully—may be trusted to do almost anything reasonably well, and ought to be past the danger of caring for musical trash. I am glad that Mr. Gray has included these Studies in his excellent collection, and hope that they will find the most extensive circulation and use.

S. E.

Probably the best way to put a stop to this grave-robbing business would be, in every case where a grave is rifled, to fill the vacancy promptly with a medical student. There is a further merit in the proposition. The plan, if faithfully carried out, would tend to greatly diminish the number of graves.

DISSENTING VIEWS.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—We read the article in your last issue, which was severe upon the Democrats and prophesied the nomination of Grant as the Republican candidate in 1880. You can not object if we say we do not agree with you; particularly, if we try and show you wherein we differ? The Republicans are responsible for all the laws of the land during the past eighteen years; they have been in power ever since the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln; the lower branch of Congress has been once or twice Democratic, but the Government and Senate have been Republican, thus forming a perfect barrier even to any proposed Democratic laws. The issue between the two great parties has simply resolved itself to this: The Republicans are dying from the effects of political plunder, and the Democrats from hunger or lust after spoils! Grant has done more than any living man to bring about this result; no Gatling gun ever scattered shot equal to the bad men vomited upon the country during the last four years of Grant's official career. It was as the ashes of Vesuvius penetrating and covering Pompeii; it has thoroughly corrupted the country. Many old line Republicans then openly stated these facts, virtually abandoning the party, and there came no "third term;" no party could stand it, and this accounts for the selection of Mr. Hayes. We notice the Republican journals, and the Associated Press, which has ever been the scavenger of that party, announce that "Blaine will carry the Northeast, Grant the South, and Washburne the Northwestern States." We would like to ask what Southern State Grant would carry? The negro vote is steadily joining the white—the law of personal interest—and the Republicans admit they committed a great political blunder when they gave the franchise to this ignorant race. Some people would even give votes to Chinamen; but the difficulty at the North (and they seem not to understand it, or pretend they do not see it) is the necessary "chawing up"—amalgamation, if you will—of the Europeans who land yearly by the hundreds of thousands upon our shores; and your writer believes that to this cause alone can be traced all the ills that have ever fallen upon the United States. When the American Party arose and swept the North and West, carrying several Southern States, the Democracy, under the leadership of Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, turned this tide. It was a hand from the North to the South, and the South committed the fatal error of refusing that kindly grasp. If the South had seen the struggle the North was then making to shake of "foreign influence" there would have been no civil war, no slavery either, and Americans would have ruled America. All parties seem to adopt platforms for the purpose of getting votes, and then "dodging." Kearney's strength (excuse me for referring to this Irish blatherskite, but we must answer your article) consists in telling exactly what the people believe to be the truth as far as he comprehends the question. Your writer even thinks Kearney's ideas preferable to the political rascals and thieves who have got their grasp upon our city and State; yet he knows that Kearney has all the characteristics of his race—they try to rule every place but Ireland—and is sincerely grateful to the German population, else Kearney might become an Irish king! Of the late election returns the Cincinnati Enquirer says: "In order that our readers may know the exact strength of the Democrats and Greenbackers, and their combined majority, we give the returns from some of the States; and if the Republicans would study these election returns they would roost lower."

Maine.....	12,800	Ohio.....	35,000
Connecticut.....	8,600	Indiana.....	32,000
New York.....	45,000	Illinois.....	40,000
Pennsylvania.....	62,000	Michigan.....	45,000
New Jersey.....	12,000	Wisconsin.....	10,000

Another "National" paper asserts, in copying these figures: "We sincerely believe that if the Democracy and Greenbackers unite in the next Presidential election the Republicans (or money power) will be defeated in every State in the Union. Even Vermont will be taken away from them. Let our platform be: Who shall make the money for the people of the United States—the Government or the National banks?" We claim that the "Nationals," as they call themselves, who have fifteen votes in the coming Congress, and voted over a million of votes in the last election of 1878, can name the next President of the United States, and that it will not be Grant, no matter how well he is groomed, or any other military man, for the people want money instead of the sword! We know he must be, under the Constitution, by birth an American, but we want him a true one; not a creature of party, not a trimmer for office, but an upright, manly American who knows the interest of the whole country and will have the courage to tell the people what is right and what is wrong, what is true and what is false.

A DEMOCRAT.

Mr. Sothern—the "Lord Dundreary" of the stage—is an aristocrat, and desiring to cure the socialistic tendency of his dog, which has the curiosity to search for the lost crown of the king of dogs, fastened two very sharp needles to his nose the ends projecting about an inch. When a strange dog rushes up to shake noses with him he gets a thrust that sends him off howling, and the effect is such that Mr. Sothern's dog can't get within gunshot of any other who knows how the trick works.

A West Hill man painted a ferocious-looking sign, "Look out for the dog," and put it up in the front yard to scare away tramps. The next morning a tramp with a bad smile, shoulders like a load of hay, and a club with death smiling out of every knot of it, rapped at the front door, demanded some hot biscuit, meat, potatoes, and a cup of coffee, and asked, pleasantly, "How is the dog?"

Sympathizing bystanders (about a man who has been knocked down and stunned by a railway train)—"Poor man! Take him to the station." Injured one (recovering)—"Take me to th' station? What for, then? If an' ve dune any harm to yo'r engine aw's willin' to pay for't."

"Boys," said the man holding an inverted match in one hand, and a dark cigar in the other, "never acquire the pernicious habit of smoking. I am a slave to it now, and yet I hate it. I never see a cigar that I do not want to burn it up."

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

How to Uncurl a Pig's Tail.—A Bad Place to be "Sick Abed."—Sammy Dobby's Time for Bellowing.—The Zebra, considered as an Equine Convict.—How the Camel Rider Rose Superior to the Wheel-barrow Man.—The Sin of Kicking a Man when His Stocks are Down, and some Reflections by the Author's Uncle Edward on the Vice of Fraternal Distrust.

One time there was a ole man had a pig, an the pig it had a curly tail, but ole Gaffer Peterses has got a brush onto it, and the ole man's gurl she had curly hair, too, cos she put it up in papers. So one day the ole man he cot the pig and put its tail up in a curl paper, too, jest like hern, and then he sed: "Katy," cos that was her name, "com a long an see yure ole father feed the pig."

And Katy she went, and wen the pig cum up an put its feet in the trof for to eat, Katy she loked a long wile, an then she said: "Wy, Poppy!"

But Poppy he didnt take notice, jest kep a kanockn on the bottem of the bucket for to git ol the swill out. After a other wile Katy she spoke up agin an said: "Poppy, wot for do you curl it?"

Then the ole man he said, the ole man did: "Curl be blode! you better ast that riddle elswere; it is twisted the other way! I love this pig like it was my own dotter, but lle straten that tail fore killin time if I got to brake it. I dont like curls, and all tho you an yure sister carries 2 menny guns for me, lle be dum busted if lle giv in to the hull family!"

But my sister she has got tongs for to curl hern, an one time Franky, thats the baby, nipped his nose in em and hollered wild, like he was tom cats. Pigs woller in the mud, and babies they woller on the flore.

One time a man wich wasent smart like me, more like Billy, he see a pig woller in a puddie of mud, and he said: "Poor feller, were does it pain you?"

The pig it loked at the man an then it roled on its other side like sayn: "Pretty much all over."

Then the man he shake his hed and said a other time: "Thats a mity bad place for be sick abed in."

But the pig it grunted, much as to say: "Thats a fack, but wen a feller is took sudden he must put up with sech comodations as he can git an not be a hog a bout it."

One day Billy, thats my brother, he and Sammy Dobby was playn by a mud hole, and Billy he sed: "Now, Sammy, les play we was a barn yard, you be the pig and lie down an woller, and lle be a bull and beller like every thing."

So they got down on to their hans and kanees, and Sammy he went in the mud and wollerd, wile Billy bellerd like dissant thunder. Bimeby Sammy he cum out muddy, you never seen sech a muddy little feller, and he said: "Now you be the pig an let me beller."

But Billy he said: "I aint a very good pig fore dinner, and ittle be time nuff for you to beller wen yure mother sees yure close."

A man wich had ben put in the pen tentchery cos he stole a horse he got out and run a way with his stripy close on. And one day wile he was a runin a way he met a zebray. So the man he loked a wile a stonish, and then he sed: "How long was you put in for?"

But the zebray it didnt say eny thing, and after a wile the man he sed agin: "How did you git out?"

Then the zebray it didnt say no thing a other time, so the man he sed: "I have ben tole there is a place were thay put fellers in the pen tentchery wich steel horses, but here I ges thay put horses in wich are stole, and I hope it aint no offence for to say I think thats jest the way it ot to be."

One time there was a man had a camlle, and the camlle it was a show, and the man wich had it he was a ridin it to a other town, and he met a other man wich was pushn a weel barro. Then the weel barro man he was a stonish, and he loked up to the feller onto the camlles back and he sed: "I gess you wude be safer if you wude put a litten rod onto yure horse."

Then the camlle back feller he sed: "Yes, and I gess you wude ride more cumfable if you put a seat in yure waggan."

But wen I rode little Sally Brope in mine she was upsat, and I never seen sech a straddle bug in my life, no in deed, and Billy he didnt in hisn.

Wile we was to our dinner Uncle Ned he sed: "Johnny, do you kano that New Years day has come, an at this seson the sworn off is first rate?"

And my father he spoke up and he said: "Yes, Edard, an it is the hope of this family that you will improof the cason by sevrin yure canexon with the mining intrests of the State of Nevady."

Wen my father he said it Uncle Ned he turned red like lobsters, an after a wile he sed: "The reason wy I calld Johnnys a tenshion to the subjeck of the new year was for to say that it wude be a mity gude time for him to rassle with his fathers painfle habbit of kickn a man wich is down."

Wen I ast Uncle Ned wot did he mean by bein down he sed, Uncle Ned did: "Wel, Johnny, I was mistook, it aint me thats down, but only jest sum minin stocks wich I put some of yure fathers munny an my own into cos hisn was a lyn in the bank a eatin its head off in intrest and I didnt hav no use for mine except I paid it back to the very man I had borrode it of, wich was yure futher. Course, Johnny, sech axdens wil hapi in enny family, but I mus confess they hav ben occurn as a prety regler thing in thisn sence I found out a ded shure way to beat the stock markit. Yure fathers unfeelin hint that it is time for to swair of is mity rugh onto a man wich has ben in Injy and every were, pertickler jest wen he has ben giv a pint by a feller wich is on the inside, but, Johnny, sum fokes is sech chuckle heded galoots about stoix that other fokes is afr. de to back their own fleshn blud. Yes, my boy, one of the werst fecchers of this gittin rich by stoix is it makes a man dowt his brother."

But Billy he says if selling the panno for to pay the butcher is gittin rich, wy not bust up the co'thouse and be jest too gorjus for enny thing?

SAN RAFAEL, January 3, 1879.

THE THEATRES OF PARIS.

By C. H. Harding.

Théâtre Français, Odéon, Palais Royal, Italiens, Vaudeville, the Variétés, the Gymnase, Théâtre de la Renaissance, Porte St. Martin, the Châtelet, Folies Dramatiques, Opéra Comique, Bouffes Parisiens, the New Opéra, the houses, the artists, the audience.

Leaving San Francisco this morning by balloon express, we may hope to arrive in Paris at 7:30 to-night and be in time for the play. What play? the reader will say. Really, as we cast our eyes over the multi-colored playbills on the kiosques, we are somewhat embarrassed for a reply; and, as time is precious, we resolve, for this occasion only, to follow the example set nightly by a number of fashionably-attired gentlemen and drop in for a few moments at each of the principal theatres of the capital.

Being on the Boulevard, we naturally pass through the animated Rue Richelieu until we reach the Palais Royal, and then at once enter the Théâtre Français—officially called the Comédie Française—or, as the Academicians would say, the Maison de Molière. The Comédie Française, which was established by royal decree in 1681 for the benefit of Molière and his stock troupe, was located for the greater part of the eighteenth century in the Rue de l'Ancienne Comédie in the Quartier Latin. Opposite the theatre was the famous Café Procope, where Voltaire, Gresset, Piron, and the other dramatists of that day held their symposia, passing the time between their dwellings in the neighborhood, the café, and the theatre. The Théâtre Français continued for eighty-two years to occupy this building, the erection of which cost some 200,000 francs. These fourscore and two years represent the most brilliant period of its history. We need only mention such actors as Granel—who first introduced starring tours—the two Quinauts, Lekain—whose genius made everyone completely forget his intense ugliness—Bellocour, the two Poissons, Préville, Molé; and among the actresses, Sainval, Dumesnil, Gaussin, Clairon, Adrienne Lecouvreur, Dangeville. Here were enacted the comedies of Marivaux—to the success of which we owe the French verb "marivauder"—Lesage's Turcaret, Regnard's Joueur, Gresset's Méchant, Piron's Métromanie, Soudaine's Philosophe sans le Savoir, the plays of Destouches, Lachapelle, Crébillon, Campistron, and Voltaire. It was then that the Théâtre Français obtained its reputation of being the first theatre in Europe. The building was, however, too small, and a new theatre was constructed on the site of the Hôtel Condé. While this theatre was being erected, the Comédie played at the theatre of the Tuileries palace (1770-1782). It was at the Tuileries that Voltaire's last piece—Irène—was put on the stage. At the third representation of the play the author, then in his eighty-fourth year, was received in triumph and crowded by the public, so that his death, which took place a few days afterward, may have been the effect of excessive joy. Having entered its new establishment—now the Odéon Théâtre—the Comédie Française at once put Beaumarchais' Mariage de Figaro upon the stage. All know the intrigues connected with the royal authorization to play this piece, and how the well-founded scruples of Louis XVI., as to permitting its production, were gradually overcome by the Queen and some members of the Trianon set. It was while the Théâtre Français was at the Odéon that it numbered among its stars, Molé, Fleury, Monvel, Dugazon, Larive, Mmes. Vestris, Constat, and Rasiacourt. Talma made his first appearance there when but quite young. During the Revolution the members of the troupe were suspected of royalist sympathies, thrown into prison, and their theatre closed; this, too, notwithstanding its new designation of Théâtre de la Nation et de l'Egalité. The fall of Robespierre brought about the release of the actors, and they separated, appearing at various theatres. Ere long the First Consul—on the 27th Germinal, in the year 13 of the Republic—issued a decree summoning the troupe together, and requiring the members to sign a deed of association reorganizing the Théâtre Français, the management of which was to remain with them. The establishment was then at once organized in its present home in the Rue Richelieu, and prospered under the active patronage of Napoleon, who was a lover of the classic drama. The troupe followed the Emperor to St. Cloud and Fontainebleau, playing the tragedies of Corneille and other classic authors. They rejoined the conqueror at Erfurt and at Dresden, where the Emperor kept the promise which he, as the young Bonaparte, had made to his friend Talma—to wit, that he, Talma, should act before a parterre of sovereigns. In 1812 Napoleon signed the decree of Moscow, which constituted the Comédie Française a Government theatre and something like a State Department. The rules then drawn up have undergone but few modifications since. For instance, Napoleon stipulated that after twenty years' service each member of the society (sociétaire) should be entitled to a pension of $800 per annum. This pension was only in 1877 raised to $1,000. During the Restoration, theatre-goers had got so tired of seeing the old pieces played over and over again at the Théâtre Français that they discontinued their visits, and while Louis Philippe occupied the throne there was imminent danger of the troupe having to break up. M. Thiers prevented this, and Rachel's genius saved the theatre and caused it soon to regain its lost popularity.

Owing to her talents the taste for classic pieces revived, and now the old stock plays, especially those of Molière, fill the house. The principal members of the society during the first half of this century were the two Baptistes, Firmin, Michot, Monrose, Mlles. Georges, Duchesnois, and Mars. The last named, from 1791 to 1841, was equally popular as ingénue, amoureuse and grande coquette. Later on came Mme. Allan, who, after playing Musset's charming pieces in Russia, got a Parisian audience to listen to and applaud them. Then followed Mlle. Rachel—the Queen of Tragedy—Mlle. Fix, Augustine Brohan, the first of soubrettes. Among the best actors may be named Provost, Samson, Geoffroy, and Regnier. And so, coming down to the Second Empire and the Republic of M. Thiers and Marshal McMahon, we have Got, whom many consider to be the finest actor of the day; Bressant, a type of elegant ease upon the stage; Delaunay, the ardent jeune premier; Coquelin, Lafontaine, Worms, Febvre, Monnet Sully, who in 1877 married Mlle. Reichenberg. Then Arnould Plessy, Favart, Madeleine Brohan, Nathalie, Emma Fleury, Emilie Dubois, Victoria Lafontaine, Croizette, Sarah Bernhardt, Samary, and Broisat. The most distinguished authors of this century have written plays for the Théâtre Français; among them Collin d'Hurleville, Fabre d'Eglantine, Legouvé père and fils, Etienne, Jouy, Andrieux, Casimir Delavigne, Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas père and fils, Alfred de Musset, Alfred de Vigny, Scribe, Ponsard, Emile Augier, Jules Sandeau, Laya, Mme. de Girardin, Octave Feuillet, etc., etc.

The manager or administrator of the theatre, who is appointed by the Government, is at present M. Emile Perrin, the former director of the Opéra. The Théâtre Français can choose its sociétaires from any other theatre it pleases on giving the management of the theatre whence the new member is to be recruited a year's notice. The receipts at the Théâtre Français for the year ending the 31st March, 1877, amounted to $317,945. The author's dues are fixed at fifteen per cent. of the receipts. The theatre receives an annual grant of about $50,000 from the Government. The edifice, built by Louis, the architect of the Bordeaux theatre, has been greatly improved of late, even the gallery seats being upholstered with velvet. The seating capacity of the theatre is 1,522, and ample accommodation is provided for every ticket-holder. The vestibule contains Houdon's celebrated statue of Voltaire, and Clesinger's admirable statue of his mother-in-law, Georges Sand, which was purchased by the Government in 1877 from M. Emile de Girardin. In the green-room are portraits of the principal members of the troupe from the time of Molière, who was superintendent of the theatre from 1658 to his death, in 1673. We must, however, return for a moment to the vestibule, which also contains Duret's magnificent statues of Comedy and Tragedy—the former personified by Mlle. Mars, in the part of "Célimène"; the latter by Mlle. Rachel, in the part of "Phædra." The sculptor has selected the moment in which "Phædra," coming on the stage, utters these words: "Que ces vains ornements, que ces voiles me pesent! Quelle importune main, en serrant tous ces nœuds a pris sur mon front d'assembler mes cheveux." Few will fail to be struck by the fitness of the representation of Rachel as the embodiment of Tragedy. Frenchmen stoutly maintain that at her death the power of representing tragic art ceased for all time.

The artists' green-room at the Théâtre Français is nightly frequented by a number of persons who, strictly speaking, have no business there. Men of letters, celebrated artists and authors, academicians, and men of the world, assemble there to chat gaily with the actors and actresses, who are thus able, in contact with persons of culture, like themselves, to practice those little arts which they display with such perfection when representing the society of our day upon the stage. The gentlemanly ease which distinguishes the actors, the lady-like repose characterizing the actresses of this theatre, will at once impress the visitor; and the few, but appropriate gestures, the trained voices, the admirable pronunciation, will speedily convince him that he is at an academy where the purest kind of speaking and the best mode of expression may, by attentive observation, be acquired.

M. Emile Perrin, the present manager of the troupe, acquired during his tenure of office at the Opéra a taste for expensive decoration and scenery and appointments strictly in accordance with the period represented by the piece. As the Théâtre Français leads the way in such matters, all the other principal theatres have followed suit, and the most gorgeous display, necessitating a lavish expenditure, has been the result.

Thus the costumes in the Ami Fritz, at this theatre, were designed by the famous artist Charles Marchal, who afterward committed suicide because he found his sight was growing weak. The costumes in Carmen, at the Opéra Comique, were actually designed by Edouard Detaille, which of itself would be sufficient to show that the piece was gotten up regardless of expense. One theatre seeks to outdo another in the magnificence of its appointments, and rich satin hangings, furniture, and ornaments in the style of Louis XIV., or patterned according to the precise epoch represented in the piece, are placed before an audience whose aesthetic tastes did not in times past require so lavish an outlay. The manager of the Odéon actually recently paid three hundred francs for a drinking cup to be used on the stage, whereas he might have bought one to answer precisely the same purpose for two or three francs. In fact, literalness has obtained possession of the French stage, and the fowls that are eaten, the champagne that is drunk, in presence of the audience, are real farm-yard fowls, and the products of Veuve Clicquot's vineyards.

M. Sarcey, the eminent dramatic critic, and others with him, have done their best, but with little success, to frown down this realistic tendency, which drags fire-engines and express trains, animals and carriages, upon the stage, and subordinates the action of the piece to the accessories and minor details of the stage business. Sardou—that most exacting and fidgety of authors—once requested Montigny, the manager of the Gymnase, to have the hangings of a scene selected in velvet of the color of a particular Bordeaux vintage of 1846, and the manager actually had to send to Brabant's restaurant for a bottle of the wine in question. As for the long trains and rich lace trimmings worn by the actresses on the stage, they are admirably calculated to prevent their wearers moving a step and destroying all those illusions without which a piece can not be a success. Mlle. Blanche Pierson, at the Vaudeville, for instance, in her magnificent costumes, fresh from the ateliers of Worth, is frequently obliged to give her dress an awkward kick just previous to falling back in a fainting fit, or throwing herself in the arms of her lover. Enough, however, has been said of the accessories, and the visitor is naturally anxious to know something anent the actors and actresses, the sociétaires of the Théâtre Français. In the first place, they form the jury before whom every new piece is brought. It is read in their presence, the manager merely acting as presiding officer, and after discussing the merits of the play, they vote upon its admission, final rejection, or return to the author to be corrected.

The power vested in the management to recruit the troupe from among those of other theatres enabled the Français to draw away Sarah Bernhardt from the Odéon, and Febvre, Lafontaine, and Worms—the best first lover on the Parisian stage—from the Vaudeville. The actors and actresses who make their first appearance on any stage at the Français are those who have carried off the highest honors at the Conservatoire. Among these is Mlle. Sophie Croizette, that eccentric young lady whose expressive countenance, unconventional style of acting, and trembling voice, have enabled her to exercise an almost absolute sway not only over managers, authors, and the public, but also over the other members of her profession. She is continually surrounded by a court of young noblemen, members of the Jockey Club, bankers, academicians, and authors, and reigns supreme over the Théâtre Français as did Mars and Rachel in their day. Visitors to the Centennial will recollect having seen her portrait, in amazon costume, painted by her brother-in-law, Carolus Duran. She is represented trotting along the shore at Trouville, mounted on a magnificent animal belonging to M. Delamarre. She looks there very different from the heroine in the last act of Octave Feuillet's Sphinx. Her delineation of the effects of poison on the human frame in that act was as horribly realistic as though the spectators had actually beheld the agonies of a dying morphine-taker. Having said thus much of Mlle. Croizette what shall we say of her rival, Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt, in whose honor Victor Hugo gave a magnificent banquet at the Grand Hotel, in December, 1877? Mlle. Bernhardt is the embodiment of the triumph of mind over matter. Her tall, thin frame, consumptive appearance, and actual debility, would lead to the impression that she was incapable of the least exertion, and yet there are few women possessed of greater energy or more capable of prolonged labor. Scarcely less celebrated as a sculptress than as an actress, the groups and busts sent by her every year to the salon testify to her assiduity in following this art. Mlle. Bernhardt's parents belonged to the Jewish faith, but she herself was educated at a convent, and brought up as a Christian. She became a pupil of the Conservatoire mainly owing to the favorable manner in which she had impressed the maestro, Auber. She distinguished herself at the Conservatoire, took a prize, and was admitted as a pensionnaire at the Comédie Française. She did not remain there long. Her indomitable will, her determination to act according to her own conceptions of the characters to be represented, could not brook the traditional ruts into which at that time the "house of Molière" had fallen. She went from the Théâtre Français to the Gymnase, from there to the Porte St. Martin—where she played in the Biche aux Bois—and from there to the Odéon. It was by her fine rendering of the part of a young Levite in Athalie that she first attracted attention at the last-named theatre, and compelled the critics to acknowledge her talent. This was followed by a series of successes, among the greatest of which were her representations of the little Florentine singer, "Zanetto," in Coppée's Passant, and that of the Queen in Ruy Blas. Soon after this she was invited to return to the Comédie Française, and there eclipsed all her former triumphs by her performance of "Phædre," in which part many hold that she excels even Rachel. After that the path was comparatively easy for this tall, frail, and exquisitely graceful creature. One of her greatest successes was her representation of "L'Etrangère" in Dumas' play of that name. Clairin has depicted her in that character in a large painting, which hangs on the walls of the drawing-room of her house, at the corner of the Rue Fortuny and the Ave. de Villiers. There, in accordance with the principle of the modern realistic school of art, all the most distinguishing characteristics of her face and form are brought out even more prominently than in the original, and the mass of drapery which extends beyond her feet, as she lies on a couch, serves to make the already elongated form assume a still more lengthened appearance. In addition to those rôles already mentioned, she has earned distinction in the part of "Posthumia," in Rome Sauvée, La Fille de Roland, etc.

Her representation of the heroine in Victor Hugo's Hernani is considered perfection by the author. The title rôle in that piece is admirably played by Monnet-Sully, the handsome young tragedian of the troupe. Monnet-Sully, who is very dark and gloomy looking, has just that type of countenance which Victor Hugo's heroes might be expected to have. Hence his "Hernani" is as good as was his "Didier" in Marion Delorme. His fine figure shows to advantage when encased in the hose and doublet of the sixteenth century, or wrapped in the toga of ancient Rome. His wife, née Reichenberg, also a sociétaire of the Français, is, of course, a blonde.

Of pretty Jeanne Samary, Madeleine Brohan, Got, Febvre, and the others, space forbids us speaking. Still a word must be said of Coquelin, the comic actor and intimate friend of Gambetta, to whom he has given lessons in elocution. Coquelin's voice is as shrill and strident as a brass instrument, and this with his turned-up nose, his broad mouth, and ready, saucy wit, and his gay humor, make him an admirable representative of the lackey in Molière's comedies. As "Mascarille," "Scapin," "Crispin," and similar characters, he is unrivaled. As for Delaunay, who has played the young lovers' parts for a longer period than he might probably care to remember, it is sufficient to say of him that when he plays the "Duc de Richelieu" in Mlle. de Belle Isle, "Paul Forestier," "Fortunio," or the lovers' parts in Alfred de Musset's charming pieces, the illusion is complete. All the passion, the ardor, the sprightliness of a young man are there, and there are few greater treats than to see him and Mlle. Favart in the numerous pieces in which they play together.

Within the last few years it has become the fashion to go to the Théâtre Français on Tuesdays. Ladies and gentlemen receive visitors there in their private boxes, just as they formerly did at the Théâtre des Italiens. The conversation and laughter going on on those evenings somewhat mystifies the uninitiated who have gone to see and listen to the piece, whereas the box-holders and occupants of stalls have gone to see and listen to each other.

But we must hasten on across the water to the Quartier Latin, where on the Place de l'Odéon we find the theatre of the same name. It is customary for boulevard idlers to talk of the Odéon Théâtre as though it were at the world's end, and they will tell you that the box-openers grow mushrooms in the orchestra stalls. The theatre in its present state certainly does somewhat resemble a provincial playhouse. The troupe of the Théâtre Français, as has been mentioned, occupied the site of this theatre from 1782 to 1793. The Odéon was burnt down in 1799, rebuilt in 1808, and baptized as the Théâtre de l'Impératrice, just as in revolutionary times it had been the Théâtre de la Nation and Théâtre de l'Egalité. In 1815 the artists at this theatre were placed on the same footing as those of the Théâtre Français, and were called comedians in ordinary to the King. In 1818 the theatre was burned down, but a year later the present heavy, uninviting edifice was constructed and opened by Picard. Casimir Delavigne's Vépres Siciliennes, Comédiens, and Le Paria were produced there with great success. Some years later Weber's Freischütz was brought out at the Odéon, under the title of Robin des Bois. Subsequently some of the best pieces of Alfred de Vigny, Alexandre Dumas, Frédéric Soulié, Georges Sand (including the Marquis de Villemer), Emile Augier, Ponsard, Louis Bouilhet, and other celebrated dramatic authors, have been produced on the boards of the Odéon. Nevertheless, the theatre which has accommodations for one thousand six hundred spectators is rarely more than half full, and the receipts for the year ending March 31, 1877, amounted to only $106,927, or scarcely one third of the receipts of the Théâtre Français. The $20,000 the Odéon receives annually from the Government for performing classic dramas on the left bank of the Seine are insufficient to enable the theatre to prove a paying speculation. Besides, its best artists are almost sure to be absorbed by its "big brother" over the water, the Théâtre Français. This was the case, as we have seen, with Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt. In December, 1877, the Odéon produced an adaptation by Grévin, the caricaturist, of Ernest d'Hervilly's charming legend, Le Bonhomme Mère. The Odéon is sometimes called the "Second Théâtre Français." The interior of the theatre, which is in the form of a parallelogram, and is 183 feet long, 120 feet broad, and 66 feet high, is one of the finest in Paris. The benevolent Louis XVI., in authorizing the construction of a theatre on the site of the old Hôtel de Condé, gave as one of the reasons, "that our subjects before entering and when leaving the theatre may be able to take a walk in the neighboring Luxembourg Gardens." The Odéon is closed during June, July, and August. The authors' dues at this theatre amount to twelve per cent. of the gross receipts. The arcades all round the exterior of the edifice are occupied by booksellers and news-vendors.

Returning to the site of the Théâtre Français, we cross over to the little Palais Royal Théâtre, which is scarcely able to accommodate over one thousand spectators. It is always full—people going there to laugh at Hyacinthe's nose, Lheritier's grimaces, Lassouche's contortions, Gil Perez's make-up, and Geoffroy's comic representations of the middle class Parisian. At this theatre the female parts are almost entirely of a subordinate nature, and Mlle. Alice Regnault and the other actresses scarcely come on the stage for any other purpose than to show off their fine dresses. It will be recollected that this theatre is situated beneath the arcades of the Galerie Montpensier, and that each arcade corresponds to a house. A century ago Philippe Egalité, the Duke of Orleans, gambling one evening with his cousin, the Comte d'Artois, staked and lost three arcades of his palace. They were the three arcades beneath which then stood the Théâtre de Mlle. Montausier, and now the Théâtre du Palais Royal.

On our way back to the Boulevard we drop in at the Théâtre Italien, celebrated for the triumphs of Pellegrini, Rafanelli, Bordogni, Tachinardi, Manuel Garcia, Donzelli, Graziani, Galli, Lablache, Rubini, Tamburini, Ronconi, Mario, Verger, Pandolfini; of Mmes. Pisanoni, Pasta, Catalani, Mainville-Fodor, Pauline Viardot, Malibran, Sonntag, Grisi, Damoreau-Cinti, Persiani, Frezzolini, Alboni, Durand, Laura Harris, Elena Sanz, and Adelina Patti. The last named, being unable to fulfill her engagement for the 1877-78 season, paid M. Leon Escudier, the manager, a forfeit of $20,000, and this it was which enabled him to pay expenses. Otherwise, receiving no subsidy from the Government, the management of this theatre usually results in a failure. This was not the case with Max Strakosch's venture in 1873-74; but few entrepreneurs are so successful as he has been. The opening nights particularly are apt to prove unfortunate for debutantes at the Salle Ventadour—as this theatre is habitually called. At the close of 1877 and in January, 1878, Salvini achieved a prodigious success here by his performances in Italian of "Hamlet," "Othello," "Conrad" in La Morte Civile, etc., etc. In Shakspearian characters he was held by many to be even superior to Ernesto Rossi. Italian actors ought to be quite at home in France, for the first troupe appeared in Paris as far back as 1577; and Mazarin, when Louis XIV.'s prime minister, had two stock companies of actors to play there, the first in 1645, the second in 1660.

Returning now to the boulevards, we find at the corner of the Boulevard des Capucines and the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin the Vaudeville Théâtre, which establishment was first opened at the beginning of 1796 in the Rue de Chartres. This was immediately following the Revolution, and the political couplets in the pieces played attracted great numbers to the theatre. After Napoleon had become Emperor he put a stop to these couplets, and since then the Vaudeville has become the home of little comedies and dramas. It was there that Scribe first made his mark, and among the other authors of Vaudeville pieces may be mentioned Melesville, Bayard Dupeuty, Théaulon, Lausanne, Duvert, and Saintine. Among the prominent artists of the theatre at that time were Lafont, Arnal, the elder Lepeintre, Bernard-Léon, Volnys, and Mme. Suzanne Brohan. This famous theatre being burned down in 1838, the Vaudeville troupe emigrated to the Boulevard Bonne Nouvelle, whence two years later they moved to a theatre on the Place de la Bourse. The demolition of the last named theatre—necessitated by the construction of the Rue du 4 Septembre—was followed by the removal of the Vaudeville to its present quarters, where, during the year ending 31st March, 1877, the receipts amounted to some $190,000. The Vaudeville somewhat resembles the St. James' Theatre, London, inasmuch as managers there have so frequently failed, notwithstanding the many successful pieces played. We need only mention such plays as the Dame aux Camélias, the Faux Bonshommes, the Filles de Marbre, the Parisiens, the Fée, Dalila, the Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre, Le Procès Vauradieux, Nos Intimes, La Famille Benoiton, Rabagas, L'Oncle Sam, and Sardou's success of 1877, Dora, in which the new academician stupidly enough speaks ill of the American people, of whom he knows next to nothing.

In December, 1877, M. Gondinet's Club was produced at the Vaudeville with great success. This is the first time that fashionable club life has been represented on the Parisian stage. There may be seen the members going and coming, with their hats on and cigars in their mouths, glancing unconcernedly at the newspapers, throwing a few napoleons on the card-table, and winning or losing with the same forced smile, playing a game of billiards, reclining on the sofas, and helping themselves from the box of couches carried round by the liveried servants. The conversation is, as usual, spicy in its nature, and there is as much scandal talked as though the room were occupied by the opposite sex. Of course, no audience could support a three-act piece entirely without female characters, and hence, in the third act we have a charity bazaar, which is carried on much in the same style as such a fair would be in the United States. The entire stage is made to represent a series of pretty little stalls, adorned with flowers and decorated with ribbons and flags. Behind each of the counters is a charming sales-lady, who stands there to be looked at by the young exquisites who have just dropped in to see what was going on. There, for instance, is a stall where champagne is sold at the low figure of twenty francs a glass. Of course, you take a glass and offer one to the fair seller, who coquettishly points to her groom standing behind her, so that when he has drunk his glass you may lay down your sixty francs and pass on to the macaroon stall. The macaroons cost twenty francs apiece, but when you take a dozen you are entitled to a piece of advice gratuitously. Of course, you take a dozen, and, having paid your twelve napoleons, ask for the counsel. "It is this," gayly replies the saleslady; "I advise you not to eat any of my macaroons, for they are horrid." The salesladies were represented at the Vaudeville by the charming Mlles. Blanche Pierson, Léontine Massin, Bartet, and Jeanne Bernard.

Continuing along the boulevard, we reach, opposite the Café de Madrid, the Théâtre des Variétés, which was opened in 1808 by a company of comedians, who, at the request of the Comédie Française, had to leave the Palais Royal. At that time the most amusing among the actors were Brunet, Potier, Vernet, and subsequently, Odry and Lepeintre. During the Second Empire, Offenbach's operettas—the Belle Helene, Barbe-Bleue, the Grande Duchesse, the Perichole, and the Brigands—were first brought out at the Variétés; and it was there that, represented by actors like Dupuis, Grenier, Baron, Kopp, and Leonce, and by actresses like Hortense Schneider, Aimée, and Berthe Legrand, they achieved that success which afterward accompanied them in their peregrinations throughout Europe, America, Asia, and Africa.

The Variétés still thrives with pieces of a character similar to that of those above mentioned. Its greatest success in 1877 was Meilhac & Halevy's La Cigale, in which Mlle. Céline Chaumont, Baron, Hamburger, Dupuis, and Leonce took the chief parts. Paola Marié, and Mme. Judic, the diva with those magnificent dark eyes, who has recently received such tempting offers from St. Petersburg, are also members of the Variétés troupe. The house, which will comfortably seat some 1,200 spectators, is usually full. The author's dues there are twelve per cent. of the gross receipts.

We now pursue our way along the boulevard, and soon arrive at the Gymnase Théâtre, built on the site of the Cemetery Bonne Nouvelle, and opened in 1820 as a branch of the Comédie Française and of the Opéra Comique, all of whose pieces here played were cut down to one act. It was not long, however, ere Poisson, the manager, entered into a contract with Eugene Scribe, which resulted in the theatre speedily assuming an independent position and entering upon a flourishing career. On the other hand, Scribe was never ashamed to ascribe his own good fortune to the contract in question, and he caused a tablet to be placed over his country residence at Cécourt bearing these words: "Le théâtre a payé cet asile champêtre. Vous qui passez, merci! Je vous le dois peut-être." Owing to the special patronage accorded this theatre by the Duchess de Berry, it was called le Théâtre de Madame. Among its early actresses should be mentioned Leontine Fay, Dejazet, Jenny Vertpré, Jenny Colon, Volnys, and Rachel—who made her first appearance here; while among the actors were Perlet, Dormeuil, Numa, and that admirable comedian Bouffé. At that time the most famous pieces performed were Le Gamin de Paris, La Fille de l'Avare (Eugenie Grandet), Michel Perrin, etc. In 1844 M. Montigny, the present manager, became lessee of this theatre, and subsequently husband of the charming Rose Chéri. It is needless to remark that Alexandre Dumas fils achieved his greatest success here, with Diane de Lys, Le Demi-monde, La Question d'Argent, Le Père Prodiges, and the Princesse Georges, in which that most talented of actresses, the lamented Aimée Desclée, played the chief part. It was at the Gymnase Dramatique that Victorien Sardou's Pattes de Mouche, Ganaches, Vieux Garçons, Nos Bons Villageois, and Fernande were brought out, and there, too, that Frou Frou first met the public gaze. As both Dumas and Sardou have transferred the fruits of their labors to the boards of the Théâtre Français, the Gymnase is left a good deal to live on its old reputation. The greatest success there in 1877 was M. Hennequin's amusing comedy of Bibi. This theatre has a seating capacity of 1,300, and the author's dues there range from twelve to fifteen per cent. of the gross receipts.

Proceeding still further along the boulevards, to the corner of the Boulevard St. Martin and the Rue de Bondy, we reach the Théâtre de la Renaissance, which has been built since the Franco-German war. Mme. Zulina Bouffar and Mlle. Jeanne Granier—two public favorites—there play the chief parts in such pieces as Giroflé-Girofla, La Petite Mariée, La Marjolaine, Le Petit Duc, etc. Jeanne Granier's talent in opera bouffe has been of as much service to Charles Lecoq as Mlle. Schneider's has been to Offenbach.

(CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.)

Joaquin Miller has written a new play, and its name is Mexico—a drama of Mexican and American life and love. The New York Sun says of it: "The heroine is a Mexican lady, the hero is an American soldier, the villain is a Mexican general, and the minor figures are as varied as Mexican character. The scene is laid in Mexico, at the time of the ill-fated Maximilian. Its movement is rapid, its action intense, and its incidents are full of surprise, romance, tragedy, triumph, patriotism, and fire."

Speaking of the dull times, a wicked Mobile man says that a few weeks ago a stranger arrived there and bought a bale of cotton, and a pleasant rumor was at once started that the cotton buyer had arrived, but it only proved to be a Chicago man with the ear-ache.

INTAGLIOS.

Song.

Listen, listen, listen while I sing—
There's mirth, mirth in everything!
In laughing eye's quick glance,
In dashing through a dance,
Mirth does my charmed soul entrance.

Listen, listen, listen while I sing—
There's joy, joy in everything!
In bubbling of fresh streams,
In flashing sunlight beams,
Joy sparkles through my pensive dreams!

Listen, listen, listen while I sing—
There's hope, hope in everything!
In gloom and chill and night,
When lost the guiding light,
Hope rises ever bright!

Listen, listen, listen while I sing—
There's love, love in everything!
If mirth and hope must die,
Still I can upward fly,
Love lifts me to the sky!

THEODORE WINTHROP.

The Prayer of the Fallen.

God of the bright unfallen sun,
That stoops to kiss a wretch like me,
In the whole world there now is none
To whom my soul can turn but Thee.
Though ruined and unclaimed my birth,
Though fallen all my prided charms,
If ruined, 'tis but for the earth;
If fallen, 'tis within Thy arms.

I saw the mountains rise on high
Beneath their burnished crowns of snow;
They rose up glorious, but I
Lay fallen at their feet below.
I saw the brook within its bed,
And on its tide the willow tree;
But when it saw my face it fled
To hide its picture in the sea.

As the "struck eagle" on the plain,
Transfixed upon the death-cold dart,
Looks up at the blue sky again,
That but so lately warmed its heart,
So the spent spirit here below
Years from the dust to One divine;
And oh! how sweet it is to know
That one so lost as I am thine!

REV. S. MILLER HAGEMAN.

Love is Love.

Art is fine—but love is finer.
Who can paint a soul?
Seek'st thou beauty? What's diviner
Fragment or the whole?

Song is sweet—but love is sweeter.
Was there ever hymn
That for compass and for meter
Awe'd the seraphim?

Thought is great—but love is greater.
Who can search out truth?
Love alone is revelator;
Love is love, in sooth.

RICHARD REALF.

Bits of Heine.

How thou snarest, laughest, broodest,
How thou in ill-humor twistest,
When thou, to all love a stranger,
Yet on jealousy existest!

'Tis not red and fragrant roses
Thou dost smell and love so dearly;
No, amongst the thorns thou sniffest,
They scratch thy nose severely.

Shadowy love and shadowy kisses,
Shadowy life, how wondrous strange!
Fool, dost think then that all this is Ever true and free from change?

Like an empty dream hath vanished
All we love with love so deep;
Memory from the heart is banished,
And the eyes are closed in sleep.

Linden blossoms drunk with moonlight
Fly about in fragrant showers,
And the nightingale's sweet music
Fills the air and leafy bowers.

Ah! how sweet it is, my loved one,
'Neath the lindens to be sitting,
When the glimmering golden moonbeams
Through the fragrant leaves are flitting.

Four and twenty hours I still must Wait, to see my bliss complete,
As her sidelong glances tell me—
Glances, oh, how dazzling sweet!

Language is but inexpression,
Words are awkward and in vain;
Soon as they are said, the pretty
Butterfly flies off again.

But a look may last forever,
And with joy may fill the breast,
Making it like some wide heaven,
Full of starry rapture blest.

Lifted Up.

I stood beside my window one stormy winter day,
And watched the light, white snowflakes flutter past;
And I saw, though each one wandered its silent, separate way,
They all sank down upon the ground at last.
"So man must lie down, too," I said, "when life is past."

From out the self-same window, when soft, spring days were come,
I watched the fair white clouds that sailed the blue;
Could those bright, pearly wonders, far up in heaven's high dome,
Be the old, wintry snow-banks that I knew?
"So, man shall one day rise again," I said.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1879.

Regarding the nomination of General Grant by the Republican party as its candidate for the Presidency in 1880 as an almost certain event, it is not too soon to discuss him, his qualifications, his chances for election, and the consequences likely to result therefrom. That General Grant will be nominated is now indicated by the drift of political events; there is no one among the distinguished gentlemen of the Republican organization who is now named in connection with the Presidential office who is at all likely to run successfully the gauntlet of a national convention. Perhaps it would be a stronger form of expression to say "run a muck." Among the Malays a person is seized with a frantic desire to kill everyone he meets. He sets out fully armed, and in his ungovernable rage strikes to the right and left in his indiscriminate desire to murder. Modern politicians are not unlike the Malays—they are treacherous, inconstant to friends, and unforgiving to enemies, revengeful, and greatly addicted to lying. The leading gentlemen of the Republican party are treacherous, unforgiving, revengeful, selfish, and greatly given to lying. It is a melancholy admission, but it is nevertheless true, that of all the leaders in the Republican party who are prominent enough to be considered in connection with the Presidential office, there is no one who would not rather have the party drift to defeat, and the nation drift to the devil, than that his rival should succeed. We look upon Mr. Roscoe Conkling as the fittest person for the Presidential office of all the Republican party leaders. Yet there is a large and (of course) respectable element in New York politics, with Curtis and Harper's Weekly, who would rather the party should be sunk fifty fathoms deep than that Conkling should be its standard-bearer. Mr. Blaine holds the same relation to antagonistic cliques and rings. Party cabals and party feuds exist on every side. Mr. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, would be a fitting nomination for the Republican party to make. His long and honorable career in Congress, his earnest opposition to the railroad and corporation frauds of the Northwest, his unremitting exertions for economy of public expenditures, his patriotism during the war, his early and steadfast friendship for Grant, his splendid services in Paris during the German-French war, would under ordinary circumstances point to him as a Presidential candidate. But the Hon. Elihu B. Washburne is an honest man, and the Republican party convention manipulators do not want an honest man for President. The rank and file of the Republican party is honest; it embraces the integrity, the intelligence, the patriotism, the conscience of the nation; but unfortunately for it, and still more unfortunately for the country, this grand and splendid organization is run by the most unblushing knaves and villains in the world, and is run in their interest. Delegates to a national convention are not delegates of the people, are not sent by the people, and are not intended to represent the people. The system that chooses a delegation is a system of fraud, it is a machine run in the interest of that class of politicians who are politicians for the sake of opportunity to steal.

As at present constituted the Republican party—for all purposes of governing the country—is a party of politicians; the great mass of voters upon whom it relies is a mere mud-sill upon which to raise a superstructure of official corruption. A hundred thousand Republican office-holders represent the party, and in this number the honest, disinterested man is an exception. The National Convention will be composed of men who represent the office-holding class; here and there some quiet, respectable dummy of a saw-dust man will be sent to the Convention, but he and a majority of his associates will be set upon secret wires and springs to be pulled and manipulated by the office-holding interest that has sent him to choose a Presidential candidate. He and his innocence, believing that they have acted independently, honestly, and patriotically. The honest political ass is the thickest-skulled and longest-eared of all his patient, burden-bearing class. The Convention will in no sense be a deliberative one, in which the property and talent of the nation comes together in an honest desire to select for the highest executive office the best man of the Republic; but it will be a clamorous mob of contending factions; warring, jealous cliques; subtle, selfish, personal interests; corporations fighting for a friend of subsidies and contractors; ring members, solicitous of advancing the objects of the ambitious man or the grasping clique to which they are respectively attached, to which they belong by virtue of political birthright, or in the service of which they may be temporarily hired. This Convention, as a rule, will be divided among three or four persons, whom politicians have made prominent for the position. It may go off upon some honest impulse, in which integrity of purpose may be more conspicuous than judgment, as in the nomination of Horace Greeley; or in which money and the promise of plunder may control, as when Tilden was nominated; or in which the special providence of God may prevail, as in Lincoln's first nomination; or in which patriotism and a high sense of duty may control, as—a rare instance—in the case of Lincoln's renomination; in which patriotic enthusiasm may sway, as in Grant's first nomination; or in which organization and party discipline may direct, as in Grant's renomination; or in which availability, compromise, policy, and an overwhelming desire to succeed with "anybody, good Lord," as in the case of Rutherford B. Hayes.

In a convention composed of this kind of material General Grant will be nominated by acclamation. First, it will be necessary to manufacture public opinion for him. For this purpose all the office-holding knaves from Passamaquoddy Bay on the north to the Capes of Florida on the south, around by San Diego to Alaska, and thence across the continent to the place of beginning, will with simultaneous accord shout his praises; they will acclaim his devotion to the country; they will recall his success on battle fields; they will declare him to be the one only true political god, through whom alone there is hope of party salvation; they will assert that he is the only nominee to whom success is possible; and they will maintain with all the sincerity of conviction that without him that most pure, and exalted, and patriotic, and only sane political organization, the Republican party, will go into a four years' eclipse. All of which, being interpreted into plain English, will mean that unless General Grant is nominated every official, from Sherman of the Treasury to Sherman of the Sub-treasury, will be compelled to go out of office. In the direction of manufacturing public opinion the press will play a conspicuous part. All that mercenary and subsidized thing that now draws its support from official patronage will open first, howl loudest, and hang on longest. The next that will fall into line will be the Hessian press hired for the campaign. The next will be the conservative, timid, time-serving, driveling press that desires to be on the respectable side—that writes to retain its circulation and to promote its advertising business. All the officials in office think General Grant would keep them in; all the politicians out of office think General Grant would put them in. These would sound the key-note of the campaign. All who fought in the war and now stand enrolled in the Grand Army of the Republic would enthuse with spontaneous alacrity. All the knaves of the commissary, quartermaster, and pay departments would feel ready sympathy to their comrade in arms, and would look upon a third-term candidacy as but inadequate compensation to one who has served his country side by side with themselves. The Federal ring, the whisky ring, the Indian ring, the Navy ring, the Treasury ring, the National Bank ring, the Internal Revenue ring, the army contract ring, the land ring, the railroad subsidy ring, the pension thieves' ring, the Washington ring, and all the other knavish combinations that thieved and fattened under General Grant's two administrations, would organize as a body guard; they would lead a forlorn hope and perform prodigies of political valor in grateful memory of an administration that gave them such splendid opportunities for plunder, and in the service of a chief who never deserted a friend simply because he robbed the public treasury and plundered the tax-payers of the commonwealth, and who had the magnificent moral courage to never desert a rogue who had been an associate. Following this advance host would come a great army of honest men recalling the past history of the nation, fearing the encroachments of rebel arrogance, timid at the threat of Southern dictatorship, and justly alarmed at the possibility of a Democratic triumph, and would give to General Grant their earnest support. The wealth of the nation, justly alarmed at the growing heresies of the Commune, fearing that ultimate disorder may come from the Socialists, and that agrarianism may take a more earnest and effective shape than even party politics, would array itself with the official plunderers, call themselves conservatives, and think they were acting in the best possible way to protect their property from seizure and distribution, from taxation and confiscation.

There will be an opposition to the nomination of General Grant, and to his election in event of nomination, that will come from the heart, the brains, and the conscience of his own party. There will be a great, intelligent, earnest minority that wants no office, that can not be seduced by any party promises, or awed by any party threats, which will protest against the third time elevation to the Presidency as a danger which republican government can not dare, and might not survive. There will be thoughtful, brave men who will boldly declare their condemnation of that Southern policy which for twelve years after the war gave to the South for its humiliation and political subjugation two standing armies: one of soldiers with bayonets, and one of party politicians with carpet-sacks. There will be the men who revolted against General Grant's second nomination, and in the hope of conciliation, and the desire of bridging the great, yawning social gulf that divided races and sections and kept alive local and class hatreds, gave their support to Horace Greeley. There will be Republicans with memories who will not forget the audacity of ring plunderers during the second Grant term, and that they were shielded, protected, and pardoned by him. There will be a great, earnest mass of the rank and file of the Republican party who, in contrasting the possible dangers to republican government with the possible consequences of a Democratic administration, will not hesitate to withdraw themselves from the conspiracy that would offer to General Grant the crown of a third term. There are those who think the third term the first step to an usurpation of political power, the first step that republicanism takes toward imperialism; that it would be an act tending to destroy a tradition that has all the force of a law; that it would place wealth and property above the consideration of personal rights; that the tendency would be to a government of armies and bayonets, and of the military above the civil jurisdiction. There are those—and they are cool-headed, well balanced Northern men—who think the first act of President Grant would be an armed invasion of the South, under pretext of a desire to protect the political rights of black men against the encroachments of white men; and there are at the North and in the Republican party men who think the political and social relations between intelligence and ignorance, between prosperity and nothing, can be regulated without the interference of Federal bayonets or Northern politicians. Such men will protest, and write, and speak, and vote against General Grant becoming a third time President of the United States.

The Democracy is anxious that General Grant should be the Republican candidate for President, and it is right. Democrats say, and not without force, that if they can not beat Grant they can not beat anybody. It is our judgment that Mr. Samuel Tilden's chances of a nomination are not as hopeless as some people are disposed to think. It seems to us that he has conquered the political organization in New York and now holds the fort against Tammany, and that by virtue of his position and the accident of his defeat he may prove a formidable candidate at the next Democratic National Convention. It seems to us that Mr. Thurman, of Ohio, or Hendricks, of Indiana, ought to have a very strong following, and that it should not be regarded as a mistake if either of these party chiefs should be chosen for leader. To us Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, has always seemed to be, if not a great statesman, at least a man of clean and honorable record, whose career in the past would give promise of usefulness in a higher station. A contest between any one of these distinguished gentlemen and General Grant would, in our judgment, give to the Democracy a national victory—would give to either of them the electoral vote of California. We speak of our own State with some confidence, claiming to know the temper of its people and the character of the politicians whom it has been the policy of General Grant and the stupidity of his weak and nerveless successor to appoint and keep in office upon this coast. In event that the officials, camp-followers, knaves, and party bandits of the Republican organization do not succeed in controlling the National Convention, and that the party shall choose from its statesmen some broad-minded and honest gentleman to be its Presidential candidate, we shall with great pleasure deposit for him our one vote in the electoral urn and advise our friends to follow our example.

It is, and for a long time has been, understood between Kearney and ourselves that in exchange for our telling the truth about him in the ARGONAUT he should lie about us on the sand-lot. This arrangement has proved mutually agreeable; it has strengthened him with the loafers, and ourselves with gentlemen. His last Sunday's attack upon our mule was an unnatural assault upon his own kin. However, as the mule was out of the reach of Kearney's tongue, and Kearney out of the reach of the mule's heels, they were neither of them seriously injured. We will arrange for a more equal combat if Kearney will permit us to tie the mule upon the speaker's stand beside Kearney, Wellock, Beerstretch, and the rest of "them asses" who gather around their long-eared leader on Sunday.

The newspapers are telling of a patriot who walked ninety miles to vote. If every man had to do it, there would not be so many votes cast on the wrong side. But there would be about the same proportion.

AFTERMATH.

An admiring subscriber, a loyal man and an old Republican, asks us, somewhat complainingly, what has President Hayes done, or what has he left undone, that justifies the ARGONAUT in speaking so disparagingly of him? We answer that if for no other reason than his contemptuous silence upon the Chinese question, and the utter indifference with which he treats this subject, we have the right to pronounce him a political idiot of the most abnormal kind. Whether Chinese immigration is desirable or not, whether it ought to be encouraged or discouraged, whether it is calculated to promote or imperil the progress of this State, to advantageously or disadvantageously affect property, labor, morals, or Christian civilization, it has a right to be considered by the President of the United States in an official communication to Congress pretending to consider important political questions. Whatever may be the opinions of Mr. or Mrs. Hayes upon this subject, or whatever views may be held by the particular preacher whose church they attend, or of the social circle that drinks lemonade at the White House, it is apparent that the people of the Pacific Coast have pronounced themselves as adverse to Chinese immigration. Their opinions have a right to be considered, if not respected; their petition has a right to be heard, if not granted. It is the deliberate and premeditated insult of a small mind to a great and respectable minority of the American people that this accidental incumbent of the Presidential office thus ignores a question we all deem important.

Three Legislatures, some half dozen State conventions of both political parties, the entire press of the State, the best talent of all professions, a Constitutional Convention with almost perfect unanimity, have expressed an honest sentiment upon this Chinese question. A new and dangerous political party is growing up upon this grievance—one that threatens the tranquillity of our city, the safety of our persons, and the value of our property. We write, petition, resolve, send delegates to Washington, Representatives to Congress, asking that this matter be considered, and there comes to us a contemptible, drawling message about the rights of niggers, and cruelty to dogs and calves. Every trifling topic is considered the echo of whose clamor disturbs the serenity of officials at Washington; but this question which we of the Pacific declare to be one of national importance, affecting our material, moral, and political condition, is passed in contemptuous, studied, and insolent indifference by a Chief Magistrate who delights to attend clam bakes, make speeches at country cattle fairs, and go junketing, hand-shaking, and nose-tickling over the country. We speak of the President not as a magistrate whom we delight to honor, but as an unfaithful and incompetent servant, whom we would desire to discharge.

Every early San Franciscan will remember Josh Haven. He was the smartest man, and the best fellow, and the most popular of all our ancient beaux. He knew everybody and everybody knew him. He was popular with the ladies, and never allowed a New Year's day to pass without calling on all his lady friends. On one occasion, getting himself up with more than his accustomed elegance—carriage and pair, driver, and ducky footman—he started for a social day. As he left his house he told his black boy Jim to go to his room and bring a pack of visiting cards. He spent a diligent day in calling, and, where the ladies were not receiving, leaving his cards. At night, as he was bringing his visits to a close, he asked Jim if he had any more cards. Jim said: "Yes, Mr. Joshua, jest one—the Jack of Clubs." Josh then ascertained that he had distributed fifty-one pasteboards of a full deck of playing cards. "All right, Jim," said he, "drive to the Oriental Hotel and leave that with Lieutenant Derby (John Phoenix), with my compliments."

It is a common ambition for the American traveling abroad to be taken for an Englishman. Our friend George Ensign went to Europe. In London he had his beard cut, leaving mutton-chop whiskers; he ordered from his tailor a suit of clothes, English in fabric and style; he bought a shirt, shoes, necktie, and a small cane of English pattern; he fancied himself a genuine cockney, at least in make-up. He practiced speaking with hot pudding in his mouth; he learned to stammer, to say "ah," "blost it," "beg pardon," "cä-ä-nt," and other elegancies of expression peculiar to the high-born, well-bred, and accomplished Englishman. Thus fully equipped he left his hotel to air his new nationality in the streets of London. As he struck the sidewalk he was accosted by a young bootblack: "I say, old Frenchy, will you have a shine?" Fancy his feelings!

In the very able speech made by Senator Blaine recently in the Senate of the United States he "argued that the practical exclusion of the colored voters from the polls, as alleged, gives every Southern white man more than twice the power in the National Government that is enjoyed by a white man at the North, and this position he fortified by copious illustrations. The real issue, as he insisted, is not one of mere sentiment for the rights of the negro, nor one that involves what is termed the waving of the bloody shirt.

It is whether the white voter of the North shall be equal in political power to the white voter of the South; whether 'in levying every tax, making every appropriation of money, in fixing every line of public policy, in decreeing what shall be the fate and fortune of the Republic, the Confederate soldier South shall be enabled to cast a vote that is twice as powerful and twice as influential as the vote of the Union soldier North.'" There is a great deal of force in this suggestion, and it illustrates the great mistake made by the Republicans in giving the ballot to the blacks and allowing them to be enumerated in forming the basis of Congressional representation. If they had been treated as untaxed Indians the South would have had less power, and the negro question would be out of politics.

The newspapers of this country are complaining that malfeasance in office is seldom punished. Investigations are held, corruption is exposed, officials are censured, and preventive legislation recommended. But nobody is prosecuted, and things go on exactly as before. But it does not occur to the newspapers that they are themselves to blame for this. The press has convinced itself and the people that its own thunder and lightning are sufficient to purify the official atmosphere, that fear of exposure will make most men honest in the discharge of public duty, and that actual exposure is an adequate punishment for those who are not. This is a grave mistake; if the press wants to do the most good it can, let it understand, and make others understand, that its disclosures of guilt are of little use if not acted on by the officers of the law. Publicity is not an end, it is a means. Publicity will no more extirpate crime than a torch-light will spear fish or sunrise breach a bastion.

A public writer finds a certain natural satisfaction, doubtless, in contemplating himself as a war-painted moral campaigner whose red right arm delivers dreadful blows at crime. The similitude is more apparent than real; he only points out where dreadful blows may be advantageously delivered. His function is that of the shrill poodle of the hall door-mat, whose yapping may alarm the house, but it is the old man who must turn out with an axe-handle to repel the thief.

Our esteemed contributor, Mr. J. W. Gally, writes us as follows: "In your Xmas issue you publish 'Seven Famous Sonnets.' I herewith enclose you the eighth. I do not ask any pay for it, because it is priceless; I am satisfied with the glory. I call it 'The Great California Sonnet'; you can call it something else if you want to. If you publish it without hope of reward, I will make you Commissioner of Deeds for the State of Rhode Island when I am Governor of California. Here it is; it is no imitation. It smells of the soil. It could not have been written prior to '849 or the spring of '50. If it smells too much of the soil you can divide it into small lots—like a big ranch. I'm no land grabber.

"Maybe you think, perhaps, because that I Am no great poet I can't write a sonnet
Without I pluck some other's plume and don it;
But there are birds which can both swim and fly;
The one as well as t'other, and—I'm on it (Like Burns's beast upon the lady's bonnet).
Why should not I with windy wisdom sigh,
And like a frenzied poet roll my eye,
And spoil a page by writing Songs of Me—
Who's holding me? I will arise supreme,
Like some grand figure from a silent sea,
And shout "Houp la!" until the echoes scream
From wave to wave, and landward o'er the lea,
And I have ground my sonnet from the theme."

Our publication of the "Seven Famous Sonnets" has had the desired effect of firing the heart of our local poets with emulation all round. A gentleman who modestly conceals his identity under the alias of "Omnium Gatherum" is also to the fore, with the following: "In re the sonnet business, herewith, etc.

"Within her sea-girl house the Siren dwells,
And lures the spell-bound sailor with her lay;
Amid the shoals the fated bark compels,
Or holds upon the reef a willing prey.
None ever 'scape her toils, while sinks and swells
Her rhythmic chant at close and break of day;
Thou, maiden, art the siren of the sea,
Who with thy songs doth hold and fetter me,

What under the sun the foregoing has to do with "the sonnet business" we cannot imagine. We had supposed that even the basest bard knew that a sonnet must have fourteen lines (few of our local singers, we believe, are aware that it must have anything else), but this, it seems, was a mistake. It is unpleasantly clear that this journal has always overrated the intelligence of the poets, but we promise that it shall not occur again. If the maiden whom "Omnium Gatherum" addresses finds herself unable to "hold and tether" him, as requested, we shall be happy to assist her with a bull-dog and chain cable.

An indignant citizen, well dressed, and evidently a gentleman, very angry, very red in the face, and with a deep, resentful, wicked oath just under his moustache, impatient at restraint, and anxious for utterance, came bounding hastily into our office. We thought of the enraged fiddler, and a momentary fear came over us lest he might go away and say he had thrashed us. He was a non-resident property-owner in Oakland; in his hand he had a bunch of tax bills—for State, county, city, general sewer, special sewer, and library.

He laid one before us with profane emphasis. "See how the dam municipal thieves steal! One cottage house, rent $12 a month, valued at $1,550, lot sixty feet front; for the sake of advertising it is divided into three lots and one dollar charged for each, blast the infernal thieving newspapers." He meant, of course, the dailies. "Five per cent. for being delinquent; a bill of $16 amounts to $21.06. And here is another for sewer: a bill of $1.41 has $3 added for advertising; State and County tax, $14—total, $39.47. I tell you the whole business is iniquitous. The officials are thieves and knaves, and the citizens who own property in Oakland are fools and idiots to submit to any such infernal nonsense!"

We tried to put in a word; we endeavored to modify his anger; we told him there were some very respectable people that lived in Oakland; that the best evidence that the city of the Oaks possessed a highly intelligent, civilized, and cultured population was the fact of the large circulation of the ARGONAUT. He left us talking about its schools and churches, its excellent society. The last we heard of him, as he went muttering down the stairs, was "Dam Oakland!" The bills are on our desk, and if any one thinks that the tax system of our trundle-bed sister across the bay does not need reformation let his just call at this office, and we will exhibit a tax receipt for $1.41 with $3 added for advertising, signed by J. R. Cutting, Marshall, and ex-officio Tax Collector.

Col. Forney's new journal, Progress, is, in one respect, un happily named; it seems ambitious to represent a stage of intellectual development that belongs rather to the past than the future of American journalism—a stage that we may best describe as the "British gold" era. The newspaper of our fathers had a way of attributing every social or political movement with which it could not agree to the influence of "British gold." It was "British gold" that sustained slavery (and abolition); "British gold" that secured the election of every Presidential candidate, and that failed to secure that of his opponent; "British gold" that dictated all the decisions of the Supreme Court, all the legislation of Congress, the adoption of certain text-books in schools. The function of that insidious metal is now narrowed to the breaking down of protective tariffs, the sustentation of the national banks, and the demonetization of silver. But Col. Forney will have it that it is keeping down the ceramic art in Philadelphia—that the "cracking and blistering" of American china and porcelain in the kilns is caused by the unfaithfulness of the workmen, "bribed to impede success by interested parties in England."

As Miss Killmansegg's golden leg goes stumping through Hood's famous poem with an audible tread like that of the statue of the Commandante in Don Giovanni, so does the dreadful spectre of "British gold" possess and terrify the dark places of the American politician's imagination. We hope the bogey will be laid some day, but Colonel Forney's venture is clearly an essay at conjuring it into new and ghastly life.

"I hope, Brown, the story is untrue that you fought a duel over at Saucelito in '52." "Well, I did fight a duel, that's a fact; but feeling that I was in the wrong, I fired in the air." "Ah, then you are at least guiltless of a fellow man's blood." "Not quite that, either, I fear. You see I fired in the air that was between my pistol and the left lobe of the fellow man's liver."

We headed a column of chat about women "The Opposing Sex," and now our good friend the Boston Courier is puzzled to know what we meant by it. No disrespect, certainly; we were simply fatigued of the hackneyed phrase, "the opposite sex," and thought we saw in the word "opposing" a happy compromise between tradition and innovation. For a like reason we had previously used for a heading to the same column the words, "Our Bitter Halves," the word "better," in this connection, having become trite and tiresome. If in seeking emancipation from the bonds of custom we have unfortunately given offense to anybody's chivalric sensibilities we are just every bit as infernally sorry as we can manage to be.

At the top of the companion-way on the San Rafael ferry-boat is a large plate glass mirror by which the ladies arrange their eyes and adjust their expression when ascending to the upper saloon. During the first trip to the city on Thursday morning last this glass was suddenly starred and shattered into a thousand jingling fragments, to the unspeakable terror of the passengers. Inquiry and investigation failed to reveal the cause, but a young man and a young woman who had sat on opposite sides of the saloon, with a mast directly between, preserved a significant silence. The truth is that these ardent creatures, in their spirited endeavor to "mash" one another's image in the glass, had mashed the glass.

A St. Louis journal has touched bottom in the filthy pit of newspaper degradation by boasting in its columns that an actress whom it "interviewed" was delighted with its reporter's refined air and fashionable clothes. If the press of this country desires to go any lower than that (and we steadfastly believe that it does) it will have to mole it through the living rock.

DARK MEMORIES.

The sun was setting at the close of a summer day, as long ago as the year 1579, and his last rays, creeping slowly upward over cliff and highland, glittered for a moment upon the steel corselet and burnished weapons of a man standing on the summit of a lofty promontory jutting out into what is now called Sir Francis Drake's Bay. He was yet in the earliest prime of life; and his form, though not especially tall, seemed a very marvel of muscular strength and vigor, while his stern and resolute face, naturally dark, had been rendered still more so by long exposure to the scorching sun of Southern climes. His arms and dress were those usual with persons of some rank at that period. Below him in the bay, a small vessel, whose stained timbers and mended rigging told of a long and rough voyage, lay at anchor, her patched canvas hanging loosely from the yards, while above fluttered a tattered remnant of what had once been the ensign of St. George. Battered and unlovely as she seemed, there was yet in the eyes of her commander—for such was the personage already mentioned—an expression of pride and satisfaction as he surveyed her, and a proud smile curved his lips as he muttered:

"Brave bark! thou hast borne me far, and I ween thy storm-tried timbers and faded sails are yet staunch enow to win fair England's shores. God knows whatever of renown in future years may brighten the name of Francis Drake will have owed its birth to thee. Parting from hence to-morrow morn, an the wind fail us not thou wilt bear me back to the feet—yea! and please Fortune, to the smiles and favor—of good Queen Bess!"

The last words had but left his lips when the sound of cautiously approaching footsteps caused him to turn suddenly; whereupon he found himself confronting, and but a few paces distant from, a tall, roughly clad youth of eighteen or nineteen years, whose rolling eyes and dark skin were sufficient—notwithstanding the general regularity of his features—to betray the presence of African blood in his veins. In his right hand the youth carried a heavy machete, and the sight of this weapon, together with the suspicious stealthiness of his approach, caused Drake, almost involuntarily it is true, to lay his hand upon the butt of one of the enormous pistols in his belt; but the next instant, recognizing in the intruder one of his own ship's company, he relinquished his purpose, coldly smiled as if in scorn of his own nervousness, and demanded, briefly:

"Why here, Carino?"

The boy hesitated, and for a moment stood silent with downcast eyes, nervously fingering the bare edge of his murderous weapon. At length he said, abruptly:

"Señor Capitan, the boat waits."

"Return to it then; I will follow."

Carino bowed and walked slowly and half-reluctantly away, while Drake, in whose eyes an expression of suspicion and distrust yet lingered, watched him intently until an intervening rock rendered further gazing useless; whereupon, gloomily shaking his head, he muttered:

"It seemeth folly to suspect, and yet I may not trust him. But how can he know? He breathes no word of doubt; he thinks her buried in the far-off southern sea, and her death her own mad deed. Yet, an mine eyes deceive me not, his own gleamed dark with murderous hate and vengeance. Carino, heed thyself; I wish thee well, but cross not my path as did that other of thy race. Alas for thee, Mirania! God knows thou wert one time dear to me, but dearer still my soul's ambition. Thou weariedst me with thy repentance, and, living, would have shamed me. Ah, well, thou sleepest now."

He drew his hand hastily across his forehead, as if to drive away the thoughts that gathered there, and then folding his cloak more closely about him, strode away. * * * *

It was midnight, moonless, yet lovely and serene. There were no clouds in the sky, and the mild breeze that had blown during the afternoon had now almost entirely died away. The water rippled gently about the sides of the vessel, and its murmur fell with a soothing and lulling influence upon the ear. Upon the ship all was silence. A few motionless forms, sitting or reclining in various easy and half-somnolent attitudes, were visible upon the after deck. Forward there was no sign of life save the mantled figure of a man leaning idly over the bulwarks. It was Drake himself. He had sought slumber that night in vain. Oppressed by a nameless foreboding, such as his stern and dauntless heart was but little accustomed to, he had been forced to leave his couch an hour before midnight, and go on deck in the hope of relief. Desiring to be alone he had sent the watch to the after part of the deck, and now, sheltered from their gaze by an unreefed and low-drooping sail, he stood silently thinking. He heard no sound, he saw not the lithe, dark figure—dark save where the faint light dimly glittered on the unsheathed steel—that had glided noiselessly across the deck and now stood just behind him, and knew not the peril of the moment till a hand fell upon his shoulder. He turned instantly, and a low exclamation escaped him:

"Carino!"

The answer came lower still, but thrilling as the hiss of a serpent:

"Speak but one word above a whisper, move thy hand—and thou diest!"

And the fire of a deadly and determined purpose burned in those glaring eyes. The foreboding was past, the peril was present, and the soul of the fearless mariner leaped to meet it. His eyes endured unflinchingly the gaze of hatred which the other bent upon him, and his voice never trembled as he answered:

"Thou darrest to threaten me, then? Well, let that pass. What wouldst thou have?"

"Thy heart's best blood. But first—an thy tongue dare speak it—the truth; how did my sister?"

"I know not."

"Thou knowest not? Then why, waking that morning, was I told that the waves swept over her? Wretch, thine own false tongue betrays thee."

"Carino, I heed thee not, nor do I fear thee. God's grace! I have stood in scenes of peril enow ere this to teach me courage. I say again, I know not how she died."

"Aye, 'tis true, God only knows what death was hers. But thou—thou shalt take thine from my hand, and now."

The blade was already upraised, and had that weapon fallen it surely had ended the life of England's prince of mariners. But the rage of the youth had blinded him, and he saw not the dangling rope that swung idly to and fro above him until the descending steel was arrested, and, such was the force of the blow, torn from his hand, and whirled over the bulwarks into the bay. Uttering a scream of demoniacal rage that brought every man on the ship hurriedly to the spot, he closed with his intended victim in a fierce and raging struggle for the sword but that instant drawn. Not till more than one pike and cutlass had planted deep and deadly wounds upon his body did the maddened boy relinquish his attempt; then, tearing himself free from the grasp of his adversary and bursting desperately through the circle of his foes, he leaped upon the bulwarks. There for an instant he paused, and in that instant Drake exclaimed:

"Madman, hold! Yield, Carino, yield, and take my pardon!"

But a terrible malediction was Carino's reply as he flung himself into the bay, and the blood-dyed water closed above him. And when the morning broke, he upon whom he would have avenged the wrongs of the lone castaway,* dying upon that barren southern shore, sailed over his grave on his way to knighthood and the favor of England's Virgin Queen.

GEORGE HOMER MEYER.

* See Abbott's Queen Elizabeth.

MARK HAVERLY.

A Man with Good Leather in Him.

He was an engineer working in the Belcher. He was noted for his grit, attention to business, and superstitions. One day a comrade was passing, and Mark called him up with:

"Jack, do you hear that noise—a sort of grinding sound that comes and goes? Hark! can't you hear it now?"

"It's just like any machinery makes."

"No, no, Jack; it don't belong to the machinery; it's a voice, I tell you, from the other world. I've heard that sound for two days now, and it means death, death close at hand, and no power on earth can stave it off."

"Oil the engine a little, old boy, and it'll be all right."

The other passed on and went down the shaft. Mark, meanwhile, bent his ear to the machinery, and out of the indistinguishable din of a dozen sounds caught this strange noise which had such an influence upon him, heard it constantly above the clank of levers, the roar of wheels, and the hiss of steam. Presently a bell sounded at his side. It was the signal from the 2,000 level to hoist the cage. He pressed the lever, and the great reel began to whirl the cable from the lower depths. His eye followed the long finger of the indicator as it slowly pointed out the stations passed. The cage had almost reached the top when the horrible grinding noise, like a moan from the grave, came from the machinery at his side. The sound made his veins melt. He turned his head toward the spot shuddering, while his hand as it clasped the lever was like a child's. The cage shot up from the shaft's mouth; he grasped the lever and threw his weight upon the brake. Too late; the cage rushed into the "sheaves."

The floor of the cage became vertical as it struck the wheel. The cable stretched under the fearful strain, and then snapped like a thread, and the cage fell back to the shaft's mouth. Three of its occupants had leaped upon the timbers and hung suspended; the other two had made the same leap, but their fingers slipped from the slimy timbers made so by the long contact with the vapors from the mine, and they fell one after the other headlong down the shaft.

Meanwhile Mark had stopped his engine, resumed his coat, and staggered out of the works. On such occasions an engineer is considered discharged without notice. He actually ceases to be in the employ of the company when the cage strikes the "sheaves," and such an accident makes his discharge perpetual with every mine on the Comstock.

For the next week or two he wandered about the town like a man barely in his senses. He finally got work underground, but was oftener found somewhere about the hoisting works, near the machinery. He would at times sit for hours watching the work of those metallic giants, occasionally turning toward the mouth of the shaft with a shudder, and again bending his head to catch what he called the "death moan." His comrades said he was "a little off."

One day the writer entered into a conversation with him. His superstition had not left him. "I tell you," said he, "I've studied everything about a mine, above ground and below. You brutes who write for the press take a sneering view of everything. You laugh when I say an engine gives warning of death. You call this piece of machinery a thing inanimate. I tell you that it has a construction in all respects like a man. It has lungs and sinews, and a big heart that throbs and pulsates. It has its fatigues from overwork. At times it whirls merrily, and work seems nothing; then it groans and labors as if exhausted. We treat it as we do the sick. When its lungs get clogged with 'scale' we feed it a composition that makes it well again. It has a voice always, and roars, sings, groans, laughs, and sobs in turn. When I touch a lever I feel a magnetism such as flows from flesh and blood."

"The dark levels below us are full of mysteries. I learn more and more of its secrets every year. You remember how Jack Henly died. He fainted on the Ophir cage, and went down the shaft. A few days before I noticed as I worked beside him how the flame of his candle pointed directly toward him like a mariner's needle. Wherever he moved the flame followed. He didn't notice it, but I did, and it had a wavy, uncertain motion for a day or so. One day it became steady, as steady as if carved in stone. I knew the crisis was not far off. We came up on the cage; as we passed the first station the flame burned low, and at the twelve-fifty station it was almost gone. Suddenly it went out; Jack reeled back against the timbers, and was twisted under the cage at once. It was but a moment. I heard his dreadful cry ring out as his bones were crushed between the shaft floor and the timbers, and his body shot down the shaft."

"Hawkins, who used to work for Joe Cowan, had the same kind of a warning. Wherever he worked a shadow kept close to him on the rock. His lantern made one shadow but this was a deeper and darker one, and had separate motions, and it seemed to get blacker every shift he worked till a blast tore away his chest. I have seen a man's light blow out, and, in a sort of will-o'-the-wisp, keep right over his head. Such a man had better leave the mines at once."

"When I worked in the Savage I used to see a shift of spectres working, most generally at the foot of the incline, but sometimes in the east drift of the 1750. There was about half a dozen of 'em at work as a rule, but sometimes more. They would pick away in the face of the drift and make no sound, and pale lights burned at their sides. When the five-o'clock whistle blew in the morning they would vanish."

"Once I saw a man sitting down on the steps of the incline; he was in my way, and I touched him on the shoulder. Heavens! how I sprang back; for there was no flesh and bones there—only a shadow as it were. He turned round, and his face was half gone and his shoulder torn away, from a blast. Blood was streaming from the wounds. He then walked down the incline, and melted into the vapors that rise from the waters of the sump. The next day John Owens slipped at that very spot, and, unable to hold on to the slimy timbers, fell into the boiling water. He was cooked like a lobster."

"At times one hears strange voices. Ghostly voices call to each other from drift to drift; there are whisperings in the rocks, and terrible groans in the sides of the cross-cuts. In the Belcher I once heard a fearful shriek come from the winze. It echoed from drift to drift, and startled everybody. I rushed to where the sound was, but there was nothing. Bill Sharon don't dare to go down the Yellow Jacket. The last time he did a troop of miners sheeted in flame followed him along the drifts to the foot of the shaft. He rushed to the cage like a madman, and rang for the quick-hoist. When the cage reached the top he lay on the floor insensible. He never told what it was; but I know."

Thus the poor fellow would spend hours telling of the mysterious sights and sounds he had encountered in the depths of the great lode. Sometimes he worked underground, but he always seemed discontented, even morose, because it was no longer permitted to him to grasp the lever of an engine. He felt a stain upon his reputation, and looked hopefully forward to the time when he could wipe it out.

The opportunity came. One night he came into the South Consolidated works and sat watching the machinery. Suddenly he turned to the engineer and said: "I hear the death-moan on the wheels, Tom."

Had the engineer looked at Mark's face, masked in a horrible pallor, he would have indeed thought the man had heard a sob from the grave. Mark bent his head a little lower and waited. Out of the roar, and rumble he heard only the "death-moan," as he called it. Suddenly the bell rang out so quick and sharp that both men were startled. It was the signal of danger and the quick hoist. The wheel began to whirl until the spokes mingled in a maze. A moment later, a puff of smoke drifted from the shaft's mouth, and then a shower of sparks. The mine was on fire.

The cage came whizzing to the surface, and a crowd of half-naked men reeled off, blistered and half-suffocated, into the dressing-rooms. The whistle of the mine sent forth a cry for help, and, in a few seconds more, other whistles took up the cry and bellowed forth their hoarse notes, from the North Consolidated to the Belcher. Scarcely was the cage emptied when those below signaled sharply for it to come down. It shot back into the depths almost as fast as if it had been dropped. The cable touched a piece of iron near the sheaves, and from the point of contact streamed a line of sparks. Another burst of smoke came up the shaft, and a sheet of flame followed for an instant. The timbers became a mass of fire. The hoisting works went like a tinder-box.

The engineer must not only bring the cage to the surface, but must stop it there. The machinery was growing hot to the touch. The cage reached the bottom, and then came the signal to hoist. Just as he reversed the lever a falling timber knocked him senseless at his post.

A dozen men sprang to the unmanned engine; but Mark was there first, and, picking up the body at his feet, he banded it to the nearest two men as if it had been a child, and merely said, "Take him away."

A man close at his side leaned forward to grasp the lever, but he flung him back into the crowd. A flare of flames sent them all staggering away. Mark laid his hand upon the lever—the first time in five years—and grasped it with his old energy. The breath of hell was in his face. It would be a long minute and a half before the cage reached the surface, where he must prevent its dreadful ascent into the "sheaves." His hand held the lives of a dozen men. He faced the fire like a salamander. A prolonged cheer went up, and then the folds of red smoke covered him from sight.

The cage reached the shaft's mouth full of men, most of them insensible as they were dragged out. As Mark threw the lever back to its place and stopped the engine the flames closed about him. The Superintendent called out:

"One thousand dollars to the man who saves him!"

A dozen brave men had already started. It was too late; the flames had overwhelmed him. Three days later the men whose lives he had saved dug among the ruins. Lying by the engine they found his charred remains, and stood by them a while with uncovered heads. They bore away the remains of Mark Haverly in a box, and the next day three thousand mourners walked behind the coffin. As they pressed down the earth over his grave, and threw the last sprig of green down upon it, one of the pall-bearers remarked: "There was good leather in that man."

SAM DAVIS.

End of a conversation between two friends: "Ernest? Don't talk to me about Ernest; he is a Communist." "Pardon me, my friend, I admit that he is a Democrat, Radical, Atheist, and anything else you may choose to call him, but there is a very broad chasm between him and Communism." "And how do you know it?" "His income amounts to over $40,000 a year."

"Dovey," he said, "I think I was telling you, after I came home last night, about the necessity of some retrenchment on our expenditures, was I not?" "Well, really, I've forgotten, John," she answered, nonchalantly; "turn on the phonograph and see." He turned it on, and all it said was, "Whizzer mazzar—(hic)—mazzar? Whizzer mazzar?"

A HASH OF THINGS.

We receive too many poems on Tojetti's picture of "Ophelia." In truth, we receive too many poems on every notable painting exhibited in this city, though nine out of ten of them—the poems—are creditable performances, considering the hard conditions of their production. For it is evident that their writers have at least two difficulties to overcome: First, they know nothing of art; second, they know nothing of poetry.

When people swear "by Jingo," they have, as a rule, an imperfect knowledge of whose name they are taking in vain. St. Jingo, otherwise St. Gengulphus, is the subject of one of Barham's delightful Ingoldsby Legends, telling how the saint was massacred on his return from the Holy Land by his faithless wife and her paramour, as Agamemnon was done to death by Egesthus and Clytemnestra. Greenacre-wise, they cut up the dead saint, but were brought to grief by the miraculous coming together of the disiecta membra at the dinner-table of the Prince-bishop. St. Jingo, or Gengulphus, was by no means an inferior or merely local saint, like St. Jo se and many others; for is not the village of St. Gengolph on the southern shore of the lake of Geneva, to the east of Meillerie and opposite Clarens, called after him to this day?

It appears that La Grand Duchesse, being a very clever saïre upon the diminutive magnificence of the small German Duchies, has not been allowed to be performed in Paris since the affectionate rapprochement between Germany and France took place subsequent to the imbroglio of 1870. But this restriction has just been removed, and great preparations are being made for the production on a grand scale of Offenbach's popular work. Of course Mlle. Aimée looked upon herself as already engaged for the leading part; and her mortification is extreme when she learns that Offenbach has himself (says a European journal) written a letter in which he altogether ignores her pretensions, and quietly declares that "the composer does not hesitate for an instant to confide to Mlle. Paola Marié the superb rôle of the 'Grande Duchesse.'" "If, as I hope," concludes the writer, "my collaborateurs share my appreciation, I am convinced that the public will ratify our choice to the echo." Mlle. Aimée is so angry at this that she is coming to America, although she has already taken a series of opera bouffe "farewells" of this country.

It is known that divorce does not exist in France. The nearest thing to it is the separation de corps, equivalent to the English judicial separation. It is, therefore, interesting to know how the French fare under that regime. From 1846 to 1850 the average separations was 1080. This gradually increased until 1876, when the number was 3251, or exactly three times the number in thirty years. Strange to say, only fourteen in every hundred are asked for by the husband, the wife thus having eighty-six per cent. to her credit. Is this to be attributed to the jealousy of the fair sex, or the indifference of the sterner.

A writer in the London Truth calls attention to the charms of Sicily too much neglected by travelers. Sicily gratifies every taste: Greeks, Romans, Saracens, Normans, Spaniards, have all left their traces of one kind or other. Not only is there the beauty of meads and valleys, its gentle landscapes, but there is also a foreshadowing of the palmy and massive foliage of the East. All tastes will be gratified, whether they take the form of stupendous ruins, green vineyards, or fragrant orange-groves. How different might have been the life of Byron had he set up his tent in Sicily instead of Venice! No human being could long be bitter in nature or bard of heart in such genial scenes. Bellini was once asked "where, young as he was when he composed the 'Pirata,' he had found the impassioned phrases of tenderness in which its music abounds," he replied: "Under my father's roof in Sicily, from whence, though nestled in a green and smiling landscape, we discerned afar off the burning shores of Africa." What could not Byron have extracted from such a land, for, as a gifted writer has remarked: "Sicily is a volume of romance containing twenty centuries. There every dead language has its echo, every forgotten creed its altar."

The most despised rank of the British aristocracy is the baronetcy, the lowest hereditary dignity. When George IV. went to Ireland, he said graciously to the future Lord Talbot de Malahide, "I intend to make you a baronet." "Sire," was the reply, "may I respectfully ask that the sentence may be graciously commuted to knighthood, for my son at least has done no wrong?"

Whenever our Californian vineyards shall have begun to succumb to the ravages of the Phylloxera we ought to have "an anchor out to windward." The Spanish, not usually enterprising, have determined to take time by the forelock, and to have something to fall back upon in case the insect should attack the vines of the Peninsula, until now free from that plague. If they can not supply us with sherry and alicante, they mean to furnish our tables with orange-wine. It is, indeed, an invention of our childhood that they have taken up and developed. Where is the child who has not made orange-wine by squeezing the juice of the luscious fruit and mixing it with sugar? News comes from Valencia that the first wine made from oranges has appeared in the markets there, and it is described as an agreeable sweet wine with a slight acidulated flavor; of a fine bright color, and containing about fifteen per cent. of pure alcohol. It is of four kinds—the "Imperial" and the "Dry," made in January with ripe fruit, the "Mandarin," made from fruit gathered in April, and lastly the "Sparkling," which undergoes a process similar to champagne and moselle. Now if we should compete with the Spanish in this matter we should probably beat them. Their orange wines may be tolerably bad, but ours would be incomparably worse.

It is worthy of note that the Bulletin says the young women of San Francisco play the piano better than any young women in the world. But then the Bulletin man happened to be writing of piano-playing. We know just what he would have said of the young women of San Francisco if he had been writing of eating pork and beans or chewing gum.

The days have come when the one thing harder than getting into bed at night is the getting out in the morning.

Every married man should join some good society, and as good as any is the society of his wife and children.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address of nearly Six Thousand Society People.

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

San Francisco Society—An article descriptive and historical, going back to early days, and mentioning the prominent beaux and belles, and the fashionable residence quarters of the city at different dates, etc.

Reception Days—General information regarding the same.

Special Address and Calling List—A carefully compiled list of society people, their residences, address, and reception days, made up from various select invitation lists and special sources of information, and comprising over two thousand families. Something of value to every member of polite society.

Oakland Calling and Address List—Giving the cream of suburban society, carefully compiled from invitation and party lists, and revised by prominent society people.

Army Calling and Address List.

Navy Calling and Address List.

Permanent Guests at the Principal Hotels.

Bar Association—History and membership.

Art Association—History and membership.

Loring Club—History and membership.

Chit-Chat Club—History and membership.

Article on Social Club Life in San Francisco.

Pacific Club—History and membership.

Union Club—History and membership.

Bohemian Club—History and membership.

Occidental Club, Oakland—History and membership.

San Francisco Verein, German Club—History and membership.

Concordia Club, Jewish—History and membership.

Spanish American Club—History and membership.

Theatre Diagrams—Giving official box office plans of all the principal theatres, with numbers of boxes and chairs, so that a ready reference can be had at home to the exact location of seats secured by tickets by comparing numbers. This feature alone is worth the price of the volume.

Shopping Guide—Giving location of places of business and general information concerning a few of our high class retail establishments.

The ELITE DIRECTORY will be a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

READY ON OR ABOUT THE TENTH OF JANUARY, 1879.

A. L. BANCROFT & CO., Publishers.

CANNEL COAL.

A SUPERIOR QUALITY OF GRATE COAL for sale by MIDDLETON & FARNSWORTH,
14 Post Street, and 718 Sansome Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS--DEC. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST.,
San Francisco.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A specialty. None but the best brands of English
Portland Cement used.

FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1833 Stockton Street,
San Francisco.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANguages, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English,
German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and
Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods.
Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELDON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $50
each.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOUGAN.

Office Nevada Block.

THE WATER SUPPLY FOR SAN FRANCISCO.

Is Artesian Water Poisonous?

The Bulletin and Call have, in a small, petulant way, been firing paper wads at the Spring Valley Water Company for now these many years, renewing the petty vexation upon the eve of every election and the convening of every Legislature. For the relief of tax-payers they suggest no remedy; for any other supply than by bringing water from the Sierra at a cost of unestimated millions, they have until recently made no suggestion. Their writers have an ill-defined idea that somehow the city may condemn, or steal, or confiscate the Spring Valley Water Company's property, forgetting that it is private property, as is the Bulletin or Call, and ought to be as sacred and inviolate as type or ink or press, and can only be obtained in one honest way, and that is by an honest purchase at a fair valuation. Having failed to suggest any practical way to appropriate the Spring Valley Company's works, and having failed to demonstrate any economical mode of obtaining a supply from any other source, it would seem as though (rather than to fail in injuring the Spring Valley Water Company) they would be willing to poison the community with artesian drainage from our sewers and cess pools, and advise us to dig artesian wells and drink artesian water.

Mr. William L. McAlpine, a very distinguished engineer, visited San Francisco, and, convincing us by his intelligent reasoning that this artesian water of our Peninsula was limited in quantity, impure in quality, and deleterious to health if used for domestic purposes, we so represented in our issue of November 30th. This article attracted the attention of the Board of Supervisors, and it was suggested to obtain from Mr. McAlpine a more elaborate report, and one more complete in detail. Hence, we print his memoir in full. He asserts as a fact, demonstrable by science, that the artesian well water of this Peninsula is unfit to drink, and is, in fact, destructive to health, because of poisonous properties in the water that penetrates from the surface through porous rock. If this is true, it is an alarming fact; if it is not true, science should be able to demonstrate wherein Mr. McAlpine has erred. If Mr. McAlpine is wrong, artesian well boring should be encouraged; but otherwise, the Board of Health and the municipal authorities should prevent artesian water being used for domestic purposes.

We print in full this memoir in justice to Mr. McAlpine, because we made extracts from it; and we commend its careful perusal to our health and municipal officers, and to all parents and heads of families, and indeed all citizens who honestly desire intelligent information upon this question of water supply for San Francisco and the quality of the water.

A Memoir on the Subject of Supplying the City of San Francisco with Water.

BY WILLIAM L. McALPINE.

A public water supply to a city should have sources adequate, not only for the present demands for domestic uses, for manufactories, for public baths, for the shipping, fountains, and irrigation of private and public grounds, for sprinkling the streets and flushing the sewers, and for the quick extinguishment of fires, but also for all these purposes when the population shall have been trebled, and in addition thereto, with the means of extending the works at a future time in conformity with some general plan, which, while adapted to a supply for the present, will permit of the future extension above indicated, with the least loss of the first expenditure.

The sources of water available for the city of San Francisco are as follows:

1. From wells within the area of the city, or contiguous thereto.
2. By collecting the rainfall from the elevated lands of the Peninsula south of the city in large storing reservoirs, and conveying it in conduits to distributing reservoirs within the city, from which it may be distributed to all parts thereof.
3. By a corresponding collection, impounding, conveying, and distributing the rain which falls in the Mount Diablo Coast Range of mountains nearest the city, as in the Calaveras District.
4. Also from similar districts on the Coast Range, and from streams or lakes immediately beyond them.
5. From lakes and streams on the mountain slopes of the Sierra Nevada, and the conveyance and distribution to the city as before mentioned, and
6. From modifications and combinations of the foregoing plans.

Schemes for a supply of water from these several sources have been more or less examined and discussed by civil engineers and others, whose printed reports furnish a part of the data necessary to determine the relative advantages and expense of each. I have personally examined the sources, sites, and routes of these schemes, and have considered all of the other matters necessary to a general, and in most cases a sufficiently particular, understanding of the whole subject of the present inquiry.

The result of these studies will now be presented under the following general heads:

First—The QUANTITY of water which is now required for the city, and the additional amount which will probably be demanded from time to time.

Second—The QUANTITY which can be obtained from each of the reliable and reasonably practicable sources.

Third—The relative QUALITY of the water which each source will furnish.

Fourth—The CHARACTER, EXTENT, and comparative EXPENSE of the several plans for procuring the requisite quantity of suitable water, for the present and future demand, from each source.

Fifth—A COMPARISON of the most feasible of the schemes in regard to the usefulness, certainty of construction and maintenance, quantity and quality of the water, and the expense of introducing the same.

FIRST. The quantity which is now and will probably hereafter be required.

The quantity of water which is required for all of the purposes for which a public work is intended to supply, as hereinbefore enumerated, may be considered as equal to thirty gallons a day, applied to the whole number of the population. This amount of water may be divided into three nearly equal parts, viz.: One third for the domestic consumption (for potation, cooking, and washing for the whole population, and for bath and water closets, etc., for a portion of the people); another third for the various mechanical operations, hotels, restaurants, stables, public baths, fountains, etc., and for shipping; another third for the sprinkling of streets, flushing of sewers, extinguishment of fires, and for wastages.

When planning works which are to be under municipal control, which may at times be less efficient than individual management, the conservative engineer considers it necessary to have at command twice the above-named quantity. The experience of the best managed public works of the Eastern cities confirms this estimate. The rate of consumption in the European cities is much less. The difference is due to the habits of the masses of the people of the two countries. The present population of three hundred thousand, in San Francisco, would by this rule consume an average of nine millions of gallons daily as a minimum, and a possible maximum of twice that quantity.

Any source of supply, to be entitled to consideration as a whole, should be sufficient to readily furnish thirty-six million gallons daily, and ultimately a hundred or more millions to meet any probable and possible increase of the population, business, and other demands for water.

A source which can not furnish these quantities can only be considered as an adjunct to some other scheme.

SECOND. The quantity which can be obtained from each of the pro-

Preliminary to the consideration of this question, it may be proper to recall to recollection that the source of all fresh water is primarily from the ocean, and secondarily from the atmosphere.

The quantity of fresh water which can be obtained from any district of country depends upon the amount of the precipitation, the area, steepness, and porosity of the water-shed, the losses from evaporation, etc.

The capacity of the atmosphere for the absorption of moisture depends upon its temperature. A warm wind blowing over the ocean becomes charged with watery vapor; when it reaches land, which is cooler, it discharges some of it in dew, mist, or rain. The ocean winds, which are driven up the mountain slopes, encounter more and more cooled earths, and discharge more and more water in proportion to the elevation to which they are driven.

The precipitation at San Francisco averages two feet in a year; the chief part of the rain falls within four months, and a large proportion of it generally falls during two of these months. The rainfall on the top of the surrounding hills is about twice as much as on the low parts of the city; while at the top of the Sierra it is from eight to ten feet, or more.

The temperature of the ocean winds and of the lands along the coast is nearly the same during the seven summer months, and the consequence is that no rain can fall; but during the five months of the autumn and winter there are greater or less differences between the temperatures of the ocean winds and of the land, which produce copious winter rains—the precipitation being always in proportion to these differences in temperature.

The rain water which is thus precipitated upon the land divides itself into three portions: one of which passes off visibly, over the surface to its parent source the ocean; a second part enters the porous earth and rocks, and flows invisibly, either directly to the ocean or to the flowing springs, or superficial water courses; and the remainder of the rain is evaporated from the surface of the ground, water courses, etc.

Generally from half to two-thirds of the rainfall passes off either superficially or subterraneously. The former flows off comparatively quick, depending upon the steepness of the surfaces of the ground; and the latter much more slowly, depending upon the looseness or compactness of the soil or rock.

The apparent mystery of the supply of water to artesian wells may be easily explained. Strictly speaking, the term artesian should only be applied to water which flows above the surface of the ground.

Sometimes in a valley surrounded by higher lands there is found a porous stratum of earth or rock between impervious layers above and below it, all of which extend to and crop out on higher ground, and also extend beneath the soil of the valley. Under such conditions, the rain which falls upon the exposed surfaces of the porous stratum sinks into it; and if this channel of water is pierced, by boring in the valley, the water will ascend in a tube to the level of the outcrop on the surrounding hills, though sometimes the water in the porous stratum has some other outlet at a level lower than the hill tops. The height to which such water will rise in the boring tube, and in a vertical pipe placed on top of it, is the measure of the elevation of the land from which the "flowing well" receives its supply; or, in the exception before stated, it measures the level at which this water has another escape.

Common wells, in which the water does not overflow, sometimes receive their supply in the same manner, but more generally they merely drain the water from the interstices of the surrounding soil.

The quantity of water which can be permanently obtained from an artesian well is exactly measured by the area of the porous stratum which is exposed to the rainfall. The elevation to which such waters will flow, and the quantity which the well will ultimately discharge, generally determine the source of its supply.

The quantity which can be permanently obtained from any common well depends upon the cubical amount and porosity of the soil which it drains. If two or more artesian wells are sunk near a first one, in a homogeneous soil, and the overflow from the latter is reduced in height, or the quantity is materially lessened, it shows that the source of supply to all is not only the same, but that it is of very limited extent and probably near at hand.

The same may be said of common wells, whenever several contiguous ones have been sunk into a homogeneous soil, and a considerable quantity of water is attempted to be pumped from each well. The quantity which the first well was capable of furnishing will be successively reduced by that which is pumped from those which were afterward dug. If we take a case similar to that which presents itself in many cases in this city, where a common well has been sunk, say fifty feet deep in porous soil, through which the quantity of water pumped will flow to a well on a slope of one in one hundred, this well will drain an area of nearly two miles in diameter at the top, and in the form of an inverted cone of fifty feet deep.

If another well is sunk to the same depth within the same area the quantity of water which could have been obtained from the first well will be considerably reduced; and if several such wells are sunk within the same area, the aggregate supply attainable from all of them will be but little more than that which was obtained from the first well.

On the above diagram well No. 1 was the first one sunk into a body of homogeneous soil like sandy loam.

The rainfall of previous years will have charged the soil with all of the water which it can contain, which may be assumed at one-fifth. When a given quantity is being pumped from this well the water will continue to flow into it until the slope of the surface of the flowing water becomes, say one in a hundred; that is, that the head necessary to overcome the friction caused by the earth particles is equal to one foot in one hundred feet. The cubical contents of the inverted cone of earth of ten thousand feet diameter and fifty feet deep at the apex is nearly four thousand millions of cubic feet of earth, which will contain eight hundred millions of cubic feet of water, or six thousand millions of gallons. If pumps be applied to this well during the two hundred and fifty days when no rain falls, it will furnish an average daily quantity of twenty-four millions of gallons, but only for one season. After which, if no rain should fall, no more water could be obtained from the assumed drainage contents of that well.

In San Francisco the rainfall averages two feet deep, falling in the remaining one hundred and fifteen days of the year, and if the whole of this rainfall on the surface of the ten thousand feet diameter could be collected in its soil, and none of it ran to waste or was lost by evaporation, the subterranean reservoir of water would amount to nearly twelve hundred million gallons. In practice, however, it is found that not more than one-third of the rainfall can be made available, say four hundred millions of gallons, and therefore the well in question would thereafter only furnish an average of a little more than a million of gallons a day for a year.

The catchment area of the water-shed above assumed measures 2.81 square miles, which gives an average of 383,000 gallons a day for each square mile. But the rainfall on the higher parts of the city is greater than two feet, and if it averages three feet, the supply would be 574,500 gallons a day from a square mile.

Returning to the diagram and the above remarks, we find that although the well in question would give eight millions of gallons a day for two hundred and fifty days, it would never, after the first eight months, give more than an average of 575,000 gallons a day for the succeeding years.

The rainfall at San Francisco was only 7.4 inches in 1851, to 8.8 in 1864, 14.1 inches in 1867; from which we may infer that there would frequently occur years when this well would not supply an average of 300,000 gallons a day.

* NOTE.—A cubic yard of air at a temperature of 32 degrees Fahrenheit is capable of containing seven grains of water, and at 50 degrees about fifty grains; from 50 to 80 degrees a cubic yard of air will contain about as many grains of water as the number of degrees of the thermometer. Above the temperature of 80 degrees the capacity to receive watery vapor increases rapidly, and at 212 degrees the air can receive its own bulk—the tension of the water being then equal to that of air, and ebullition is produced.

When well No. 2 on the diagram was sunk, say at a thousand feet from No. 1, it would cut off nearly a third of the quantity which No. 1 could originally furnish, and if a circle of wells should be sunk around No. 1 within a thousand feet distance from it, well No. 1 would not furnish an average of 20,000 gallons a day.

The lines Ca, Cb, etc., represent the slopes of the water which will successively flow to well No. 1, until it has exhausted all of the fluid which had accumulated, during many previous years, within the body of earth embraced in the area of A B diameter, by D C, the depth of the inverted cone.

The lines B, E, F, represent the area (in a vertical section) which well No. 2 will cut off from the original supply to well No. 1. The area of the cut-off on the surface of the ground by well No. 2 will be nearly one-third of the whole of the original area which had previously supplied No. 1.

If we take the whole of the city to the north and east of the surrounding hills, as equal to about twelve square miles, we shall find considerable areas of rocks which are bare, and others lying beneath a soil which is compact and nearly impervious to water. These rocks and impervious earths form natural barriers to oppose any overflow of fresh water from any district beyond these hills.

The surface earth, and the excavations and borings throughout the city, show that the soil which overlies the rocks is generally porous sand or gravel, and in some places interspersed with strata of clay or mud.

The rocks which form the Diablo ranges, fifty miles to the eastward, have no porous strata between water-tight ones, and hence no artesian supply of water can come from that, or any other source eastward of this range. The dip of these rocks is so nearly vertical, that even if they held and conveyed water, borings in San Francisco would have to be made many miles deep to reach such supposed sources of water. A supply of artesian water from the Sierra Nevada slopes is entirely cut off by the impervious barriers of the Diablo range, and no water derived from that source could be reached by any borings made in the city.

The city itself is surrounded by impervious rock barriers on two sides, and by the salt water of the Bay on the other sides; an artesian supply is therefore impossible from any source beyond itself.

All of the so-called artesian wells in the city, and all others which may hereafter be bored, must, necessarily, now and forever, derive all of their water from the rain which falls upon only a portion of the before mentioned twelve square miles.

The rainfall upon this district does not exceed an average of three feet depth a year, and in some years is less than half as much. That portion of the rain which falls upon the bare rocks, or those which are scantily covered with earth, flows off quickly to the Bay, and but little of it enters the porous soil beneath the city. That portion which falls upon the roofs of the houses and the water-tight sidewalks and pavements runs off rapidly in the gutters, or through the sewers to the Bay. The remainder may, for the present, be considered as having entered the porous soil through which it will slowly flow to the surrounding salt water.

If a systematic arrangement of wells throughout the city should be resorted to, the aggregate quantity which could be obtained therefrom can be determined with approximate exactness. There are considerable areas contiguous to the Bay and its re-entering valleys where the rainfall would run off quickly to the Bay, and would not find its way to the porous soil for the well supplies.

The roofs of the houses and the water-tight sidewalks and pavements convey the rain which falls upon them to the gutters and sewers, and would also be lost to the well supplies. And there are localities, such as near the cemeteries, certain manufactories and populations, where wells for domestic supply of water would be inadmissible.

For the present purpose, it is sufficient to say that all of the wells which could be sunk in the city would not furnish an aggregate permanent supply, for all time, of six millions of gallons a day, of water suitable for domestic purposes.

This assertion may be met by a reference to some wells in the city which now furnish a large quantity of water, and that if other wells should be sunk in favorable localities the aggregate supply therefrom would exceed the quantity which has been above estimated.

The reply is, that the porous soil beneath the city has been charged to repletion with the rainfall of a great many previous years, and if an amount of water should at any time be drawn therefrom greater than that which the rains will now furnish, the original stock of stored water would eventually be exhausted; after which the supply obtainable from the wells would be exactly measured by the proportion of the future rain water which will flow to them.

It is said that no water is lost; even that which in its liquid form and in the juices of meat, vegetables, etc., is consumed by man and animals in a city, is more or less restored to the porous soil from which the wells must derive their supply, and by that quantity of restored water it will be acknowledged that the above estimates of quantity are too small.

The natural repugnance of all persons to the use of such foul restored water, even when mixed in comparatively small portions with better water, will, as soon as realized, lead to measures which will convey a considerable portion of such sewage water to waste in the Bay, and ultimately, by these measures, while the city wells may be rendered less baneful, the supply therefrom will be greatly reduced. There will, however, always be enough sewage and objectionable matter admitted to such wells as to render them undesirable.

There are some mechanical and other purposes for which such water as can be procured from wells in the city can be used, but as soon as their true quality is generally understood they will never be used for domestic purposes.

SECOND. An ample quantity of water for the present and future demands of the city can be obtained from each of the sources named above, except from wells within or near it.

In a report of the Chief Engineer of the Spring Valley Water Company I find that during a period of seven years there were collected, for use in the Peninsula reservoirs of that Company, six and a seventh millions of gallons of water from each inch of rainfall on each square mile of the water-sheds of those reservoirs.

The mean rainfall during these seven years was 23.71 inches at San Francisco, with a range between 15.21 inches and 28.23 inches; and one year (1872) of 38.32 inches. At San Andreas, elevated 455 feet above tide, the mean was 44.75 inches, with a range between 30.52 inches and 47.63 inches; and one year (1872) of 82.57 inches. At the Pillaritos, elevated 666 feet, the mean was 47.70 inches, and a range between 38.88 inches and 50.31 inches; and one year (1872) of 78.28 inches.

The water-sheds of the elevated portions of the Peninsula nearest the city are probably six or seven hundred feet above tide, and the rainfall thereon probably averages about four feet a year; and if it were all stored, so as to bridge over the years of rainfall which are below the mean, each square mile of the water-shed would furnish an average of 300,000 gallons a day.

The minimum supply now required by the city, as stated above, is nine million gallons daily, which would require a water-shed of 11 1/2 square miles. The maximum present demand would require 22 1/2 square miles, and in a few years the growth of the city will require the same.

* NOTE.—All of the rain water which enters the porous earth each year ultimately reaches the sea, and generally within the current year during which it falls.

The surface of this water contained within the earth will be found at its minimum elevation and slope at the end of the rainy season, and at its minimum height and grade at the end of the season of no rain.

When the annual rainfall is greater than the average of a series of years, the surface of the subterranean water flowing to the sea will be found on a steeper slope, and when it is less than the average the slope will be flatter.

The discharge of this subterranean water into the sea commences as soon as the first rains have saturated the earth nearest to the sea water, and will continue until the whole of the season's rain, which has soaked into the soil, has reached the sea.

All of the rain water which may have filled the porous earth nearest to the Bay, during the rainy season, will have flowed off early in the dry season; and then the water from those portions which are next nearest to the Bay will flow off to it a little later, and so successively until a considerable portion of the water in the porous soil over the whole water-shed will have flowed off and be lost to the daily supply for the latter end of the dry season to the wells which it has been assumed will be dug.

water from 45 square miles, and ultimately from 100 to 200 square miles of water-shed.

The present works of the Spring Valley Water Company on the Peninsula have 27½ square miles of water-shed, and with the aid of a new reservoir, which can be built when necessary, it will have the supply from 39 square miles.

The Company has also surveyed other accessible water-sheds on the Peninsula, which will increase the whole catchment, under their Peninsula system, to more than 100 square miles.

I have personally examined the eastern slope of the Peninsula range as far south as the proposed site of the reservoir on the north branch of the San Francisco Creek, ten miles south of the San Mateo, and find that, with a dam of about one hundred feet height, a storing reservoir capable of containing about three thousand million gallons of available water can be obtained. The water from this reservoir can be conveyed to the proposed Canada Raymond reservoir by a canal, conduit, and pipes of ten miles length, including a tunnel of about a mile in length.

The area of the water-shed which this scheme will utilize is about twenty square miles, and in conjunction with the other very large contiguous storage capacity of the Spring Valley Works this district will furnish a large additional supply.

The problem of the storage capacity which must be provided on this part of the Pacific Coast must be considered differently from what it would be on the Atlantic.

On the latter, the rainfall on the average is distributed with tolerable regularity over each month of the year, and the extremes of the annual precipitation are not so great as on the Pacific; while on the Pacific Coast all of the rains occur during four or five months, and there is no precipitation during the remainder of the year. The total annual quantity is much less, and the extremes between the years is much greater than on the Atlantic.

For these reasons, the provision for the storage of the rainfall here must be much greater, to bridge over the longer period of no rain, and this must be again increased to provide for a supply during a succession of several years of small rainfall.

The aggregate storage capacity of the reservoirs which are now built by this company is more than twelve thousand million gallons, and this will soon be increased by thirty-four thousand million gallons, making a total storage, comparatively near the city, of forty-six thousand million gallons.

This immense storage is more than sufficient to meet all the requirements of the case, but the plans of the Spring Valley Water Company contemplate the utilization of the whole storage in a manner which will presently be mentioned.

The next nearest source of supply is from the Calaveras District, on the western slopes of the Diablo Coast Range of mountains.

I have visited the site of the proposed reservoir on the Calaveras Creek, and the route of the tunnel and conduit by which water from the district is proposed to be conveyed to the city. I have also examined the reports of Messrs. Schussler, Scowden, and Mendell on this subject.

The reports show that, with a dam 183 feet in height, a reservoir with a capacity of thirty thousand million gallons would be formed; that an area of water-shed of a hundred square miles would be obtained, where the mean annual rainfall at the reservoir is 28 inches per annum, and probably much larger on the high mountain slopes of the water-shed.

Mr. Schussler compares the character of the water-shed and the evaporation from this reservoir with those which have been tested on the Peninsula, and estimates that five and eight-tenths million gallons for each inch of rainfall would be derived from each square mile of the water-shed of the Calaveras. This estimate gives more than sixteen thousand million gallons a year, or an average of forty-four and a half million gallons a day.

Col. Mendell, however, from some rain-gauges established in for three months in 1877, concludes that the rainfall on the higher portions of this water-shed is not greater than at the reservoir, and says that "the product of the Calaveras water-shed can not prudently be estimated to amount to more than thirty millions of gallons daily. * * * If additional storage can be provided, the daily average supply will be increased proportionately."

He bases his estimate upon a reservoir with a capacity of storage of twenty-five thousand million gallons. Mr. Schussler proposes a reservoir one-fifth larger, which would increase Col. Mendell's estimate to thirty-six thousand millions.

Messrs. Schussler and Scowden have proposed to increase the supply from this source when needed, by introducing into the Calaveras reservoir the water of the Arroya Honda and Arroya Valle—creeks immediately contiguous thereto—which together have one hundred and forty square miles of water-shed. With the same depth of water-fall and ratio of collection as used for the Calaveras Creek, it would furnish an additional supply of over sixty millions of gallons a day, and a total of more than a hundred million gallons daily from the whole of the Calaveras district. There are many places on these streams which offer facilities for the construction of as large storing reservoirs as may be necessary to impound and preserve the flood waters, and those of the years of plentiful rainfall. Therefore we may conclude that the Calaveras District is capable of affording an ample supply of water to meet the utmost demands for the city, however extensive that demand may be in the future.

I have not been able, except in a general way, to personally examine the other sources of supply, viz: from the lakes and streams on the Sierra Nevada slopes, from Clear Lake, etc., and from the San Joaquin River, but the reports of the engineers already named demonstrate that each of them will furnish the necessary quantity for the present and future demands of the city.

I am therefore warranted in stating that each one of the sources of supply, except that from common and deep wells in the city, may be made competent to furnish the desired quantity of water to San Francisco.

THIRD. The third general question proposed to be considered is to determine the relative QUALITY of the water which can be procured from each of the sources before named.

It may be repeated that all fresh water is derived primarily from the ocean, by the operation of natural distillation.

For such practical purposes as the present inquiry, the water which is precipitated from the atmosphere may be considered pure.

Water readily seizes hold of, or enters into combination with, almost every substance with which it is brought in contact, and what is important in the present examination is that it eagerly absorbs, and reluctantly parts with, those substances which render it most objectionable for domestic uses.

The impure gases from combustion, and those which arise from the vast masses of refuse, decaying vegetable and animal bodies which abound in the fouler parts of a large city, all float in the atmosphere over large populations, and are all seized upon by the falling rain water, and materially injure the quality of what would in the country be very pure water.

When the fluid reaches the surface of the earth it is brought into contact with the decaying vegetable and animal products, which it rapidly dissolves and incorporates, and when the rain water passes into the interstices of the earth, or porous rocks, its great solving power enables it to decompose and incorporate the earthy and mineral matter with which it comes in contact.

From these general statements we may obtain the relative degree of purity of the water which can be obtained from each of the several sources, without resort to chemical analysis.

The water which is obtained from wells within the city must necessarily contain all the contaminations which have been enumerated, viz: from the impure gases always existing in the atmosphere over the city; from absorption of the effete animal and vegetable matter, which is so abundant on the vacant lots and grounds around the dwellings of certain classes of the population; from the earthy and mineral salts in the soil; and from the leakage of stables, privies, imperfect house-drains and sewers—the most hurtful and repugnant of all contaminations.

Water which is brought into contact with excrementary matter from the human body imbibes therefrom the most deadly and disgusting of all the pollutions to which it can be subjected.

The Arab, Turk, East Indian, and the Chinese, only half civilized, bury such matter from sight, and deposit it where its emanating gases and germs will perform the natural functions of dissolution, without coming into contact with any of the air or water which man is compelled to breathe or use.

It is only among the civilized Caucasians, and in their densely populated cities, that these obviously necessary sanitary measures are disregarded, and men, women, and children are forced to drink the deadly and disgusting water obtained from wells within a city.

Many of the open privies, earth closets, water closets, and leaky house-drains and sewers, discharge their contents into the adjacent soils, and the water from the next rain percolating through this filthy soil, becomes contaminated with it, and flows on to the nearest well.

If a deep well is sunk through the upper porous soil and one or more layers of clay, the smooth exterior surface of the iron pipes offers a ready conduit to the contaminated water, which will then enter the pipe at the bottom of the deepest well and poison the whole supply therefrom.

I have been informed, and have observed, that a great many of the sewers of the city have been very badly constructed, of loose, porous brick masonry of inadequate thickness, laid up with common mortar of very bad quality, and that these sewers leak into the adjacent soil a considerable amount of their contents. So far as this leakage occurs, it is a terrible source of corruption to any contiguous wells of water.

The enteric fevers and zymotic diseases, which prevail to so frightful an extent in many of our American cities, have been traced directly to the use of water from wells which have been polluted by the admixture of sewage matter and drainage therefrom.

The chemical analyses of the waters from many of the old, long used wells in European cities, and from those formerly in use in some of the American cities (some of which yet continue), show how foul and corrupt all such sources must be under the similar conditions which, we have endeavored to demonstrate, must exist in almost every well, shallow or deep, to which now or hereafter a resort is had for any portion of the supply for domestic uses.*

Samples of the water from some of the so-called artesian wells, from which more or less of the supply is obtained at the larger hotels, and at other places, are herewith submitted, and also of the same waters to which some simple reactions have been applied (which any gentleman may repeat), which show some of the ingredients that are always to be found mixed with all of the waters from such sources. These simple experiments confirm what has been before stated, viz: That even these deep wells, which are supposed to be the most pure which can be found, are utterly unfit for domestic uses.

Experienced analytical chemists will determine the exact quantity of each of these deadly or unwholesome ingredients in these well waters, but even their best efforts, though generally successful, do sometimes fail to detect those more minute germs which convey the most deadly diseases to people who are compelled to use them.

It is refreshing to turn from these disgusting considerations of the foul water, which all city wells must necessarily furnish, to those comparatively pure ones, some of which are in easy reach, and others more remote from your city.

The geology of the Peninsula and that of the Diablo Coast Range of mountains shows that their rocks are chiefly of sandstone and slate, often metamorphosed by igneous action; and some veins of the same rocks, and also of limestone and granite, which have not been changed. Wherever the earth overlies these rocks, or is found in the contiguous valleys, it has been formed from their disintegration.

The character of the water which falls upon the bare rocks or their earth covering, or of that which flows over or through the soil of the hill slopes and valleys, will be determined by ascertaining the character of the soluble constituents of these rocks and earth, and of the extent of the decaying vegetable and animal matter upon or within them.

The steep slopes of the water-shed will prevent the pure falling rain water from contact with the rocks, and especially the metamorphosed ones, long enough to dissolve and absorb much mineral matter from them, and in fact almost nothing that will make it unwholesome. It may be rendered a little harder, but not at all injurious for potatoes.

The water-sheds above referred to are covered with a scanty growth of grass, bushes, and in the ravines of trees. The grasses and foliage of such districts decay during midsummer, and the gases of decomposition will have been driven off before the autumnal rains commence; hence the falling rain water has but little, if any, decayed vegetable matter to come in contact with, and must flow off with almost no vegetable contamination.

Animal life, even of minute and ephemeral character, can not exist to any considerable extent when thus deprived of vegetable food, and it is, therefore, to be found only in small quantity upon these water-sheds, and, by its necessary death and gaseous exhalation in midsummer, can not possibly sensibly affect the waters which subsequently flow off from these sheds.

We then have a source of water which is comparatively free from the contaminations of the mineral and earthy salts, and from vegetable and animal effete matter, and it must therefore be pure and of the best quality for domestic purposes; indeed its quality is, and must necessarily remain, superior to that which is supplied to any other city within my range of observation.

This characteristic of the quality of water applies equally to that which may be derived from the elevated portion of the Peninsula, of the Coast range, and as far as two hasty trips have enabled me to judge, to the slopes of the Sierra Nevada.

Hence I can confidently state that the waters, which each of the schemes before mentioned will furnish (except that from common and deep wells in the city), is of a suitable and excellent quality for domestic uses in San Francisco.

FOURTH. The fourth branch of the inquiry is, "The character and extent of the works, and the comparative expense of procuring the requisite quantity of water, of a suitable character for the present and future demands of the city, from each of the feasible sources."

The time allowed for the preparation of this report will not permit me to enter into this part of the investigation with much detail, and I shall be compelled to express myself in more general terms than I would otherwise do.

Before taking up an examination of the several schemes for an efficient supply of water to San Francisco, it may be premised that certain parts of the work must be substantially the same, from whatever source the water is supplied. The water from each of the sources must be received in capacious, elevated reservoirs, so located that water distributed therefrom, while able to furnish the usual nearly equal daily supply, will also be able to answer the sudden demands for the extinguishment of a large conflagration. The distribution pipes in the streets must be of suitable size to accomplish both of these objects.

The expense of constructing distribution reservoirs, and of laying down the street pipes, must, therefore, be substantially the same for each one of the schemes.

It remains, then, to ascertain how the water from each source can be suitably introduced to the distributing reservoirs.

Commencing with the first of the schemes herein mentioned, "the supply from common and deep wells in the city."

A properly arranged system would require a series of wells to be sunk where a contour line, of perhaps thirty feet above the level of tide, would strike the surface of the graded streets. These wells would be placed at such distances apart as to intercept as much as possible of the subterranean flowing waters and not materially interfere with the supply to each other.

A second series of wells, dug on a contour line of greater elevation, would probably be necessary; and in particular places the level of the ground, the condition of the subsoil, and other circumstances, might require some intermediate wells. When these wells are within a reasonable distance of each other, one pumping engine would serve for several.

Receiving reservoirs of considerable capacity would be required to meet the unequal demands for water during the different hours of the day and night and those of the days of the week. Several of the pumping engines could deliver their water into the same reservoir.

It is almost evident, even without a detailed estimate, that the cost of the pumping engines, wells, force-mains, and reservoirs, added to the sum, the interest of which would operate the engines, would be as great for its limited supply of six million of gallons a day as the same quantity of water could be obtained by some of the other schemes.

If the waters of Lake Merced can be freed from vegetation they would probably be rendered of good quality. The quantity which it will furnish has been variously estimated at from five to ten million of gallons a day. It is distant eight miles from the City Hall, with its surface elevated but little above the ocean. To make use of this water it must be pumped over ground three or four hundred feet high, and then conveyed to reservoirs for distribution.

*NOTE.—By a new process the London chemists have analyzed some of the well water in that city, and determined the "germs of sewage" by the quantity of albumenoid ammonia.

These wells contained from one quarter to three parts of these "possible sewage germs" in one million parts of the well waters.

These germs can not be removed by filtering, as they are smaller than even blood globules, and their vitality is not destroyed by boiling the water.

This source would not furnish water sufficient to meet the present demand, and the scheme can only be considered as an adjunct to some one of much larger supply.

The nearest source of water, of a suitable quality and in sufficient quantity to supply the present and future demands of the city, is that from the elevated lands of the Peninsula immediately south of San Francisco. The Spring Valley Water Company has developed this source of supply so far as to demonstrate that a minimum of more than fifteen million of gallons a day can be obtained from their existing works, and thirty million as soon as they shall have completed another of their reservoirs. These works may also be extended so as to increase the daily supply, from the whole Peninsula system, to fifty million of gallons a day.

As these works have been in use many years a description of them may be made very briefly:

There are three large storing reservoirs now in use, having an aggregate capacity for the storage of sixteen thousand seven hundred millions of gallons of the water, which is supplied from the flow-off from twenty-seven and a half square miles.

The water is conducted from these collecting reservoirs, through tunnels and wrought-iron pipes, to seven distributing reservoirs, located on elevated hills throughout the city. These reservoirs will contain more than sixty millions of gallons, one-half of which is in one reservoir, which is three hundred and seventy-five feet above tide; and another of these reservoirs, containing fifteen millions, is two hundred and fifty-three feet above tide. These elevations are sufficient to give an effective head in the highest buildings in the highest parts of the city.

In 1875 there had been laid in the streets one hundred and sixty-seven miles of cast-iron pipes, ranging from twenty-two inches in diameter downward, having a mean area equal to that of a pipe of 8.42 inches interior diameter. The length of the street pipes now laid is about one hundred and seventy-five miles.

The next nearest source of water, of suitable quality and sufficient quantity, is from the Calaveras District, which has already been described in part; a continuation of the description will be as follows:

The water from the Calaveras reservoir would be conveyed through the mountain which forms its western water-shed, by a tunnel two miles long, and then by a line of pipes twenty-one miles long, passing around the head of the Bay of San Francisco to a suitable elevation on the eastern slope of the Peninsula, and along that slope by a conduit and pipes to reservoirs, which would have to be built on elevated places within the city, and distributed throughout the city, as before mentioned.

The comparative expense of introducing water by the Calaveras scheme and the Spring Valley is narrowed down to that of the high reservoir dam, long tunnel, add twenty-one miles of pipes around the bay, in the former; and the cost of the reservoir dams now built and projected in the latter scheme.

The cost of the conduit along the Peninsula slopes, and that of the city reservoirs and distribution pipes, would be alike in both schemes.

Col. Mendell estimates the cost of so much of the above-mentioned works of the Calaveras scheme as enter into the comparison at nearly seven millions of dollars, to bring a daily supply of thirty millions of gallons to the place of junction, beyond which the cost of the two schemes would be equal.

The cost of the already constructed reservoirs and appurtenances of the Spring Valley Works in San Mateo County, and of their enlargement so as to furnish thirty millions daily, is evidently less than this seven millions of dollars which the Calaveras scheme would cost.

Messrs. Schussler, Scowden, and Mendell have investigated schemes for a water supply from the lakes and rivers on the slopes of the Sierra, from Clear Lake and from the San Joaquin, which may be generalized in description, as follows:

From Lake Tahoe on the Sierra Nevada, the water would be conveyed in a canal for fifteen miles, through a tunnel under the Sierra of nearly five miles in length, down the American River twelve miles, again by a canal of sixty miles to a reservoir at Auburn, and then by an iron conduit pipe one hundred and one miles long, passing under the Sacramento River twice, to a reservoir at Carquinez. The conduit would commence with an elevation of 1,326 feet near Auburn, and after descending to the level of tide would again rise to 626 feet elevation at Carquinez. From thence by a conduit pipe twenty-two miles long to Oakland, from which, by a tunnel of five miles under San Francisco Bay, it would be connected with the reservoirs and pipe distribution in the city. The entire length of the artificial work would be 208 miles.

The El Dorado project proposes to take the water of the South Fork of the American River, by a canal forty-five miles in length to Borland, and then by an iron conduit pipe of eighty-two miles in length (passing under the San Joaquin) to Livermore Pass, and continued sixty-four miles to and under a comparatively narrow, shallow channel of the Bay, and down its western shore to the reservoirs in the city. Or if the line is carried around the head of the Bay, the distance will be increased eleven miles. The total length of this line is 191 to 202 miles.

The Mokelumne and Blue Lakes scheme proposes to take the water from the Mokelumne River, by a canal from thirty-eight to fifty-two miles long, and then by a conduit pipe on a line which intersects that above described for the El Dorado scheme, near the San Joaquin River, sixty-two miles to the Livermore Pass, and then following the same route to the city a further distance of sixty-four miles. The total length of the artificial work on this line is from 164 to 189 miles.

There have been some other schemes suggested for obtaining water for the city from other places along the western slopes of the Sierra Nevada, but the considerations which will presently be presented will apply equally to all of these sources.

The scheme of a supply from Clear Lake consists of twenty-two and a half miles of canal and ninety-six and a half miles of iron conduit pipe, making a total length of artificial work of 119 miles, passing under the Straits of Carquinez and the Bay of San Francisco.

The scheme of a supply from the San Joaquin River is mainly by an iron conduit pipe of fifty-seven miles to Oakland, and thence by a tunnel under the bay to the city reservoirs and distribution, or by a conduit pipe around the head of the bay sixty-seven miles further, and a second pumping work. The total length of this line would be 124 miles.

Another plan is to pump the water from the San Joaquin River to a reservoir at Livermore pass, and from thence convey it around the head of the bay to the city reservoirs by an iron conduit pipe of eighty-four miles in length.

The general features of these several schemes have been presented in as brief and succinct a manner as possible, so as to enable the expression of opinions upon them in a group, as compared with the two other schemes for obtaining a water supply from the nearest sources, and thus narrow the discussion of the subject as much as possible.

It has been already stated that each of these several sources will furnish water of a suitable quality and in sufficient quantity to supply the present and future demand of the city.

The foregoing description of the plans, routes, etc., for the several last mentioned schemes shows that the hazards of construction, maintenance, and cost are comparatively so great that any further detailed examination of the cost is unnecessary at the present time for the purpose stated.

These brief descriptions show that all of these schemes require much longer lines of canals, pipes, etc.; that they must be carried under one or more navigable water courses, or encounter the largely additional expense of a long detour around the head of the bay; some of them involve the untold and questionable project of a long tunnel under the deep waters of the bay, and others the constant charge for pumping the water. In line, that each one must necessarily be very much more expensive in construction, and more costly and hazardous in maintenance, than the Peninsula and Calaveras schemes.

In regard to all of the schemes, except the combined one of the Spring Valley and Calaveras, it may be stated that to complete them, so as to furnish and properly distribute as much water as can be obtained from the Peninsula system alone, would require an outlay fully double that of the latter, and to furnish a supply equal to the combined quantity which the Peninsula and Calaveras districts are capable of furnishing, by either one of the antagonistic schemes, would cost many times as much.

If we omit from this comparison the hazards attending the construction and maintenance of the necessarily long lines of iron conduits, under excessive pressure and partly submarine, the expense of these conflicting plans alone would preclude their further consideration, in comparison with the evidently simple and practical system of the Spring Valley and Calaveras system.

A NEW ENGLAND MYSTERY.

NEW YORK, December 10, 1878.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Drifting lazily about the hunting grounds of the ancient Puritans, I was happily stranded upon a village that had a mystery—one of those of which Hawthorne has made such artistic use in The House of the Seven Gables, and which are not uncommon even in these prosaic days in that favored land settled by the sombre old Fathers of the Past. Relating the story to a philosophic young physician of the modern school of thought, he rather amused me by attributing these anomalies to dyspepsia—a universal New England complaint, induced, as my friend maintains, by two hundred and fifty years of bad cooking under a system whose god is the frying-pan, and salutaris his prophet. My mystery, however, be it stomachic, brain-engendered, or heart-produced, is not haggard and appalling like that of the great novelist, but lovely as an idyllic dream, as you shall presently read. Lili W., the heroine of the story, belongs to the bluest blood of the Mayflower nobility, the Brahmin caste of New England, as Dr. Holmes calls it. Her father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all lawyers of distinction, representatives of their respective towns from time immemorial, and each one, as his portrait testifies, a handsome and stately gentleman of the old school of aristocrats. As the family had inherited wealth for many generations, Lili, a flower-like beauty from babyhood, was brought up in the midst of the utmost culture and refinement. About twenty years of age, this exquisite and gracious creature, in the first flush of her girlhood, withdrew from society, and has remained a recluse ever since. She occupies her time in writing and in correspondence (her letters are said to rival those of Sévigné in wit, and Lady Mary Wortley Montague's in solid sense) with all the great authors of the day. I do not know whether she has published anything or not, but it is certain that if she has her identity is yet to be revealed. When I was in H. the authorship of the "Saxe Holme" stories was attributed to her, and several of the local papers published long and exhaustive articles to prove that she was the writer of them. Now, though the heroes of these stories (which, in spite of their crudity and inconsequence, are strangely fascinating) are just such hand-box, pink-cottony, satin-finished masculine impossibilities as a woman so utterly ignorant of the real world as recluse-like Lili must necessarily be would create, yet her well known integrity and nobleness of character leave no room to doubt the truth of her denial of their authorship. But few of her mother's dearest friends, even, have ever beheld this unique Protestant nun, one of whose innocent and graceful peculiarities is to wear white in both summer and winter. At her late father's funeral many went to the house for the express purpose of seeing the mysterious Lili, but their vulgar curiosity was baffled, for the White Lady of Avenal sat behind her chamber door, and only listened to the service. A glimpse of her snowy vesture was all that these worthy seekers after forbidden knowledge gaped by their effort to look upon the Woman in White. Of course this strange story quite captivated my imagination, and I button-holed every one I met for an explanation of the charming mystery. Said her cousin, whom I cross-questioned until life must have been a burden to her: "Although I have lived here for the last twelve years, I know my cousin Lili only as a lovely voice. The 'honey of her music tones' floats up from the hall below in a jubilant 'Good morning,' for she seems always to be happy, or a merry 'Good night,' and with these I must be content, for I have never been cunning enough to catch sight of her." One day a dear friend of her father's, whom she has known from childhood, and whom she has never refused to see, obtained her consent to meet his daughter. The latter, who was quite dazed with her fascinations, described her to me as a beautiful woman, looking about twenty-five years of age, of slender and delicate proportions, with a wild-rose color on cheek and lip, forehead and throat cream-white; bronze-brown eyes, unspeakably tender and loving; and that Titianesque hair, beside which all other tints seem so poor and mean. Her voice—by all accounts—is the most remarkable thing about her. Perhaps it is because, like Echo, she is never seen, that so many persons declare it to be—"Better than all the ballads

That ever were sung or said."

With the above meagre sketch I had to be satisfied, and I left her in the seclusion of her beautiful home, worshipped by her mother and sister, petted and courted by the poets and writers of the day, and a lovely and adorable mystery to the people among whom she was born.

E. O. N. E.

Perhaps this little cube so smooth and white,
Like polished ivory, used to gaily dwell
Upon some queenly, shy, and spirituelle
Diana-like creature, who would cause delight
To thrill her food "Sir Romeo," and, at night,
His visions gild with sunshine. Who can tell
But that you belonged unto some pensive L.
E. L. of chaste poetic appetite?

Perchance you've rubbed against some flower-bell
In some bright garden's solitudes of musk,
Where humming-bird his iris plumage preens.
But, anyhow, was found, I know full well,
When Artemis dispels the dreamful dusk,
You'll slily peep from a dish of gold-brown beans.

"Ah, by George," groaned young Mr. Lethered, sinking wearily into an office chair, "ah, by George, my head aches fearfully." "Possible?" asked his employer, old Mr. Hardfax, with a look of curious interest and sympathy. "Possible? Something must have got into it." And then for a long time nobody said anything, and the room seemed to grow about fifteen degrees colder.

There was a young woman of Worcester,
She petted an old Shanghai rooster;
When asked what indorchester
To fondle the rooster,
She blushed, for the question conforchester.

A New Hampshire man got up to light a lamp and fell dead. Our readers will bear witness that we have always pointed out that this getting up at night is a man's wife's business. Behold the terrible justification of our course!

Advice to the gas companies (easier given than taken) apropos of the electric light: Don't be put out by it.

The family which makes a big show at a funeral is the first to put up a cheap tombstone.

CUT THIS OUT.
A GRAND OFFER!
SILVERWARE FREE FOR ALL

The Old Reliable ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., whose Metropolitan Headquarters are located at 258 and 260 Broadway, New York City, and Factory at Providence, R. I., have determined to introduce goods of their manufacture in every city and hamlet in the United States and Canada. To do this, we will present to each lady reader of this paper a set of four COIN PLATED SILVER SPOONS, with your last name or initials elegantly engraved on each spoon, the only charge will be 75 cents to defray expense of engraving name, packing and express charges. To avail yourself of this grand holiday offer, it will be necessary to cut out the attached Certificate No. 240, and forward it with 75 cents on or before March 1st, 1879, to the Royal Manufacturing Co., New York.

CUT THIS CERTIFICATE OUT.

It will not appear in this paper again.

On receipt of this Certificate, together with seventy-five cents in Currency, Silver or Postage Stamps we agree to hand each lady reader a set of four COIN PLATED SILVER SPOONS, with your last name or initials elegantly engraved on each spoon, the only charge will be 75 cents to defray expense of engraving name, packing and express charges. To avail yourself of this grand holiday offer, it will be necessary to cut out the attached Certificate No. 240, and forward it with 75 cents on or before March 1st, 1879, to the Royal Manufacturing Co., New York.

ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., 258 Broadway, N. Y.

We claim for our Silver Plated Ware that for durability and elegance of design we can not be excelled. We first handle plate with nickel—the hardest white metal known—and then follow with a plating of pure Coin Silver, thus making the most durable plate yet discovered, and you will find by every daily use, this quality and design of five spoons will cost you only $1.50 per set, without your name engraved thereon. On each and every article of our Table Cutlery our name is stamped and we have our design copyrighted, thus preventing irresponsible and unscrupulous dealers and advertisers from peddling an article of our manufacture at a low price. In addition each spoon is a crown with the word ROYAL in the hand, and on the reverse side R. M. Co. is stamped. In addition to the above offer should you wish to order Knives, Forks or Table spoons of the same time you order Tea Spoons we will furnish any article or all of them at the following reduced prices, and prepay all shipping charges, viz.: 6 Solid Steel Knives, blade and handle one solid piece, best steel covered with a heavy plating of Nickel and Silver, $1.75; 6 Forks, 50 cents; 6 Table Spoons, $1.25; or total for Knives, Forks, Tea and Table Spoons, $4.65. The Table Spoons and Forks are of the same design and of the same quality as the Tea Spoons, and will be engraved without extra cost, the Knives being of steel will not be engraved.

Remember we do not stamp your name, but have experienced workmen engrave your last name in full on each article as desired. We will not furnish any of the above goods at prices named unless accompanied by the above Certificate, as we only wish to send out a limited quantity as an advertisement, well knowing in any family we place our Table Ware it will be a standing advertisement for the sale of our other goods, a catalogue of which is mailed with each shipment.

As to our reliability we quote the following from our New York papers, and refer you to any responsible house in this city.

"The Royal Manufacturing Co., 258 and 260 Broadway, is one of the most reliable, enterprising and reasonable houses of this city."—Colonial American Farmer, R. Y., April 18, 1878.

"The Royal Manufacturing Co., of this city have sustained a well earned reputation for reliability by sending out goods guaranteed to be exactly as represented, and by this means purchasers get only the best goods at more reasonable prices than large dealers pay by wholesale."—Editorial Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, April 13, 1878.

"A representative of our paper was shown through the establishment of the Royal Manufacturing Co., 258 and 260 Broadway, and was surprised at the handsome character of the goods sent at such extraordinary low prices."—The Independent, R. Y., June 23, 1878.

In ordering give full instructions how you wish your name engraved, and write your name plain and in full. If an express office is not in your town, we will send by mail. Postage stamps will be received at their face value. All letters ordering Silverware must be addressed to the ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., 258 Broadway, New York.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1846.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCOMANUFACTURERS OF Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloroziding Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental
Hotel.

OFFICE OF THE CALIFORNIA
Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 26, 1878.—
The annual meeting of the stockholders of the California Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, No. 23 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, on Wednesday, January fifteenth, 1879, at one o'clock P. M., for the election of a Board of Directors for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will be closed from January 4th until January 17th.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE
stockholders of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, for the election of a Board of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may be properly brought before the meeting, will be held at the office of the Company, Room 47 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Wednesday, the fifteenth day of January, 1879, at one o'clock P. M. Transfer books will be closed on Wednesday, January 8th, 1879, until after the meeting.

San Francisco, December 27th, 1878.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER
Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 14th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.

Office—203 Bush Street, Room 10, Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco, California.

ARIZONA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Unionville, Humboldt County, State of Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the ninth (9th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on MONDAY, the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the third (3rd) day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

THE DEL REY SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Silver City, Lyon County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Trustees, held on the 11th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 3) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary or Treasurer, at the office of the Company, No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

SAM'L A. CHAPIN, Secretary.

Office—No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fourth (4th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar per share, was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-seventh day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

E. E. HOLMES, Secretary.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

S. MAGGIE WHEELER, plaintiff, vs. GIRARD B. H. WHEELER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to GIRARD B. H. WHEELER, defendant:

You are hereby notified that in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—your judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds of failure to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, and extreme cruelty, as said plaintiff, by her complaint, and that the said plaintiff is allowed to resume her maiden name, to wit: S. Maggie Saunders, as will more fully appear in the plaintiff's complaint herein, to which reference is hereunto expressly made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL.) By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
TILDEN & WILSON, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital $200,000
Assets exceed 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President.

FERD. K. RULE Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER General Agent.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS $450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IYERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the tenth (10th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 6) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the fifteenth (15th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on FRIDAY, the seventh day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARTHA A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant.

You are hereby notified that in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—your judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL.) By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETTA GOODHUE, plaintiff vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant:

You are hereby notified that in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—your judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL.) By J. H. PICHENS, Deputy Clerk.
WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

Every one of our readers should carefully peruse the advertisement of the Royal Manufacturing Co., of New York, which appears for the first time in our issue of this date. The goods will speak for themselves, while the responsibility of the firm is vouched for by the editorial indorsements.

The finest work at lowest prices at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Great reduction in photographs at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Decker Bro.'s Pianos, the leading piano of the world, at Kohler & Chase's, 137 and 139 Post St.

Children's pictures a specialty at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Try E. H. Hubbard's Parisian Cream for the complexion. 923 Market Street.

The finest candies in the city are to be had at the Clarendon, 213 Kearny Street, of Love & Goldstein. Try them.

The finest French and purest home-made candies found at Vogley's, 915 Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

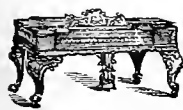

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE
PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

RARE ENGRAVINGS

MODERN FRENCH ETCHINGS.

A CHOICE COLLECTION OF THE best Proof Engravings and Etchings always on hand. Rare Engravings procured. All interested in Art are welcome to inspect collection either as visitors or purchasers. W. K. VICKERY, 22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—FRANCO.

American Savings Bank, 214 Bush Street.—For the half year ending December 31, 1878, a dividend has been declared at the rate of seven and two-tenths (7 2-10) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and six (6) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of Federal tax, payable on and after January 15, 1879. A. COMTE, Jr., Manager. L. BRAND, Secretary.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHAS. E. LOCKE, PROPRIETOR.

A Short Season of Genuine Negro Minstrelsy, commencing Monday, Evening, Jan. 6. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Mr. J. H. HAVERLY has the pleasure of announcing his recent acquisition, and their first appearance in San Francisco of the famous, original, and popular Eastern

"It is gratifying to see that no imputation is brought against them of presenting anything offensive to the eye or ear."
Hon. Wm. Lloyd Garrison

Troupe of Genuine Negroes,

Known during the past 13 years as

CALLENDER'S GEORGIA MINSTRELS!

Comprising a skilled and efficient, varied and artistic corps of the best Southern Negro talent, who unite to the naturalness and spontaneity of their humor the skill and culture which come from years of thorough training and constant experience.

Uproarious!
Original!
Unrivalled!

Six End Men.
Six End Men.
Six End Men.

Twenty Artists.
Twenty Artists.
Twenty Artists.

Characteristic!
Refined!
Irresistible!

ORGANIZED THIRTEEN YEARS.

Forming a characteristic and rollicking entertainment, greatly varied in many particulars from the customary Minstrel performances, a mirth abounding budget of

UPROARIOUS PLANTATION SKETCHES, INIMITABLE SLAVE-LIFE MELODIES, UNEQUALED NEGRO DIVERSIONS,
ROLICKING LEVEE ABSURDITIES,
CAMP-MEETING VARIETIES.

Characteristic Flat-boat Pastimes, Side-splitting Barnyard Echoes, Exquisite and Marvelous Banjo Performances, Artistic Song and Dance Duets and Quartets, Phenomenal Vocal Effects, Burlesque Jig and Plantation Dances, etc., showing the Darks as he is at home, in a spirited and truthful display of

GENUINE NEGRO MINSTRELSY.

Seats secured at the box office. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays, at 2 P. M.

J. H. HAVERLY, PROPRIETOR. DANIEL AND GUSTAVE FROHMAN, MANAGERS.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

CALIFORNIA SPOOL SILK.

The Extra 100 Yards. Quarter Ounce. Ounce Spools. Embroidery Silks.

THE BEST IN USE.

Manufactured in San Francisco, supporting over 100 white women and girls. Sold by all first-class dealers.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slabs of marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

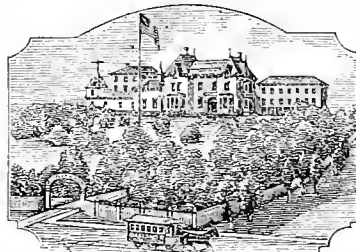

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH,
German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—
with
KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age.
The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1853) will commence on MONDAY, January 6th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address
MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

CALIFORNIA MILITARY

ACADEMY.

The next term will commence January 2, 1879.

REV. DAVID MCCLURE, PH. D., Principal, Oakland, Cal.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.

This (Saturday) afternoon, Jan. 4th, grand Ladies Matinee.

LAST MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

MR. JOSH HART

And his NOVELTY COMPANY.

This (Saturday) evening, January 4, last night but one of

THE WHITE CROOK.

Monday, January 6, reappearance of the great favorites,

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY,

In Byron's fascinating musical burlesque,

BABES IN THE WOOD,
Or WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN? With all its wealth of fun and merriment.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LISTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER

Immense success of the grand musical, military, dramatic, and spectacular Christmas piece,

NOT GUILTY.

The whole of the GREAT COMPANY in the cast.

THIS (SATURDAY) EVENING, January 4th, and every evening, including Sunday, until further notice.

MATINEE SATURDAY AT 2 O'CLOCK.

In active preparation, the last London success, the

GREEN LANES OF ENGLAND.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

HOUSES CROWDED NIGHTLY.

Monday Evening, January 6th, last nights of Mr. and Mrs.

W. J. FLORENCE,

THE MIGHTY DOLLAR.

Last Nights of Hon. Bardwell Slote.
Last Nights of Mrs. General Gilfory.
Entire Change of Toilets.

Friday Evening, January 10, FAREWELL BENEFIT of MR. W. J. FLORENCE.

Monday Evening, January 13—

NO THOROUGHFARE.

Mr. Florence in his great character of OBENREIZER.

Seats may now be secured.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veilings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—San Francisco

Savings Union, 532 California Street, corner Webb. For the half year ending with December 31, 1878, a dividend has been declared at the rate of seven and two-tenths (7 2-10) per cent. per annum on term deposits, and six (6) per cent. per annum on ordinary deposits, free of Federal tax, payable on and after January 15, 1879. LOVELL WHITE, Cashier.

December 28, 1878.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—The German

Savings and Loan Society.—For the half year ending this date, the Board of Directors of the German Savings and Loan Society has declared a dividend on Term Deposits at the rate of seven and one-half (7 1-2) per cent. per annum, and on Ordinary Deposits at the rate of six and one-fourth (6 1-4) per cent. per annum, free from Federal taxes, and payable on and after the 15th day of January, 1879. By order. GEO. LETTE, Secretary. San Francisco, December 31, 1878.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 2.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 11, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

All Christmas day we spent with Theodore S. Hittell, gossiping of the olden time, recalling the history of thirty years in San Francisco—a history in which we have taken an active part, and in nearly all the incidents of which we have participated. Listening to his recital and hearing his version, sometimes approving, sometimes dissenting, we smoked our meerschaum, he running on through five hundred pages of narrative in detail of San Franciscan and Californian events. Thirty years, from boyhood to manhood, and during that time we have seen a village so insignificant that it had scarce a mention on the map, grow till it became a leading centre of population, commerce, industry, wealth, luxury, and of intellectual, political, and financial activity. We have seen the indigenous chaparral give way to tents, these to cloth-lined wooden buildings, and these to public and private palaces that rival the houses of European princes. We have seen all the stirring scenes of insurrection in favor of the law, and have taken a part in the time when rebellion in favor of authority overthrew organized crime, and brought order out of social chaos. We have seen the sand dunes upon the barren shores of the Pacific give place to a great commercial emporium that pushed itself into the waters of the bay, and built a thousand houses and miles of streets upon piles, rivaling the exploits of Venice and Amsterdam. We have seen the development of a mining industry that lifted rivers from their beds, washed away the towering hills, followed up and cleaned out the channels of the immense streams of an ancient geological era. Of this we have been a part; with pick, pan, rocker, and shovel, on foot trudging wearily, on mule back, proudly on mountain coach—just as the sack of hard-earned gold-dust was plethoric or scant. We have climbed the hills and crossed the valleys—a pioneer of two States—searching for gold in California, for silver in Nevada. We have seen laid the foundation of two prosperous commonwealths. We have aided to lay their foundations and to erect the superstructures, and in all the wild commotions, and in all the struggles of physical force or popular opinion, we have taken a part, and never an uncertain one—sometimes right and sometimes wrong, but always earnest and always honest. When the historian of this era—this, to us, heroic period—comes and sits with us in our library of a Christmas day, he recalls—in the language we have borrowed—all these memories of our active life, all these stirring incidents of times that have been the romance of our existence.

California is to us "God's country," San Francisco is the Holy City, the city of refuge, the State and city we have aided to build. The soil of our State is sacred to us—sacred in the sense in which the Ganges and the Nile valleys, Jerusalem, Rome, and Nauvoo, are sacred—and, still listening, why should we not be proud of it? The commerce, the wealth, the literature, and the art of San Francisco; the hydraulic washings and quartz mines of the Sierra Nevada; the quicksilver furnaces of the coast range; the borax deposits of the inclosed basin east of the Snowy Mountains; the wheat fields of the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys; the orange and olive groves of the southern coast; the sub-tropical valleys, the semi-frigid Californian Alps; the even, cool climate of our middle coast; a thousand precious mineral springs of various qualities, adapted to cure a hundred different phases of disease; an exemption from the influences which lead to the spread of many of the most formidable epidemics elsewhere, and the possession of remarkable advantages for sanitary purposes by large districts—these form an aggregate sufficient to stimulate the pride of all pioneers. To these natural advantages we have added by the works of our hands and our brains; we have laid broad and deep, and we believe enduring, the foundations of two great, prosperous, and progressive States that shall survive as long as intelligence, strength, and manly valor can give permanence to government.

So long as Mr. Hittell confined himself to the Indian and Mission era we were perforce silent, for of these times we were not. Of Drake and Visciano, and old Padre Junipero Serra, of savage life and Mission labors, we deferred to his superior knowledge, and in this recognized that superior industry and research that makes such men as Mr. Hittell indispensable to idle men like ourselves, who will not search through musty archives if history were never written. We accepted with unquestioning confidence his narrative of the earlier days of the Bear flag, of the final transformation of California from under Mexican to American rule, and of the early discovery of gold by Marshall in the tail-race of Sutter's saw-mill at Colusa, in El Dorado County. When he came to narrate the incoming overland immigration across the plains in 1849, we pricked our ears with critical interest. We were one of that innumerable caravan that dared the dangers of the trans-continental trip. Pushing out from the frontier of Missouri, at Independence we lost sight of land, entered upon the limitless ocean of grass, and navigated our way on muleback across the prairie from which the sun arose in the morning and into which it went down at night. We arrived at the tail end of the village era just in the early morning of the golden era. We were of the eager, ambitious, anxious throng that, with blankets, rocker, frying-pan, and grub, prospected mountain gulches for gold, worked placer ravines, sought for the sources of gold at the sources of rivers; camped from January till July upon the north fork of the Yuba for the waters to decline that we might get shovelfuls of dust from the river bed; lived in a tent of boughs all through the winter; did our own washing, cooked our own beans and slap-jacks, and toiled from morning to night, never dreaming that if we were idle, shiftless, and drunken the time would come when, by organizing against the industrious and successful, we could compel him to divide his earnings and savings with us.

After a year of mining we came to San Francisco, and when the great awkward arms of the signal on Telegraph Hill flung themselves upward from the skeleton frame, we joined the whole population of San Francisco in a race to the beach, to give a welcome to ships and steamers bringing us news, friends, and a welcome addition to our population. Of an early municipal government we were the attorney, turned out by a Democratic election trick. We rejoiced at the admission of California to the Union, took part in the great procession, saw the great fires. We fought the Vigilance Committee of 1851 and 1856, knew Walker and his band of filibusters, and helped Hicks Graham to shoot him in a duel. We knew Harry Meigs, his crimes, and his flight; knew James King of William and Casey, and think Cora was the victim of a heedless, unthinking mob, and that his killing of Marshal Richardson was justifiable, and in self-defense against a bold, reckless, bloody-minded desperado. In taking his life the Vigilance Committee was guilty of murder, the crime only lacking the element of guilty intent. The trial of Burdue, and his mistaken identity for the murderer Stuart, was a crime; it was only accidental that it was not a cruel tragedy, and Mr. Hittell is inexact when he says that the Vigilance Committee saved him from execution by the authorities. Burdue was indebted to B. F. Washington and the writer of this article that he was not an innocent victim of mob violence. It is too late now to question the results flowing from the Vigilance Committee, and it is too late to apologize for a movement that was of questionable necessity, and that never ought to be presented as an example for the guidance of new communities.

We pass hastily along an exciting period of our early times, giving Mr. Hittell credit for a faithful and usually a fair recital of events of which we believe he had but little personal knowledge. His descriptions of the expeditions of Gaston de Raousset Boulbon, of Walker, and of Crabb, are correct. His narrative of political events from the time of Broderick's first advent are mainly correct, colored, we think, with a strong bias against Mr. Broderick, amounting in one or two cases almost to a misrepresentation of the character, conduct, and motives of a man who did much to mould public opinion in this State, and who did more than any other person to give to our politics emancipation from dangerous plottings of ambitious, reckless, and we then believed unprincipled politicians, who were working in the interest of Southern slavery. It is too soon to write the biography of David C. Broderick; his life was too active, his resentments too strong, he punished his enemies too severely, his triumphs were too complete, and the defeat of his opponents was too overwhelming, to permit any one to do justice to the memory of Mr. Broderick so long as they live. In our judgment Mr. Hittell has not done him justice. Then comes the war with all its excitements; California was too far from the theatre of action to take an active part. The part it did take was exceedingly creditable to it; and there is an interesting chapter of secret intrigue and plotting on the part of Southern-born sympathizers to take California out of the Union, which Mr. Hittell either does not know, or perhaps thinks its telling would be premature at this time when so many of the conspirators are living and so many of them are still among us. Had Mr. Broderick lived he would have taken a prominent part in national politics—a patriotic, fearless part—and in our judgment it would have been creditable to him; his death at the hands of Judge David S. Terry was a great, and we think irreparable, loss to our State. His death seems the more cruel at this time, when Judge Terry seeks prominence in a Constitutional Convention, as a leader of the worst and meanest element of a class that Mr. Broderick obtained discredit for controlling. As for Senator Gwin and his party associates, we feel the same embarrassment in undertaking to criticise them as caused the historian to speak lightly of their political offenses: they still live.

The earthquake of 1865, the ruin of the Republican party by Gorham, the diamond fraud, the Goat Island blunder, the death of Ralston, the failure of the Bank of California, the Virginia fire, the dry winter, the hard times, and the advent of Kearney, are all calamities within the recollection of the present generation. The discovery of silver in Washoe, the building of the Central and Southern Pacific Railroads, the Belcher, Savage, and Consolidated Virginia bonanzas, the establishment of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, the financial career of Messrs. Flood, O'Brien, Mackey, and Fair, the building of palaces on Nob Hill, are all events too recent to come fairly within the domain of history. All these events had necessarily to be discussed by Mr. Hittell in bringing the story of our city down to the centennial period, and we must admit that he has treated them with intelligence, candor, and fairness. His book is a success. He has, as a rule, dealt kindly with the dead, and has been guilty only of suppressing some ugly facts in the career of the living. It is a well performed and conscientiously executed task, and one that was not without its serious embarrassments. Every old Californian and pioneer who has lived through the village era, the golden era, the golden era in decline, the silver era, down to the era of the ARGONAUT, who peruses Mr. Hittell's history of San Francisco, will thank him for a duty well performed. The book is handsomely gotten up by Bancroft & Co., and should be in every gentleman's library, especially so, as we understand the proceeds of the sale in some way go to our city charities.

We would think the Bulletin-Call-Chronicle libel case a bad-smelling sausage of many links if we were compelled to read it. It is a controversy to the discussion of which long columns of editorials and testimony in three leading journals are devoted, and one about which no living soul outside the parties involved takes the least interest; a fight that no one cares who wins; a contest that involves no principle, and out of which will come no results. Did the Chronicle proprietors endeavor to prevent themselves from being indicted? This seems to be one of the important questions. No man ever lived in the world, guilty or innocent, who would not endeavor to prevent a criminal presentation against himself, law or no law. The money expended for lawyers, for witnesses, traveling expenses, and hotel bills, for court expenses, for reporters, and printer's ink, might much better be laid out by these journals in bettering the character of their newspapers. A curious feature of this newspaper business is that the proprietors seem to take pride in being indicted for libel, in suing and abusing each other, and appear to regard the notoriety of these contests as akin to fame. They seem ambitious to give publicity to each nauseous detail (reminding us of Judge Baldwin's story), taking pride in that which would mortify and humiliate other and better men. No merchant, no professional or business man in this community, having so many indictments brought against him, so many actions of a quasi criminal nature, or who was so constantly engaged in offensive and criminatory law suits, would be regarded as respectable. In this respect the conduct of Messrs. Pickering, Fitch, and Charles and Michael de Young is offensive. That they as editors enjoy an opportunity to flaunt their personal growls in the face of the community makes their crime the greater. Either they ought to desist from creating these unpleasant and malodorous sights and smells, or their papers should be abated as nuisances at common law.

A SINGED CAT.

By E. H. Clough.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

With these words of farewell, Tom drove the spurs into the sides of his mustang and dashed up the road. Those whom he left did not say much after Tom had gone, but busied themselves with the simple preparations for the funeral. Everything was ready for the last, sad rites, and Hiram had brought a light spring wagon to the front door, as the undertaker drove his black-covered wagon through the gate.

Several neighbors arrived, and a Methodist minister, who had been sent for at the request of the mother, said the last and only prayers ever offered for Silas Inch. Then the coffin was closed, and the sister dropped a few wild flowers upon the cover—fit emblems of the life of her brother. The mother wept piteously, and the tears ran down the deep furrows of her sorrow-stricken face, and fell upon the bosom that had pillowed her lost boy's head in the far away, unconscious days of his infancy before the black clouds of reckless manhood lowered over his life.

The little train was slowly passing out of the front yard when half a dozen mounted men, headed by the Sheriff of the county, dashed up to the fence and dismounted. Drawing their revolvers they advanced upon the procession, and surrounding the wagon upon which Hiram was seated, the Sheriff ordered him to alight.

"I guess I'll have a chance to git even with the Singed Cat this time," was the exultant remark of Swingle, who stood close behind his superior.

Hiram obeyed the command of the Sheriff without a word, and was immediately handcuffed by the officious Swingle. He was then searched, and placed upon a spare horse. Mrs. Inch was so absorbed with her own great grief that she did not notice the rapid movements of her husband's captors until Inch said:

"Good-bye, ol' woman; bury the boy an' come down to the jail."

Then she looked up, but her eye betrayed no more emotion than if nothing unusual was happening—her spirit seemed broken by an overwhelming sorrow. She only asked:

"What're yer took up fur?"

"Highway robbery," replied Swingle; "stopped the stage two nights ago right here at this door. He's in fur it now, you bet."

The Sheriff ordered his men to mount, and the two parties separated, the mother to pay a mother's last sad tribute over the grave of her dead son, and the father to enter a prison cell.

XL.—THE CAT ESCAPES AGAIN.

As Hiram Inch lay within the narrow confines of his cell, on the night of his arrest, he made a mental recapitulation of the events of the past few days, and the conclusion he reached was that Staghart had been the cause of all his misfortunes. He had learned from Fogle, who had by some means unknown to Hiram become cognizant of the Bald Mountain conspiracy, that the story told by Ikes was true in every particular. All the circumstances pointed to Staghart as his arch enemy; and he had no doubt whatever that from Staghart emanated the absurd attempt to replevin the coffin in which lay the body of Silas—an attempt made for the sole purpose of harassing and annoying him. While he had been in custody he had learned that the charge upon which he had been arrested was based upon the robbery of the mail stage, which passed through Mammoth City about two o'clock each morning. All that was definitely known in regard to the matter was that two men, one of them very tall and the other considerably shorter, had ordered the driver to halt and throw down the express box. The robbery occurred on the morning that Ikes visited Inch, within an hour after that repentant conspirator left the house. Hiram had no difficulty in tracing his arrest to Staghart, for the latter was on the stage when it was robbed, and had been more active than anybody else in following the clues home to Inch. The result of these reflections was a heartfelt desire for vengeance upon Staghart and Marks. Inch's anger did not extend to Ikes, who he knew had been but a tool in the hands of Staghart. He had good sense enough to understand that Ikes had killed Silas in self-defense, and his prompt revelation of the conspiracy was sufficient to condone all else. During the long hours of the night Hiram meditated, and, as the first light of dawn penetrated the barred window in the wall above him, he arose, and taking the tin dipper in his hand struck the door of the cell with it several times. In a few moments a keeper approached and asked him what he wanted.

"My wife," answered Inch.

"It's too early yet," said the jailer.

"What time ken I see her?" asked Hiram.

"About eight o'clock," replied the keeper.

"Send fur her?" inquired Inch.

"If you want to see her very bad—yes."

"And Fogle?"

"Yes; I s'pose he'll defend you—you go before the Justice this mornin' on your preliminary examination."

A short conversation about the robbery ensued, and the keeper left him.

At eight o'clock Fogle visited him, and a long consultation followed, interrupted by the entrance of Mrs. Inch. Having received her husband's instructions in regard to sundry minor matters she left, and until half past nine o'clock Fogle and Inch plotted, devising ways and means of escape for Hiram and revenge upon his enemies.

At half-past nine o'clock Fogle attended the court and obtained a continuance of his client's case until the next morning. This gave both sides an opportunity to gather in all their evidence, and at ten o'clock on the following day the little court-room was crowded. The case of the People vs. Hiram Inch was called, and after the usual preliminaries the prosecution placed their witness on the stand.

The stage-driver swore that he was ordered to halt by two men about two o'clock on the morning in question. Both of these men were masked, and disguised in heavy overcoats and slouched hats. It was dark and raining hard, so that witness could not state positively in regard to any physical characteristics that might have been apparent if there had been any.

All that he was positive about was that one of them was very tall and the other rather short, and that both of them carried shotguns. "The wust lookin' weepins o' ther kind I ever examined," he explained, at which the crowd laughed heartily.

William Staghart testified that he was in the stage when it was stopped, and corroborated the testimony of the driver in regard to the general appearance of the men. When asked if he could identify the men, he said he thought he could if they were brought before him dressed as they were upon that occasion. An overcoat and a slouch hat were procured and placed upon Inch, and a piece of black cloth hung over his face. Staghart started with well feigned amazement, and declared that the similarity was perfect, or at least it only required the shotgun to render it so, a remark that caused another burst of laughter from the crowd outside the building. He also testified that he had assisted in tracing the perpetrators of the robbery. He had taken the trouble to return to the scene of the crime early on the following morning, postponing his journey and leaving the stage at the first stopping-place. He had carefully measured the tracks in the mud, and knew the size of the boots each man wore. Here he gave the measurements.

"Where did you say you were on the night that this stage was stopped, Mr. Staghart?" asked Fogle.

"On the inside of the stage," replied Staghart.

"What time did you board the stage?"

"About two o'clock."

"Where?"

"In Mammoth City."

"Are you sure that you got on the stage in Mammoth City?"

"Well, not exactly in Mammoth City, but not far from it. I walked out a piece and the driver picked me up."

"Now, Mr. Staghart, don't you think it was rather a curious proceeding on your part to walk out of town in a driving rainstorm, and wait until the stage came along to pick you up?"

"I was wrapped up in a heavy overcoat and didn't mind it."

"Oh, you didn't, eh? Mr. Staghart, where were you two hours before you boarded the stage?"

Staghart started, this time with genuine amazement, but the movement was so slight that it escaped the attention of all except Fogle and Inch, both of whom were watching the witness like lynxes.

"Where was I?" asked Staghart.

"Yes, where were you? I think I spoke plain enough," answered Fogle.

"I was at home," replied Staghart.

"At home, eh? Remember, Mr. Staghart, that you are on your oath. Do you swear positively that you were at home two hours before you got into that stage?"

"I do."

"That will do; step down."

The next witness called was Phineas Dodd, a shoemaker. This witness testified that he made the boots worn by the tall robber. He was positive on this point, because they were unusually large, and having viewed the tracks in the mud at the instance of the Sheriff, knew them as his own manufacture on account of their configuration, and the manner in which the heavy nails had been arranged in the soles. He had made the boots to order for Hiram Inch, the prisoner at the bar. Fogle did not question this witness at all, but asked permission to recall the driver of the stage. The request was granted, and the lawyer examined him upon when, where, and how he received Staghart as a passenger, and as every question was objected to by the prosecuting attorney as "irrelevant," and on the grounds that Staghart was not on trial, gained, by counter argument, all the time which he found necessary for the safe arrival of a certain important witness.

The prosecution called the Sheriff, who corroborated the testimony of Staghart and the shoemaker in regard to the tracks in the mud. He also detailed the circumstances of the arrest.

Fogle only asked this witness a few unimportant but somewhat sarcastic questions in regard to whether "this desperate highwayman, only just recovering from a severe gun shot wound, did not make a stubborn resistance when arrested?"

Three physicians were placed on the stand by the prosecution to prove that Inch's wounds were not of such a character as to prevent his being present or assisting at a stage robbery, especially as it occurred within half a mile of his own door.

The prosecution rested at this point, and Fogle called Levi Marks. Nobody was more surprised at this summons than Levi himself, and he mounted the stand trembling with fear.

"Where were you on the night that this stage was robbed, Mr. Marks?" asked Fogle.

"Vere vash I? Shacob und Aberam! I vash mit mine own houses ashleep mit mine own pets, so helup me Moshes."

"How long had you been asleep at the time the stage was robbed, Mr. Marks?"

"Mine Got, Mishter Fogle, you don't make out dot I vash shtael dem stage monish?"

"I didn't say you stole the 'stage monish,' Mr. Marks. I asked you how long you had been asleep at the time the stage was robbed—it occurred about two o'clock, I believe."

"How vash I tole you dot? You shose I vash count der hours und keep mine eyes shut too?"

"Don't equivocate, Mr. Marks, but answer my question."

Here the prosecution objected, failing to perceive the relevancy of the examination. This objection called forth some more sarcastic remarks from Fogle in regard to the witness being his and his right to proceed with the examination as he saw fit.

The objection was overruled by the Court and the question was repeated. Marks finally said that he did not know how long he had been asleep, but supposed that he fell asleep immediately after going to bed, which important circumstance occurred at about half past nine or ten o'clock.

"Did you see Mr. Staghart that night?" asked Fogle.

"I object, your Honor," interrupted the Prosecuting Attorney; "I do not see what Mr. Staghart, in connection with Mr. Marks, has got to do with this robbery. Mr. Fogle has certainly failed to elicit anything from this witness tending to show such a condition of fact."

"Your Honor, I wish to show by this witness that Mr. Staghart's testimony is wholly unworthy of belief, under that maxim of law which holds that testimony false in one particular is likely to be false throughout. I wish to show, if I am permitted to do so, that Mr. Staghart was not at home two hours before he took his seat in the stage, and moreover that he was in the company of this witness under very suspicious circumstances. I will endeavor—"

"How you foun' dot out, Mishter Fogle? So belup me Aberam, I don't haf notings to do mit der gillin' pizness—Ikesy does dot. I fixes der monish pizness." Marks was in a terrible state of mind, and the great beads of perspiration stood out on his forehead and even ran down, like Aaron's ointment, to his beard.

"There, you're Honor, you see that this witness does know something after all. I propose—"

"Proceed, Mr. Fogle," interrupted the Judge.

"Then you did see Staghart that night?"

"Yesh."

"Where?"

"On der Pald Mount'in."

"When?"

"In der night dimes."

"At what time of the night?"

"Ve vent oop togedder."

"At what time?"

"About den o'clock."

"What time did you separate?"

"About dvelve o'clock. I doid dot Shtaghardt dot dem noishes vash't no bine purrs, und he laffed mit me. I guess he don't laff no more, py shimminy!"

"No, I guess he don't laugh any more, Marks," said Fogle. The prosecution now, prompted by Staghart, used every effort to shake Marks' testimony, but without success.

"There were some others present at this meeting on Bald Mountain on the night of the stage robbery, were there not, Mr. Marks?" asked Fogle, as soon as the prosecution had ceased their cross-examination.

"Yesh. Dere vash dot—"

"You needn't state who the others were, Mr. Marks," interrupted Fogle. "We shall show who they were by other witnesses. There was at least one other person present, wasn't there?"

"Yesh, dere vash dot—"

"Never mind," said Fogle, waving his hand, "step down."

As Marks left the witness stand a tall, brawny young man, dressed in a heavy overcoat and slouch hat, strode into the court-room. Elbowing the spectators roughly aside, he stalked to where Inch and Fogle were sitting. There was a short whispered consultation between the new arrival (whom none of the spectators present remembered to have ever seen before) and Fogle, after which he walked deliberately to the witness stand and was sworn.

"Your name is—" Fogle waited for a reply.

"Tom Inch," answered the witness.

"What is your business, Mr. Inch?"

"Anythin' I ken lay my hands to," was the ambiguous rejoinder of the young man.

"Where were you on the night that the stage from Mammoth City was robbed?"

"Part o' the time in the brush, an' part o' the time on the road."

"What were you doing in the brush?"

"Puttin' up jobs."

"What kind of jobs?"

"Robbin' jobs."

"To rob what?"

"The stage."

"Where were you when you were in the brush?"

"Purty nigh the top o' Bald Mountain."

"Anybody with you?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

"Him an' him." The witness pointed at Staghart and Marks, and there was a sensation in the court-room.

"Who do you mean by 'him and him'?" said Fogle.

"Be more explicit."

"Bill Staghart and Levi Marks."

"Anybody else?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

"I won't tell you."

"Why?"

"Cause he's a white man, an' I don't blow the gaff on white men."

"Were you present at the robbery of the stage?"

"Yes."

"What were you doing there?"

"Holdin' a gun."

"Anybody with you?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

"The white man."

"Was this other man tall or short?"

"Short."

"Are those the clothes you wore when you robbed the stage?"

"Them's the duds I hed on w'en I held thet gun."

"That's what I mean. Whose boots did you wear that night?"

"Dad's."

"Whom do you mean by 'dad'?"

"Hiram Inch—the man you folks call the Singed Cat."

"How did you obtain them?"

"Stole 'em. Mine was wore out."

"Who did you say were implicated with you in this robbery?"

"Bill Staghart, Levi Marks, an' the white man."

"How did Staghart aid you?"

"Told us how much ther was in the box."

"And Marks?"

"Furnished the guns."

"How did you divide?"

"Even."

"One-fourth to each man?"

"Yes."

"When did Staghart and Marks receive their share?"

"Staghart tuk his w'en he came back from Kelsey's Flat whar the stage stopped."

"One-fourth?"

"No, one-half. He 'lowed thet he'd give Marksey his sheer w'en he got to town. I don't know w'ether he did or not."

"Are you friendly with your father?"

"No, him an' me's pison."

"Then why did you come here to testify, and in his favor?"

"Cause I'm white, thet's why; an' Bill Staghart's played it too low down in this yer business. He'd no call to hev the ol' man pulled on the grudge he had agin him. Mebbe he thought I'd let him cinch the ol' man 'cause we don't bitch, but he'll slip up on that little game. Ez fer Marksey, he wanted ter seize my dead brother's coffin the other day fer debt, an' egged on a d—d deputy sheriff to insult my mother a doin' it. But I b'lieve thet white-livered skunk, Bill Staghart, 's at the bottom o' the whole bizness, an' mebbe Marksey ain't so much ter blame; but they're runnin' pardons, an' thet settles it ez fur ez I'm concerned."

"Can you prove what you say?" asked Fogle.

"Yes."

"What is your proof?"

"Arrest them two roosters, an' let me turn State's evidence, an' I'll prove it fast enough."

"Take them into custody, Mr. Sheriff, for the present," ordered the Judge; "we'll see about the State's evidence hereafter."

"Now, Inch, what proof have you to offer?" asked Fogle, after Staghart and Marks had been brought forward by the Sheriff.

"Search their houses an' you'll find the swag, I reckon," answered Inch.

"It's a vile conspiracy," shouted Staghart; "I'm innocent as the babe unborn. It's all a devilish plot concocted by that scoundrel there," pointing to Hiram.

"Mine Got, mine rebudations is ruined. Mine Got, how beebles vash lie all der dimes. I vash innohent shust like Mishter Shtaghart," screamed the Jew.

"Mister Sheriff, detail some officer to make a thorough search of the premises occupied by William Staghart and Levi Marks, and if you find any of the stolen property bring it into Court," and the order of the judge was promptly obeyed by an active deputy—Sam Swingle, in fact.

While the officer was absent the prosecution attempted to break down the accusation of Thomas Inch by a rigid cross-examination, but did not succeed, and was still engaged in the hopeless task when Swingle entered bearing in his hands a sack and a box. The box bore the name of William Staghart. Swingle informed the Court that he had found the box in a closet at Staghart's residence, and the bag behind some tobacco boxes in Marks' shop.

"This case requires further investigation," said the Judge. "I remand the parties concerned, including Hiram Inch, William Staghart, and Levi Marks, to the custody of the Sheriff until more evidence is obtained. The court stands adjourned until to-morrow at ten o'clock." And amidst a tumult of excitement, ejaculations, and protestations the prisoners were hurried away.

Fogle was prepared for this move, and by means of a habeas corpus, the District Judge, and the testimony of Mrs. Inch, Hiram's daughter, and the deposition of Ikes, succeeded in freeing his client from the clutches of the law, for a short time at least. That night he escaped altogether, for about nine o'clock in the evening a rumor spread through the town (at first vague and doubtful, but finally fully confirmed) that Hiram Inch had closed his last account on earth—that one hour after obtaining his liberty he had been suddenly seized with a fatal sickness, which carried him beyond earthly courts of law and human enemies before medical assistance could be rendered.

As if the good people of Mammoth City had not experienced sensations enough to last them a decade at least, about two o'clock on the morning following the examination of Inch the fire bells rang, and the town sprang to life again expecting to see itself burn down. The crowd of half-dressed men and women, as if by instinct, rushed in the direction of the jail.

Arrived there they ascertained that about half an hour before a dozen of masked men broke into the jail, and before the two keepers could offer any resistance they were overpowered, the keys taken from them, and Tom Inch dragged out of his cell and carried off.

Thinking that Vigilantes had taken the self-confessed highwayman from his place of confinement and executed summary justice upon him, a party scoured the country expecting to find his corpse dangling from some tree. But they were disappointed—they never saw Tom Inch again.

XII.—CORRESPONDENCE.

The next morning the citizens of Mammoth City looked at each other in astonishment. Never since the good old days had the little mountain town experienced such wild and startling sensations. A stage robbery, a shooting affray, the arrest of prominent citizens upon heinous charges, and a jail delivery, all in the short space of a week. As a matter of course speculation was rife, and every gossip, male and female, had his or her theory of the whole transaction or series of transactions. Some held to the belief that Staghart, Inch, Marks, Ikes, and even Fogle, were all concerned at the start in some gigantic scheme of villainy—they intended to steal the town, in all probability, and, having disagreed as to the share which each was to receive, had quarreled, and, as the old adage goes, honest men would get their dues. Just how these conspirators had fallen out, or how the honest citizens were to get their "dues," was not quite so clear. That there had been a clique or combination of cliques there was no doubt whatever, and that the members of these cabals had plotted and schemed against each other was apparent from the recent developments.

Inch dead and Staghart in jail charged with complicity in a stage robbery, the two political conventions must reassemble and nominate new candidates for Sheriff. These nominations were directed as usual by Fogle, although there was a growing suspicion that he was the chief conspirator in the recent events. But as those who were opposed to him could prove nothing satisfactorily against him, they were unable to checkmate his wily machinations.

On the morning after the reported death of Inch, hundreds went to his house to "view the corpse," but most of them were refused admittance by his widow. Only a few quasi friends of the deceased were allowed to see the remains, and although these favored individuals confirmed the report of his death, those who were denied the pleasure of looking at "the Singed Cat without a single life in his carcass" were strenuous in their assertions that it was only "another trick of the old scoundrel."

Hiram's funeral was attended by a large number of the residents of Mammoth City who saw the coffin lowered into the grave, heard the piteous wailing of mother and daughter, and afterward told the whole story to the dapper little insurance agent, who visited the village a second time, to see that everything was regular before paying five thousand dollars to the family of the deceased. He found "everything regular" and the money was handed over to Mrs. Inch, who shortly after sold the rookery and contingent desert for a fair sum, and with her daughter moved away from that locality.

Ikes was not tried for attempting to murder Hiram Inch. The prosecution not appearing to have a strong case the whole matter was thrown out of court by means of a nolle prosequi. He proved that he acted in self-defense in the affair with Silas Inch, and a jury acquitted him.

Staghart and Marks were indicted by the Grand Jury, but the cases were continued from time to time, until at last the legal documents pertaining to it were allowed to gather dust in the pigeon-holes of the District Attorney's desk. Some day, perhaps, the case will be tried. No witnesses will appear for the prosecution, and the bondsmen will be released from their responsibilities. As it is, Staghart and Marks are religious in their attendance upon the District Court of the—th Judicial District at each term, carelessly waiting for their cases to be reached and continued.

The following correspondence will probably explain itself:

MAMMOTH CITY, January 19, 18—.

SIMON CALOWELL, ESQ.—Dear Sir:—I have a very important case on hand for March 17th. Could you make it convenient to see me and get the main points, so that you could appear as a witness? You will not have far to travel, as it will be tried in San Bernardino County. All your expenses will be paid. There is big money in it and no danger. Nobody from Mammoth City will be there. Don't fail me if you can possibly be on hand.

Yours, etc.,

HENRY FOGLE.

TUCSON, ARIZONA, February 21, 18—.

HENRY FOGLE, ESQ.:—Engaged to swear on the 18th in a Prescott case. Can't help you. Mighty sorry.

THE SINGED CAT.

Concerning the belief that the spirits of the dead revisit the places familiar to them in life, Mr. Whittier once wrote as follows: "I am not disposed by any means to enter into an argument in behalf of the belief. It does not, however, lack greater and better names than mine in its support. For five thousand years the entire human family have given it credence. It was a part of the wild faith of the Scandinavian worshippers of Odin. It gave a mournful beauty to the battle-songs of the old Erse and Gaelic bards. It shook the stout heart of the ancient Roman. It blended with all the wild and extravagant religions of the East. How touching is that death-scene of Cyrus, as told by Xenophon, when the dying monarch summoned his children about him, entreating them to love one another, and to remember that their father's ghost would be ever at their side, to rejoice with their rejoicing and sorrow with their sorrowing? All nations, all ages, as Cicero justly affirms, have given credit to this ghost doctrine; and this fact alone, Dr. Johnson argues, fully confirms it. The Doctor himself believed in the ghost of Cock Lane. Luther saw, talked, and fought with spirits. Swedenborg made them his familiar acquaintance. Coleridge and his friend, the apostles of the unknown tongues, were spirit-seers. Against so much authority shall we urge the apparently common-sense view of the subject, that the apparition of a disembodied spirit to the sensual organs of sight, hearing, and touch, is a solecism in philosophy—a subversion of all known laws of matter and mind? What will that avail with a man who has actually seen a ghost? Fact before philosophy always. If a man is certain he has seen the thing, there is an end of the matter. Seeing, as the old adage said, is believing. Disbelief under such circumstances would justly subject him to the charge which pious Father Baxter brought against those who doubted in relation to Cotton Mather's witches—'He must be an obstinate Sadducee who questions it.' Doctor Reid says: 'No man can show it to be impossible to the Supreme Being to have given us the power of perceiving external objects without the organ of sense. We have reason to believe that when we put off these bodies and the organs belonging to them, our perceptive powers shall rather be improved than destroyed or impaired.'

The writers of ballad music are always happy in their titles—witness the following which have just appeared at all the music stores: "Darling, slumber while you wake," "I loved thee ere I loved thee," "My fair brunette," "Blow, gentle storms," "List to the noiseless murmur," "Fond memories of days to come," "The silvery winds are beaming," "The forest mermaid," "See, the brimming wine-cup's dry," "Oh, be thy shadow ever bright!" "Saharan boat song," "Oh, ruddier than the lily!" "Tis joy to grieve for thee," "We never met, and now we part," "The babe's farewell to his grandson," "The dumb girl's song," "The gallant fleets of Switzerland," "Now the morning's sun is setting," "Oh, had I wings of a wild gazelle!" "Sweet tresses wreathed in smiles," "Norah, thy closed eyes on me gazing," "In death I'll live for thee," "Oh, play to me the stringless lute!"

The fact that so many fish are dying off the coast of Florida calls to mind the awful prediction of Professor Knapp. From the juxtaposition of certain planets to our earth, he predicts that one-half of the population of the world, including man and all kinds of animals, and even vegetable life, will perish before or during the year 1880. In a lecture delivered several years ago, he said that this desolation would commence by the fishes of the sea dying, and pestilence and famine occurring in more southern latitudes. The famine in China and the yellow fever scourge in the South, and now the fearful pestilence among the fishes in Southern waters, are so many steps in fulfillment of Professor Knapp's prophecies.

A Milford man (says the Springfield Republican) stupified by drink and the cold, was found near the Fair Haven Rolling Mill the other night and taken and resuscitated amid the lurid glare of the molten iron and the din of machinery. As he slowly came to and was asked where he belonged, he looked about him in a frightened manner and replied: "Well, when I was on earth I lived in Milford."

AT THE MISSION DOLORES.

Here, on a marble slab, that jointly bears
The dust of ages and their clinging moss,
That quite obliterates the name and dares
To grow and flourish on the carved cross,
I sit and ponder, while the red sun flares,
O'er Saucelito's mountains, and across
The golden gateway to the peaceful sea
Its wondrous shafts of light, shot far and free.

I hear the harmonious voices of the choir,
Swelling or sinking, as they make responses
To Latin matins chanted by the friar
Or droning Miserere, which at once is Replete with sorrow's penitential fire,
Or filled with melodies of old romances.
It fills the Mission's old adobe walls
With sweeter music far than madrigals.

How thick the dust lies on these pioneers!

Like Death, it proves itself a ruthless rider;
On everything alike it still appears,
On ivy leaf or gauze-work of the spider;
On slab, on stone, on tomb or grave, adheres
This stern enveloper, this grim abider;
As though the stern commandment to condemn,
"Return to dust," the dust returns to them.

Sweet songsters carol in the leafy shade
Of laurel bushes or of manzanita,
A charming echo to the music made
By chanting choir or droning Padre Peter.
Dull earth responds, the balmy air is swayed,
The sound of music makes the whole world sweeter,
And here the scene, the solemn place, the time
Make sound triumphant, harmony sublime.

I muse upon the Mission's busy past,

So great a contrast to the idle present;

The adobe walls can not much longer last—

They crumble now, the chapel is senescent;

Its days are numbered and are fleeting fast;

Its old traditions, sorrowful or pleasant,

Slip from the memory far beyond recall,
As yonder lizard slips along the wall.

But these old tablets, nodding each, to each

Shall in the after years their story tell,

In that expressive although voiceless speech,

How much these men accomplished, and how well.

In silent tones these ghostly stones will teach

The solemn lesson, when the brazen bell

Of Angelus has stopped its jarring tongue—

When the last vesper service has been sung.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. PERCY VERE.

Apple Blossoms.

I snatched a cluster from the orchard bough,
Rich, fragrant blossoms, "Dearest," low be said,
"Rob not the tree of its fair treasure now:

Wait till its ruddy fruit comes in its stead."

The fair earth slept beneath the moon of May;

I was a girl, and he in manhood's prime.

'Tis said his chestnut locks are tinged with gray,

And my red cheeks have faded since the time.

Ten times hath Autumn lighted up the bills,

And ten times have the blossoms decked the tree;

And now beneath the richly fruited boughs

I tremble wait for him to come to me.

Ah, will he hope to find the sweet May flower,

And mourn the fancy of that bygone hour?

SUISUN, CAL., May, 1878. A. G. C.

Pork and Beans.

Come back, ye well remembered scenes
Of juicy pork and toothsome beans.
When Memory's hand, with loving fingers,
Upon my heart-strings fondly lingers,
I catch the echoes of the lays
That moved our souls in other days,
When first this giant State was born
And gin was fifty cents a horn.
And often by the Yuba's flow
I've watched the crackling embers glow,
And when the flames were leaping hot,
Encircling all the ancient pot,
I've emptied in the luscious bean,
Likewise some pork, a trifle lean,
Like murmurings of distant chimes,
That seem to float from other climes,
Are memories of the long ago,
That rises none divineth where,
And empties, tell us, ye who dare.
We sometimes boiled 'em up with greens.
My friend, please pass the pork and beans.

SAM DAVIS.

John McCullough says there are but three tragic actors in the United States—Booth, Lawrence Barrett, and himself. He says that Booth is an excellent actor, but, like all men who get on the top round of the profession, receives more criticism than he now deserves. "This business of criticism," said he, "is peculiar. There are men now writing me up with sincere enthusiasm who will in a few years hence, if I have better luck, make up their minds that they had better begin to pull me down. That is the only trouble with Edwin Booth. He has had the largest following and the best class of support of any person on the stage, in England or America. It began in his youth, and in his following were scholars, editors, scientific men—all of the very best. He has improved, but, of course, there will be pauses and reactions in every career. It is the same," continued the philosophic McCullough, "with Dion Boucicault, the play writer. I have seen recently a dozen or twenty references to him as played out."

A ruralist seated himself at a restaurant table, recently, and began upon the bill of fare. After keeping three waiters nearly an hour employed in bringing dishes to him, he called one of them to him, heaved a sigh, and whispered, as he spread the bill of fare before him and pointed with his finger: "Mister, I've et to thar, and"—moving his finger down to the bottom of the page—"ef it ain't agin the rule, I'd like to skip from thar to thar."

The Washington Capital says: "Mrs. Derby, widow of the famous humorist, Lieutenant Derby, came to Washington some five years since with sixty thousand dollars, all she had in the world. The unfortunate woman, the hands of a real estate broker, and now the inmate of an insane asylum, she and her children are here."

RIDING WITH THE PRIEST.

It was directly after breakfast that I was discovered disconsolate at a window, and Susie hailed me with "Lawks! and didn't you go with the express after all?"

"No," said I, "I didn't. They wouldn't wake me." "Now, that's too bad," said she, with quick sympathy. "Them expressers are as stupid as their own mules, and I always said it." She paused a moment, and then her quick eye brightened. "Father Flaherty's going over the mountain, and you can go—why of course you can go with him. What luck you're in."

"But," I hesitated, "is it just the thing—is it proper, and all that, you know?"

Her face lit up like a blaze, and her two eyes shot flames like volcanoes. "Is it Father Flaherty you're trying to cast suspicions on?" says she. "Indeed, and if you please, I'd sooner trust you with the Father than him with you. It's not you we'll worry about, do you hear now, but it's him." She hurled another look at me and bounced out of the door like an enraged and fluffy chicken, leaving me helplessly floundering about in my mind as to how to recover from this disaster.

The slow morning ticked away by the clock, and Susie evidently had not relented sufficiently to suggest my company to Father Flaherty. So I finally waived all ceremony, and with my conscience "squirming" at the dark insult I had unintentionally offered him I went humbly and put the case to him. His broad red face shone benignantly, and a smile of benevolent width illumined it, and squeezed it into jolly wrinkles as he answered, to my great joy: "Go wid me, is it? That ye may and welcome. It's none so sociable goin' twenty-foive miles, wid no company at all, barrin' yer own self."

So another hour saw us mounted each on a mule, and as we walked our animals through the town the people all came out, both to say good-bye, and to see Father Flaherty, whom they all knew, going off in company with a lady. They crowded around the bridle of his mule, shook hands with him, hoped he'd come again soon, and evidently regarded him with an affection and respect without fear.

As we jogged slowly up the hill I cast a backward look. The town lay upon a pile of "tailings," its one small straggling street following the winding of a little stream that ran from the heart of the very mountain we were ascending. Mountains beetling and frowning on every hand walled the place completely in from the outside world. All the flying rumors that roamed through the life beyond were met, battled, and put to rout, by that firm line of mountains, and only an infinitesimal stream of news was allowed to trickle through once a week by the mule express, and such small drops as could dribble along through the lips of those who cared to ride the twenty-five miles and back. As I looked my last upon the Bar, the hot noon sun had fallen upon it, and turned it a severe and dreadful yellow.

And then I turned forward with a furtive smile just in time to catch the graceful wave of Father Flaherty's large hand in answer to the last flutter of a handkerchief below, that had probably been waiting for us to reach the brow of the mountain. We reached it, disappeared over it, and plunged into the depths of the forest on the other side. Here was I, alone, as it were, with Rome—I, who had nursed Calvinism in my babyhood, and drawn in orthodoxy with my first breath, I was under the solitary protection of a Catholic priest, with every step putting greater distance between myself and other people, and plunging deeper into the solitude of the grand, and lonely, and silent mountains. I trembled in spite of the fears I strove to hush.

Ha! he put his hand in his pocket. Did he mean to attack me at once? Ah heavens! what a relief. I saw the faint blue flame of a match kindle within the shelter of his hollowed hand; then he brought both hands carefully toward his mouth, and a puff of vilest tobacco smoke trailed away over his shoulder and pierced my nostril.

For a time he paid me not the slightest attention, jogging along comfortably pulling at his pipe, and I was beginning to think of attracting his notice by a series of judicious throat clearings, when he suddenly turned in his saddle.

"Ye may make a boast of it if ye like when ye get to the city again, that ye've ridden wid the praste," said he, showing a double row of teeth, "and its the first time, do ye know, I was iver anywhere wid a lady. I wouldn't even go to church wid me mother when I was a by."

I murmured my appreciation of the honor he had done me, and smiled to myself as I thought of the ears that would listen incredulously to that boast.

"And as I'm not accustomed to waitin' upon the ladies, may be ye'd be so kind as to inform me if there's any little attention ye can think of?"

I assured him I should do so, and then asked him if he could take my red shawl, which my own animal objected to having behind his ears, and the gay wrap was transferred to his keeping. He flung it carelessly over the pommel of his saddle, and turned away humming the fragment of a song, puffing at his pipe and jogging along the trail, making such an appearance as no priest surely had ever made before.

"I should like," said I, by way of breaking the silence that followed, "a drink of water, if we could find such a thing."

"In another turn there's a spring," he answered. "I've traveled this trail so often I know it wid me eyes shut. Ye see I go about from place to place through the parish, and I know these mountains loike a book. There's places locked up here, and there, and yonder, and the people are glad to see the praste wanst in a way. I'm welcome wherever I go, and good treatment I get and the best of iver-thing," and then we made the turn and reached the spring, which gurgled ice-cold from a rocky basin it had hollowed for itself. It was a lovely spot. The moisture which the running stream had spread in its vicinity had drawn into existence a bed of verdure and white wild lilies. We were descending a trail which wound around the side of the mountain, and which here disclosed a view of wondrous beauty. A faint milky haze hung above the dark green of the trees below and along the skirts of the cañon like a fringe of smoky cobwebs, and as far as eye could reach mountains piled above mountains, each covered with its army of pines, like stern and gloomy sentinels keeping watch and ward with fold-down brows over these wilds of the North.

"—perhaps?" said Father Flaherty, with interlocking upon his tongue.

With all gravity he held a cup in one hand and a flask in the other, with such a suggestive tip of the one toward the other that the most unsuspicious woman in the world could not fail to understand the drift of his interrogation.

"No?" said he. "Well, I carry it about me, as it's likely to be useful in the case of sickness," and he tipped the flask over so that a pleasant gurgling sound came from its throat, and a pleasant jerky splash from the cup, which he then held under the gushing spring, and carried to his own lips.

After him I drained it, and it still retained a bit of pungency as to taste and smell. I judged it to be brandy.

We set off at a smart canter, which Father Flaherty gradually brought into a mild jog-trot, as he once more lit his pipe, and swayed from side to side, sometimes, as if for very good humor, striking his heels lightly against his mule's ribs, and occasionally expectorating to this side and that. Suddenly he turned again, with one broad hand on the back of his saddle.

"I suppose ye heard the news about Jim Sullivan?" said he.

"Yes," I answered, "I heard the event talked over. I suppose they are really engaged?"

"Oh, yes; promised fast enough, I'll warrant ye, in spite of her knowin' him only the sivin days."

"And when is the wedding?" I ventured to inquire.

"Why," said he, earnestly, "in another fortnight; and that's the worst of it. They'd best contain thimselves and wait fuder acquaintance; they'd best contain thimselves—they'd best contain thimselves," he repeated, wisely and with much emphasis, to my great amusement, and then he plunged into comments on this and that person whom I had met; told anecdotes of them, and his experience with them, though never once, as I judged from the harmless and discreet tales he told, violating any confidence. Thus it happened that I forgot his priestly office and the bosom of Rome, and as we followed the winding trail we were a jolly party, chatting and laughing, till a third person would have kissed the book we were old gossips, dishing up friends as they came to mind.

Along toward the middle of the afternoon he called a halt, and flourished at me in triumph a bundle drawn from the depth of his pocket, and his lips struggled with, and smacked over, the words, "a little lunch," while he sprang from his mule and fastened the bridle to a low-hung bough. I waited for his assisting hand, and sat in my saddle till he should gallantly come to my stirrup. He busied himself with his mule a little longer, and laid his bundle down.

"Well?" said I, with an encouraging smile.

"Well!" he answered, with amazement in his buttermilk eyes, "why don't ye get off the animal?"

It is needless to say that I succeeded in slipping to my feet in a moment after without the assisting hand, and in another short space of time we were seated opposite each other on the fallen pine needles unrolling with expectant fingers the "little lunch," which, he explained, had been handed him by one of those who crowded to his side as we rode away.

"It's a chicken!" he cried, rapturously.

"It's a chicken!" I repeated, in rapturous echo.

"And toast!" he exclaimed, then added hurriedly: "I hope the toast has plenty o' butter, for I can't abide it wid-out." As he spoke he put a bit to his lips, and his eyes took on that far-gazing look which a woman fixes on vacancy when she is "tasting," after the salt and the pepper, the sprig of thyme, and other seasoning have just been cast into the pot. Then he made a wry face as he swallowed his bit of crust with an effort. "Sorry a bit o' butter," said he; "the stuff's as dry as a chip. But, at any rate, the fowl looks tender and juicy enough;" and without more ado he half cut with his jack-knife and half tore with his fingers a wing from the chicken and poked it at me.

"Begorra!" he cried, a moment after, "but the craycher was an old hin, bad luck to it." Notwithstanding which fact we made a respectable meal off the "craycher's" breast, and left not much but the bones behind us as we once more mounted and rode away.

It is a well-known fact that nothing can tap the fountains of good humor in a man's heart like a bit of something to eat. Be he priest or layman, his stomach is bound to act on him and enrich his tongue with pleasantries, and liven his laugh till it sounds like a trickle from a very well of content. Give him then a time-stained pipe between his lips, and no end to the laughs he will laugh you, and the effusions of sprightliness with which he will humor you.

Father Flaherty had his bite to eat and his pipe hanging loosely between his priestly lips, and we began our journey again with everything in our favor. The heat of the noon was well past, too, and just a faint freshening in the air told of the turn of the day and the evening that lay ahead. The buzz and swish of the grasshoppers that haunted the trail were a little less like a drone to the ears and a slap to the mules' legs, and the Father swayed himself in his saddle and widened his nostrils in appreciation of these among the other small things of life; and, after a bit, as we turned and twisted about the path, he began, in his rich accent, to recount his memories of such settlements as the Bar, and they were varied and many. Imagine yourself in the midst of California's grandest scenery, among her mountain wilderness and her bowldered and pine-guarded fastnesses, keeping one ear out for the flit of birds, the wave of trees, the fall of waters, and the other to Father Flaherty as he told of "the shivaree the b'ys gave to Jake Dunnigan after he come home from havin' his weddin' over to Tim Dooley's beyant the Bar. Mary she was a-cryin' an' a-hoodlin' on to Jake, an' Jake was that mad he was like a toorkey gobbler, an' the b'ys a-bangin' an' a-screchin' outside, an' a-whoopin' an' a-fiddlin' on tin pans, till it was like a drame wid a ghost on the bridge ay your nose an' a divil on each ear." Once in so often he said he visited each town within his parish. I could well imagine on what errand after the confessions and prayers imposed at the town we had just left. "Bein' a Protistint," he said gravely, "ye'll not know how the inhabitants up here trate the praste. There's niver a thing too good for him, an' wherever he may go it's the best he'll have. There's no money the praste makes in these parts; food an' bed belong to him wherever he may chance to find himself, an' there's nobody begrudges him a mule to carry him from place to place. Is it the same way the Protistints trate the clergy?" There was a twinkle in his small blue eye as he asked the question, and I answered humbly enough and a little ashamed, that I had no such tales to tell of abundant and never-failing hospitality and generosity to Protestant ministers of the gospel.

"The woman that gave me the fowl," said he after a meditative pause, "she's a good woman now—bad luck to 't'ould hin though!—and a tidy-luckin' woman, too. I s'pose ye mind what a 'squaw-man' is?"

I nodded assent, for I had heard of the beast time and again since I left home.

"Johnny Mackay, he that's her husband, was a squaw-man afore he married to Jinny, an' for all he's a good luckin' man, too, he had the humblest and dirtiest squaw in these parts. She was a Trinity river squaw wid tattoos on her chin an' her cheek, an' Johnny called her Rosy, most like to make game of her. The day before he married to Jinny he bought Rosy a calico gown an' some other stuff, an' she started off on fut for the Trinity agin. Jinny went to kapin' house in the very same cabin nixt day quite calm like."

"Oh, horrible!" I exclaimed.

"He's a jilous man, too, is Johnny Mackay, but Jinny's most discrute, or I don't know what'd come till her. Even as 'tis, he walks in wanst in a while luckin' like thunder, an' he takes out his pistols, an' lays 'em on the table an' says: 'There's death in thim, Jinny Mackay; luck out!'"

The shades of evening were gathering among the pines, the rustlings and movings of the boughs and tree-tops were spirit-like and like the shudderings of one's own soul, when the Father assured me that in another three-quarters of an hour we should reach the mill where I could have supper, and whence I could be carried by wagon, so that I could reach the stage by early morning.

"Mayhap ye've heard of Katty Varney?" said he, taking his empty pipe from his mouth and putting it in his pocket.

"No," I said, watching a star blaze on the mountain-top like a signal, "no, I think I never heard of her."

"Katty Varney was a purty young thing who went to the convint over in Yreka, and well the Sisters spoke of her as long as she was wid 'em. She was the swatest singer iver I heard, an' many's the time I've heard her an' Jerry Black singin' as she was comin' home for the recreation. Jerry was drivin' stage thin, an' whin she come over she'd always sit on the driver's sate wid him, an' the passengers would have a trate thin sure. There's nowhere a bit o' music sounds better than hereaway among the mountains, fur there's echoes that give it back a half dozen o' times. Over an' besides, Jerry was doin' his coortin' wid Katty thin, an' folks used to say it made the both voices swater. At anny rate, an' howiver it was, Jerry was perfectly contint whin he had her an' the way-bill safe by him, wid the reins in his hands an' a full load behind him. But he sung wid her wanst too often, fur a soft-spoken feller on the middle sate tuck a notion to her purty voice an' her purty face, too, maybe, an' he put up where she put up, an' was mighty civil an' polite like, an' flattered her up, an' finally he stopped in her town, an' what should he do but call upon her an' the old lady. The long an' the short of it was that he persuaded 'em both he'd make a great lady of Katty an' prune her voice up till the highest pitch; an' the more fools they, fur they raly belaved him. Katty was to go down to San Francisco to the cousin of her mother's, an' all right an' proper like this soft-talkin' man was to see she had the tachin' an' the opporchunities; an' Katty went, an' they said Jerry niver aven so much as whistled at a chune afterwurds. She sent the old woman letters, an' said she was doin' so finely, an' thin all of a sudden the leathers quit comin', an' the mother niver heard another word from Katty. But Jerry one night, a couple o' years after, was on his over trip to Yreka; an' to pass the evenin' he went into a big show that had come along, an' who should he see, showin' her legs up till her waist, an' with no dress on her neck an' arms, an' flingin' her fate over her own head in a most disgraceful manner, an' singin' a comic song, but the gurl he'd been coortin' most iver since she was a babby. He waited till the show was out an' iverybody had gone, an' went an' climbed on the platform, an' was makin' fur the insides av it when he saw the soft-spoken man a-walkin' around. 'I want Katty Varney,' says Jerry, quite bold.

"There's no sitch lady here," answers he; an' with that Katty comes up, an' the tears had streaked trails through the paint that was on her cheeks, an' says she: 'Jerry, how's the mother?'

"Oh, Katty, Katty!" says Jerry, 'what a place fur ye to be in! Come away home, Katty, an' I'll niver say a word, an' nobody'll iver say a word, an' it'll all be by-gones. The stage goes out in the mornin' the same as it used, an' I'll have ye home by noon in time fur the dinner. The mother's grieved fur ye, an' I've grieved fur ye, Katty, but it's all right now, an' ye'll come home, Katty?'

"I knew how it 'ud be," says she, 'an' I tried to git off from comin' here, but 'twas no use; an' Jerry said she choked up an' hid her face, an' then she kind o' cried out: 'It's too late, an' I can't turn back; don't tell the mother, Jerry.' An' she darted away, an' it's the last he iver heard."

The Father turned himself about on his mule, and I could just see the serious look that had stolen over his broad, red face through the darkness.

"It wasn't the last that iver I heard, though," he said, cautiously, "but I niver told Jerry, fur he knew bad enough widout it. But Katty got down lower an' lower, an' she tuck to thim low cellars they have in the city, an' it wasn't two year ago that she died from the drink an' the fast life she led, a pore, miserable woman. Pore Katty Varney!"

His voice receded to a sharp whisper, and he sighed as he ended the story, and was silent for five minutes, when he said in his old hearty tone: "That's the light in the mill ahead. Come up, Judy!" he chirruped to his mule, and in a twinkling we had drawn up before the door, and were welcomed with the cheery hospitality of the region.

After supper the wagon was made ready for my further journeyings, and Father Flaherty came out to see me off.

"If you should mate Father Gallagher of St. Joseph's, on Tinth Street," said he; then he paused and shook his head, and added, "but bein' a Protistint you'll not be likely to mate him. God bless ye, anyhow. Good-bye. Ye'll not not forgit ridin' wid the praste?"

"Good-bye, Father Flaherty, good-bye," I said. "You may be sure I shall not soon forget you and your kindness. Good-bye!" And I left him standing on the rough little porch peering into the darkness after me as I rode away.

Green be your skirts, O mountains of the north, and white your heads with snow! In memory alone I see your grandeur now. The trail of life is a hard one to follow, and it seldom leads through the scenes the heart loves best.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879.

KATE HEATH.

MUSIC AND ART.

"For Art may err but Nature can not miss."

I suppose that the place of honor belongs of right this week to the Complimentary Concert to Herr Formes, which took place at Platt's Hall on Monday evening, and forined a graceful, and not entirely unworthy, recognition by his friends of the fortieth anniversary of the début of this venerable hero of the lyric stage—for this Herr Formes has undoubtedly been. The application of the conventional term "lyric" to the operatic stage may appear paradoxical when referring especially to him, since his talent was eminently dramatic, and he was ranked at one period as quite the finest dramatic singer before the public. But his own career is perhaps the best vindication of the paradox that can be offered, since his "Leporello" was considered to be no less admirable than his "Bertram," his "Marcel" was scarcely a greater success than his "Plunkett," and—as he proved again to us only the other evening—he could sing and act "Falstaff" as well as "Sarastro," and that is saying that he did it incomparably. I think it must be almost twenty years since first I heard him—then already slightly past the meridian of his celebrity—during his first season in New York. It was at the Academy, in the old days of La Grange, Piccolomini, and the Brignoli who had still a voice. Herr Formes sang "Marcel," "Bertram," and "Leporello." These were the only parts I heard from him, but how well I remember the rich quality and sterling timbre of that immense voice, that at times seemed almost as though it came from a sixteen-foot organ pipe. I have never since heard anything like it, and never expect to again.

The concert itself, which may be regarded as rather an impromptu affair, and in which everything was done out of that spirit of kindly good nature that in a sense disarms criticism, calls for no extended notice. It was neither better, nor much worse, than hundreds of others. Indeed it presented most of the stereotyped features of the singer's concerts (I call them so in contradistinction to musician's concerts) with which our public is sufficiently familiar, including the introduction of the juvenile pupil with the small voice, who vocalizes and sings passages and trills with more or less of accuracy—generally less—and is lavishly applauded by the audience—partly out of good nature and partly out of sheer honest stupidity—while at the same time she is recognized by musicians as an unfortunate walking advertisement of a teacher who does not scruple to commit what I consider an act of the grossest injustice in order to extend his notoriety and add to his clientèle. There must be some very subtle quality about the flattery of these singing teachers when it can so entirely outweigh the better sense or discretion of the guardians of a young lady as to induce them to consent to her being thus sacrificed. For it seems to me that, be those guardians never so unmusical or inexperienced in these matters, they can not be blind to the fact that the strain upon a young, immature voice, of either public singing or any considerable amount of vocal practice, must necessarily result either in the loss of the voice or its serious injury; and the injury of a beautiful voice should be considered one of the most grievous wrongs that one human being can inflict upon another.

But in cases such as the one under consideration there is apt to result to the pupil a wrong infinitely more serious than even this one; one for which the cure lies far distant, and is reached only through much suffering and bitter, painful experiences; one that it is cruel, almost inhuman, to inflict. It is the destroying of her peace of mind. The hope of some day becoming a great, successful singer is one of the fulfillment of which is simply impossible when nature has not provided the means. This she does in about one person out of every ten thousand—certainly not more—and yet almost every young woman who falls into the hands of these ex-operative artists (?) is assured that she has her fortune in her larynx, that she has only to go through a two or three years' course of training to become a great prima-donna, that she is to rival Patti, eclipse Nilsson, and what not else of foolish, idle trash. And the silly girls believe it only too readily; they like to believe it, and their friends with them. They sing, and their friends and their friends' friends applaud; they study (if the cramming of half a dozen operatic parts can be called study) and feed on their ambition until at last they attain a début. This, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand, is an end of it. They début and disappear. But they go back into private life in no enviable frame of mind; they awaken from the debauch of ambition with sore heads and sore hearts, and the cure—if indeed there be one—comes but slowly and after much suffering. Mostly there is no real cure; the malady lingers on and affects the entire after-life, it warps and deforms the nature and leaves its impress upon the character. I have seen scores, a hundred, of these unfortunates, and out of my sympathy and pity for them, have learned to positively abhor the ill-fated ambition that brought upon them this lifelong agony of disappointment.

The musical profession has just suffered another severe loss through the death from consumption, in Oakland, on the 4th instant, of Mr. John P. Morgan, who was at once a very fine organist and an excellent theoretician and composer. Mr. Morgan, during his four years' residence on this coast, had largely identified himself with the cause of choral music, and was known to his friends as a pleasant gentleman of agreeable manners.

I suppose that the Soirées of the Loring Club should be regarded rather in the light of social events than as musical performances of a sufficiently public character to render them subject to criticism. At the same time any evidence of the culture and growth of a taste in a direction so purely healthy can not fail to be a matter of some public interest, and I feel the more warranted in referring to it from the fact that these young gentlemen present every appearance of really striving to do good work, and seem to be doing it under very careful, intelligent guidance. Not that they sing very well as yet—although much that I heard from them at the soirée of last Tuesday evening was very enjoyable—nor are likely to do so without a great deal more of hard study; but they are trying to, and this, after all, is the battle half won. With the fund of fresh, young voices which this club disposes of, and under the sympathetic direction of Mr. Loring, who seems to be in his right place in this work, the future ought to be full of delightful possibilities, and I trust that neither the interest of the members nor the perseverance of the conductor will be allowed to flag until many of these have been accomplished.

If I had any suggestion to make to the conductor of this club it would be to the effect that he errs in endeavoring to make up the programmes for his soirées entirely out of music for male voices, and for this reason: The range of the male voice being limited, and its timbre of a very pronounced color—a one-color, so to speak—necessarily restricts composers of male chorus music in the choice of material for treatment, besides controlling to an almost arbitrary degree the manner and form of the treatment itself. As a natural consequence of this condition we have really only a limited répertoire of thoroughly good compositions of this class; there are many others that are nearly as good, and again an infinity of others that so nearly approach excellence that there is nothing to be said of them excepting that they are not of the best, and yet they amount, in reality, to nothing more than a reiteration—with slightly changed form or rhythm—of the work that preceded them and from which they derive their existence. Now, the selection of an entire evening's programme from the better class of male chorus music must almost unavoidably result in a wearisome monotony, not only of tone-color (as lies in the very nature of the restriction to a single quality of tone), but also of forms and subject matter, since the best—standard—composers, recognizing the natural limitations of the field, have endeavored scrupulously to keep within them, and, indeed, have contented themselves uniformly with the expression of what was logically possible within these limitations, and when they had anything to express that lay beyond them sought for other means of expression. A recognition of these facts—whether conscious or not does not signify here—naturally compels the adoption into such a programme of compositions that will relieve this monotony; and as these, having been written with that special object, and going mostly beyond the logical range of the style, are almost invariably weak—if not really bad—the result is generally one of utter dreariness; we miss the fresh, manly effect of the genuine male chorus, and get nothing new, or even agreeable, in its place. The prettinesses of some modern writers in this field, their trick of surprises and stunning effects, bits of solo, piano-forte accompaniment (an utter absurdity), etc., seem to be made under the pressure of an effort to get away from the legitimate scope of a style of composition in which they have nothing new or fresh to say. The true male chorus should resemble the Volkstied in the simplicity and directness of its themes and treatment; but the quarry has been worked out, the tunes all written, and consequently all sorts of meretricious effects have to be dragged in in order to make a taking composition. The things are mostly tiresome; they are rarely music, and still more rarely good music. And if an entire evening of even the best things, of even Krentzer, Weber, Zöllner, and Mendelssohn, is fatiguing—as it undoubtedly is—how much more so is one more than half filled with the palpable straining after novel effects (that are never really reached) of a class of little men who, lacking melody, directness—anything to say, in fact—seek to make amends by that cheaper cleverness that constructs something out of nothing! I believe in sticking to the good things, and to them only; I think it is better to sing only three or four songs of the best; and if there is nothing else with which to make a programme let these three or four songs suffice. They will be only the more enjoyed for not being mixed up with a lot of weak or bad ones.

Mr. Herold's Orchestral Matinées will be resumed on next Wednesday, the first one—fifth of the current series—bringing Beethoven's bright and graceful symphony in B flat (the fourth), Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture, and the first three of Schumann's delightful "Sketches from the Orient" in Reinecke's instrumentation. Certainly a very attractive menu.

I understand that Mr. Schmidt is being strongly urged to give us a short supplementary series of Recitals with his quintet, and hope that he will not carry away his interesting family without letting us hear some of the good things that are being rehearsed for the Eastern tour. I believe that many who missed some of the former concerts would be happy to make the loss good if an opportunity were offered.

The Loring Club, in compliance with a generally expressed desire, have decided to repeat their concert on Monday evening next, at Dashaway Hall. S. E.

Providence, it is said (in the Bible, we think), takes note of the fall of every sparrow, but in "enterprise" the daily newspaper can beat Providence, rather. There is one in Chicago that takes note of the fall of every snowflake, and here is what it says of it: "It comes like the first star in the evening sky, and, as it is being made the subject of wonderment, suddenly the upper deep is whitened; and then the roofs, and the sidewalks, and the pedestrians at once become decked alike." This is fine writing; we doubt if Deacon Fitch could do much better himself, though he would not have fallen into the error of supposing a pedestrian can be "decked," as if he were a ship! For it is evident from his peculiar gait that the good Deacon is a sailor.

The following advertisement appears in the London Athenæum: "A douceur of three pounds will be given to any gentleman who can secure the publication of a short story in one of our popular magazines. Address," etc. We had thought that with the publication of his poem "Farina" in the London Delectatio Fatuorum, Mr. Hector Stuart would deem his fame in England sufficiently well established to be let alone. But literary ambition is like the itch, which spreads the wider and burns the fiercer the more you gratify it.

"What," said an interviewer to an unpledged candidate, "do you intend to do if you are elected?" "My goodness," said the poor fellow, "what shall I do if I am not elected?"

OUR SET.

Of course, I was invited to the Loring Club, held at the new Dashaway Hall, on Post Street, and equally, of course, I went, for I can't resist an opportunity to see our set in full conclave, aside from the attraction of good vocal music. I was late, and, with the hall crowded to its utmost capacity, forced to take a back seat. One of the favorites of the selections given was a serenade by Storch, rendered finely; the last song by Mendelssohn, "Love and Wine," the solo part by Charles Dungan, was much appreciated. A solo, "Say, was it Heartfelt," by Maschek, sung by Mr. Renling, was exquisitely rendered, also the encore, "Dear Little Heart." Among those I saw there were the Babcocks, McLanes, Tubbs, Beavers, Talbots, Garnetts, Thorntons, McAfees, Eldridges, Durbrows, Ogdens, Browns, Biancrofts, Wilsons, Coles, Bakers, and a crowd of others. Among the terpsichorean amusements of the younger portion of our set, one of the most enjoyable is the occasional entertainment given by the Durbrow Club, which meets every three weeks, at the residence of some one of the young lady members, the gentlemen of the club furnishing the music. The last party, given on Friday evening, was held at Mr. Thomas Brown's, cashier of the Bank of California; it was a great success. Three more parties close the season, and it is proposed to make the last one a masquerade. Miss Nellie Dore entertained her friends with a dance on Wednesday evening; it was quite an elegant affair, and gave great pleasure to all who participated. There are quite a number of festivities proposed during the coming month: Mrs. William M. Gwin is to give a German about the sixth of February, Mrs. General McDowell, one, also Mrs. Louis McLane. It was said Mrs. Hall McAllister was to give one, but the sad death of Cutler McAllister will probably prevent all gayeties from that family. It almost makes me tremble for fear who of us will be called to go next, for so many of our prominent people were called from among us this last year. There are rumors that the Crocker mansion is to give a most brilliant affair soon; and the third of the Club Assemblies soon give one of their Germans. These last mentioned parties have not been, among some of the young gentlemen members, quite a realization of their hopes; the invitations were so controlled by the lady patronesses that only selections of their visiting lists were honored, and many favorites—even some of the sisters of the proposed members—were neglected. Some of our set of young gentlemen talk of a German soon, somewhat on the style of the one held at Red Men's Hall last year, but one which will give more general satisfaction; that we all remember as a most brilliant affair. Last Monday saw the commencement of gayeties in Washington, which last till Lent intervenes. Receptions are held on Mondays, at the residences of the Justices of the Supreme Court, and other ladies on Capitol Hill; the wives of the Cabinet Ministers and Mrs. Speaker Randall receive on Wednesdays; Thursday is a day set apart for calls through the season. There has been quite a query among the ladies who rule society in Washington whether to admit the beautiful, accomplished, octoroon wife of Senator Bruce within their exclusive circle. All the Southern blood and prejudice of ages barred the door, but it has been decided in the affirmative. She has been honored by calls from several of the wives of the Justices of the Supreme Court; also many Senators and Representatives have followed their example. What barriers time and patience will break down. I rejoice that in our republican country true worth and merit should be appreciated. MARY JANE.

In Sunday's Chronicle, of December 29th, there appeared, with sensational head lines of "Betrayed and Ruined. Cruel Fate of Mrs. W. C. Ralston's Pretty Swiss Maid," an article so particular in detail of names, events, times, and circumstance, that it bore upon its face the semblance of truth. Marie Hauser was the name of a pretty and accomplished maiden; a vivacious, elfin, beautiful blonde; her father a magistrate of Schaffhausen. Mrs. Ralston stopped at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where she had a portrait of herself and daughter and Marie Hauser, painted in a group by one Enrique M. de Saques, at the studio of Monsieur (or Señor, for he was a Spaniard). Mrs. Ralston, with her little girl and charming companion, had many sittings. Then comes the recital of wiles before which innocence falls; then abandonment, treachery, poverty, birth of an infant, and the usual horrors of a dime novel tragedy. Poor Marie Hauser is ruined. The truth of this original story, written it would seem exclusively for the Chronicle, is denied by Mrs. Ralston to this extent: She never had such a maid, nor one at all answering the description in name or person. She never stopped at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. She never had her portrait painted in group with any servant maid. She never knew or heard of any artist, or other gentleman, of the name of Enrique M. de Saques, and in the entire narrative there is no incident which she recognizes, or upon which such a story could be founded. Mrs. Ralston is perplexed to know the motives which make her so frequently the subject of scandal, and asks her friends, if she has any left in San Francisco, to suspend their opinions regarding her conduct till they have some better authority than the sensational lies fabricated to her injury in the interest, as she believes, of a conspiracy to steal her property.

With regard to that tempest in a teapot, the school investigation, we have not yet come to any other conclusion than that Mr. Bolander is a Dutchman, and we suspect Mr. Herbst to be another. It is not the first time we have seen Mr. Bolander turn State's evidence, and as he has, as he asserts, dealt in questions, we should like to propound to him some questions of our own: (1.) Why did he give the questions to Mr. Herbst? (2.) Why does he inform at the present time? (3.) Does he remember the statements made under oath in the Fitzgerald-Klose trial, which he had to retract afterward? (4.) Did he give the questions to Mr. Herbst at all?

To preserve a good joke—Put it in an almanac, or rent it out by the year to circus clowns and negro minstrels. In this way specimens have been kept for fifteen or twenty years.

THE THEATRES OF PARIS.

By C. H. Harding.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

On the Boulevard St. Martin, in the midst of a hard-working population, are the two chief temples of the drama—the Ambigu, and the Théâtre de la Porte St. Martin—to the latter of which Frédéric Lemaître and Mélingue attracted such crowds in days gone by. We shall not stop to analyze the composition of those melodramas manufactured by Messrs. D'Ennery, Cormon, and others, wherein are sure to figure a persecuted female, a sanguinary villain, a mother in search of her child, a lover who is always encountering the most fearful accidents by flood and field, and a virtuous rustic who turns out to be the heir to some great estate. Among the most famous of the melodramas played here are the Bossu, Queen Margot, Thirty Years of a Gambler's Life, The Courier of Lyons, and more recently The Two Orphans, Rose Michel, and A Celerated Case. It is rare that the real Parisian public ventures into these distant regions. The Parisian theatre-goer has no great fancy for the drama, and still less for the localities in which are situated these homes of the drama.

Nevertheless, he may frequently be seen at the Châtelet Théâtre, where those fairy extravaganzas he loves so well are being played. Who that has ever been to Paris has failed to go and see such pieces as the Châtelain de Brabant, or the Voyage in the Moon, with their five or six hundred characters, in costumes designed by Grévin; their trap-doors, gilt and tinsel, marches past, apotheoses, and ballets, with loud orchestral accompaniments? An extravaganza of this kind may cost the management fifty or sixty thousand dollars; but as the piece is calculated to run for three hundred nights the money is freely spent. The more idiotic the piece the greater its chance of success. Sardou once tried his hand at a féerie, Le Roi Carotte, but he ignominiously failed, the public going to sleep in the midst of the performance. In a word, the real author of a piece of this kind is not the writer, but the machinist, the carpenter, and the costumer.

Let us not pass by without looking in at the Folies Dramatiques. It is here that are played to full houses the nonsensical operas of Hervé, that most eccentric of composers. Hervé, whose Ceil Crève, Chitpéric, Alice de Nevers, and other absurd trifles have obtained such notoriety, writes the words to his own music. As a sample of their brilliancy may be cited a scene in Alice de Nevers representing the Court of Catherine de Medicis. An usher announces "M. Molière." "What!" cries Henry III., greatly astonished, "what! Molière? So soon!"

But the hour is advancing, and so we must pass by unvisited the Théâtre Déjazet, the Théâtre Beaumarchais, the Théâtre des Menus Plaisirs, and Théâtre du Château d'Eau, and, returning to the Boulevard, make our way to the Rue de Marivaux, where is situated the Opéra Comique, one side of which is on the Boulevard. The origin of this theatre was the Théâtre de la Foire, where acting took place during the St. Germain, St. Laurent, St. Ovide fairs, held regularly in three faubourgs of Paris. These representations commenced in 1596. Later on the ordinary comedians of the King, now the Théâtre Français, had the enacting of comedies by this troupe interdicted. Thus fettered, they played pantomimes with the accompaniment of an orchestra. In 1715 they were authorized to sing couplets, and Piron composed little pieces for them. The Opéra Comique—for thus it was now called—flourished under the management of M. and Mme. Favart, the latter obtaining a great success in the part of the chèreuse d'esprit, which her husband had composed for her. During the second half of the eighteenth century the Opéra Comique played Philidor's and Monsigny's pieces; then followed Grétry's Le Huron, Zémire, Asor, and L'Ami de la Maison, which had the effect of placing the Opéra Comique on a better footing than ever before. Its good fortune clung to it until 1876, when, owing to bad management, it had to close its doors. This was, however, only an episode in its career. The receipts for the year ending March 31, 1877, amounted to $181,000. The finances of the Opéra Comique were in satisfactory condition, not only while it was located on the spot now occupied by the Théâtre Italien and in its subsequent home on the Place de la Bourse, but also since it took possession of its present quarters in 1840, when it opened with a revival of the Pré aux Clercs. Among the most noted composers for this theatre have been Dalayrac, Cherubini, Berton, Nicolo, Boieldieu, Lesueur, Méhul, Ad Kreutzer, Meyerbeer, Gounod, Auber, Adolphe Adam, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, Grisar, Victor Masse, and Félicien David. Among the most celebrated artists who have sung there are Martin, Ellevriou, Trial, Ponchard, Chollet, Bataille, Montaubry, Achard, Capoul, Mme. Dugazon, Caroline Duprez, Ugalde Marimon, and Miolan Carvalho. The Government contributes to keep up the theatre by a yearly contribution of $48,000.

And now let us hasten on to the Bouffes Parisiens, where a piece is being played for the first time—a première, as the French say. Frequently as the premières occur during the season, they seldom fail to create a flutter of excitement. There is not a member of that small circle of persons who are looked on as somebody in Paris but is anxious to be present at a first night's performance. Numbers of the places on these occasions are occupied by persons who are friends of the author and others who are on the free list. There are but few seats to be bought, and these can only be had by applying at the theatrical agency on the Boulevard des Italiens, where an orchestra stall may cost from 20 to 100 francs. As for the private boxes, those that are for sale are at such enormous rates as only to be within the reach of nabobs from Rio Janeiro or San Francisco. The orchestra is on such occasions occupied by young men and old dandies belonging to the clubs, with preternaturally wide open vests, a gardenia in their button-holes, and a dress coat with silk facings. The manager of the theatre finds this fashionable element a most useful factor in bringing about a first night's success, and hence he regularly sends round to the clubs a few orchestra tickets, which the members are of course glad to avail themselves of. When Theo and Peschard sing, the representatives of the various clubs are sure to applaud the piece with all their might and do their best to insure its success. We notice, among others, the Princes Galitzin and the Marquis de Scépeaux, the Turennes, the Fitz-Jameses, the Polignacs, Count Hallès-Claparède, a few aids-de-camp of the Marshal, and one or other of the Orleans princes. There sit Vibert, Detaille, Carolus Duran, and other eminent painters; there Sarcey, the well-known critic of the Temps, and Vitu, who, immediately after the conclusion of the piece, will sit down and write a column about it for tomorrow's Figaro. Here, too, are ministers and musicians, poets and ambassadors, actors and authors—in fact, one compact mass of celebrities of all kinds. In the balcon and the balgnoires may be seen a number of actresses and a few ladies mixing in general society. In the stage boxes are very likely the wives of some of the wealthy bankers of the capital—the Camondos, Bisschoffsheims, and Heynes—the ladies all sparkling with diamonds.

How difficult it is to amuse such a public as this; and yet it must be amused, or it will let the curtain fall on the last act amid icy silence, and withdraw to the club and supper-room with the elegant expression, "C'est infecte!" and the following Monday the dramatic feuilletons will contain some hundred lines or so of criticism in a semi-condemning, semi-condemning tone. No one hisses, but a lack of applause is always rightly interpreted by the management to be equivalent to those sibilant sounds by which a less refined audience would express its judgment on the piece. There are no ladies admitted into the orchestra, the pretext being that their high head-dresses would prevent those sitting behind them from seeing. The real reason, however, is that the gentlemen wish to talk freely on subjects which they could not well discuss in presence of their lady acquaintance. And so the curtain falls, and everyone rushes away to finish the evening at a supper or ball. We shall choose the latter, and so hurry off to the corner of the Rue de la Paix and the new Avenue de l'Opéra.

There stands the National Academy of Music, or, as it is more commonly termed, the Opéra. In the time of Lully (1671) the Opéra was established in the Rue Guénégaud. Thence it passed on (1674 to 1763) to the Palais Royal, where Vestris, Salle, and Camargo were among the famous dancers. On the destruction by fire of the Palais Royal Théâtre the Opéra migrated temporarily to the Tuileries, returning to the Palais Royal on the completion of the new theatre. It was there that Gluck's and Piccini's finest operas were represented. A few years later (1781) the house was again burned down, and the Opéra was transferred to the Boulevard St. Martin. Twelve years later the Opéra was removed to the Rue de Richelieu, a theatre constructed by Louis, the architect who built the Théâtre Français and the Bordeaux Théâtre. There were played the best operas of Grétry, Mehul, Cherubini, Paisiello, and Spontini. After the assassination of the Duc de Berry at the Opéra on the 13th February, 1820, the Government ordered the destruction of the theatre in which the act had been committed, and the architect Debret received a commission to build a new structure in the Rue Lepeletier.

Few persons have forgotten that handsome salle where everything was so admirably arranged, and the acoustic properties of which were unrivaled. Unfortunately the outside of the building did not correspond to the interior. In the Rue Lepeletier were first represented Count Ory's Moïse, Rossini's Guillaume Tell, Halévy's Juive and Reine de Chypre, Donizetti's Favorita, Meyerbeer's Robert le Diable, Huguenots, Prophète and Africaine, and Verdi's Don Carlos. On the 28th October, 1873, the house in the Rue Lepeletier went the way of all theatres, and was destroyed by fire. Fortunately the new Opéra, which had been commenced on the 1st of August, 1861, was by that time nearly completed, and after a season at the Salle Ventadour, the company, under the management of M. Halanzier, was able, on the 6th January, 1875, officially to take possession of the present Temple of Song, which was erected from the designs and under the superintendence of M. Charles Garnier.

It would be impossible to pass over entirely unnoticed a house which, despite the degradation of architecture and sculpture therein manifest, many have pronounced the finest opera house in the world; and first as to the figures: The auditorium, which was modeled on that of the house in the Rue Lepeletier, is somewhat smaller than that of La Scala at Milan, and San Carlo at Naples. Its seating capacity is 2400. There are 2531 doors and 7593 keys in the building. The house is heated by 14 furnaces and 450 grates. Nine reservoirs and two tanks hold over 22,000 gallons of water, which is distributed through some 22,000 feet of piping, while the gas pipes if united would form a pipe nearly 16 miles in length. Electricity for the scenic effects is generated by a battery of 70 cups.

There some eighty dressing-rooms for the leading artists, which have also a small ante-room and retiring-room attached. These apartments are brilliantly illuminated, and contain two looking-glasses affording full length views of the performers. They are likewise supplied with a grate and a register stove. There are about a hundred chorus singers employed, and accordingly there is one dressing-room for sixty male, and another for fifty female chorus singers. There are usually about a hundred supernumeraries—most of whom are engaged simply for those pieces in which they are wanted—but as it is necessary to be prepared for emergencies, the dressing-room of the "supers" has accommodations for nearly two hundred persons. There are some sixty costumers, and from seventy to one hundred carpenters. The male dancers' dressing-room has accommodations for thirty-four persons, while the four dressing-rooms assigned to the dansesuses will accommodate about twenty ladies. The foyer de la danse is naturally a far more attractive place than the singers' foyer, for in accordance with a custom introduced over a century ago subscribers to three performances a week are admitted between the acts to the former. Of course, all the admirers of the stars of the ballet may be found in this foyer, which is furnished with three colossal mirrors, one of which is 22½ feet in width and 32½ feet in height, and a chandelier with one hundred and seven burners. Here the ballet ladies may be seen practicing their steps, the inclination of the floor of the apartment being the same as that of the stage. The large foyer of the Opéra (180 feet by 42 feet, and 60 feet high) has obtained a certain reputation for its gilt and glitter. It has a rich golden tone, and the ceiling is adorned by Paul Baudry's paintings, illustrative of the arts from their origin to the present time. The mural paintings, also by Baudry, represent "The Judgment of Paris," "Apollo and Marsyas," "The Assault," "The Shepherds," "Jupiter and the Corybantes," "Salome," "Orpheus and the Mœnads,"

"St. Cecilia's Dream," "Paul and David," and "Orpheus and Eurydice." The foyer is illuminated by twelve chandeliers, and contains several mirrors, some 2½ feet high. Supplementary foyers connect with the chief apartment, and owing to the arrangement of the looking-glasses make the perspective endless. Five large glass doors lead from the foyer to the magnificent Italian loggia, whence the view along the boulevards and the adjacent streets is alone worth a good deal.

The stage is 196 feet in height, 198 feet in breadth, and 75 feet in depth. Behind it, in addition to the dressing rooms already spoken of, are a great number of offices, a library, and a room in which the archives (libretti, etc.) are kept. The Opéra house actually cost $13,000,000 in its construction, and the receipts for the year ending 31st March, 1877, were $637,855. The prices at the Opéra are high, but owing to the admirable arrangement of the salle d'attente, any decently-dressed person may enter the building, and without charge see the most fashionable people of Paris as, after alighting from their carriages, they pass through the room on their way to the boxes. The Opéra, in its decorative features, is typical of the degradation of art which characterized the Second Empire. Genre and chic are the two terms which will best express the greater part of the ornamentation and architectural "marvels" of the building. The first performance of Meyerbeer's Africaine at this new grand national theatre took place in December, 1877. The opera had not been performed since October, 1873, and hence no little interest was excited as to its production here. When first brought out in April, 1865, Marie Sass took the part of "Selika," Marie Battu that of "Ines," Faure that of "Nelusko," and Noudin that of "Vasco da Gama." At this new temple of song, Mlle. Gabrielle Krauss played "Selika," Mlle. Daram was the "Ines," Lassalle played "Nelusko," and Salomon took the part of "Vasco da Gama." The opera was gotten up on a scale of magnificence commensurate with the building. Thus in the ship scene in the third act the entire stage was taken up by the decks of the galleon, with pulleys, ropes, quarter-deck, cabin, and all appurtenances, and this very successful effort of representing with the greatest possible fidelity the object intended alone cost some $16,000. An immense sum was also spent upon the ballet. The opera proved a great success, M. Charles Lamoureux, the new conductor, being generally complimented upon his success in guiding the orchestra.

The manager of the Opéra house—who is of course a government appointee—receives a salary of $5,000, with an allowance in addition of $1600 for house rent, $1000 for a carriage, and one-half of the profits of the enterprise. These profits have averaged over $42,000 annually for the last eight years. The government pays for all new scenery, music, etc., and actually incurred an expense of $363,000 in presenting ten grand operas before a Parisian audience, to wit: L'Africaine cost $60,000; Faust, $39,000; Robert le Diable, $38,000; La Juive, $38,000; Don Giovanni, $38,000; Le Prophète, $35,000; Les Huguenots, $34,000; Hamlet, $30,000; Guillaume Tell, $28,000; La Favorita, $23,000.

The contract of the present director, M. Halanzier, which began in 1871, will expire in December, 1879. According to the terms of the cahier des charges, he should bring out two new works every season, one a grand opera with ballet, the other a minor opera or ballet. During the past seven years M. Halanzier has brought out only five new operas, viz.: La Coupe du Roi de Thule, L'Esclave, Jeanne d'Arc, Le Roi de Lahore, and Polyeucte. In the matter of ballets he has fallen still further short of his agreement, having presented only three, to-wit: Gretna Green, Sylvia, and Le Fandango. Considering that during these seven years M. Halanzier is understood to have made over $330,000 of profits for himself, the public has some right to complain that after the Government has assumed nearly all the risk of the enterprise the director should make so inadequate a return for his $160,000 annual subvention, his large salary, and other allowances. Thus, for instance, when the old Opéra House in the Rue Lepeletier was destroyed, M. Halanzier obtained from the Chambers the neat little sum of $300,000 in order to restore its scenery and decorations, and when the new Opéra was opened he managed to get another $500,000 from the Government in order that the scenery and stage appointments might be in keeping with the magnificence of the building itself. Supplementary allowances followed these, so that it is not surprising M. Halanzier should desire a renewal of his contract. The Opéra, which is open three nights a week in summer and five in winter, took in between 1st May and 31st October, 1878, $416,535 as against $229,437 during the 1867 Exhibition; the Français made $248,398 as against $152,773 during the former World's Show; the Variétés, which in 1867 made $172,170 out of the Grande Duchesse, only cashed $166,450 in 1878 from that broadest of broad French pieces, Niniche. It is possibly for this reason that the management—now that all fear of German susceptibilities being wounded has passed away—has revived the Grande Duchesse, with Paola Marié in the rôle of die grossherzige Grossherzogin. The once unfortunate Vaudeville, which in 1867 made $63,578 out of the Famille Benoiton and the Dame aux Camellias, induced the visitors of 1878 to deposit at its box office some $79,225 in order to see such pieces as the Club, Sardou's Bourgeois de Pont-Arcy, and the Dominos Roses. Thanks to the Cloches de Corneville, the Folies Dramatiques cashed $121,477 during the 1878 Exhibition as compared with $35,470 during the 1867 Exposition. As the admissions to the Exposition itself brought in $2,530,749 as against $1,966,074 at the 1867 Weltausstellung, it will be seen that the increase of patronage at the theatres was about fairly proportioned the augmented receipts at the Exhibition.

The Opéra employs not less than 95 musicians, 26 male singers, 13 cantatrices, 156 machinists, carpenters, and workmen, 40 door-keepers and attendants, and 34 superintendents, besides a varying number of chorus singers, ballet dancers and supernumeraries. The average pay-roll embraces some six hundred names, which is about nine per cent. of the total number of persons employed in the 48 theatres of Paris. Of course a large proportion of these, being minor theatres, the stranger need consider himself under no sort of obligation to visit them any more than the three score and ten cafés-concerts which are sprinkled over the gay city. A visit to the houses we have above described will suffice to convince him that from a truly artistic point of view the leading theatres of Paris are the leading theatres of the world.

THE TRUTH IS BETTER THAN A LIE.

In connection with the death of General D. D. Colton San Francisco has just had a striking instance of the popular love for scandal, and the preference some people seem to have for believing the most absurd lies rather than the sober truth. This gentleman died in his own house, in his own bed, after a sickness of ten days' duration. He was attended by his family physician. He was surrounded by his personal and life-long friends, and every circumstance tended to preclude the slightest possibility of question or mystery touching the cause or circumstances of his demise. Nor were the facts of his death any more open to the world relatively than were his family relations while living. Yet the public, by a strange freak, chose to question the character given to both by those persons best entitled to know the real facts.

General Colton was a man of special prominence in our California life. It is not going too far to say that no man out of high public office, and possibly none in such station, occupied a more prominent position or took up a larger share of public attention than he. His life—public and private—was as thoroughly understood as it is possible to understand the life of any man. He was eminently social in his habits. He entertained his friends and acquaintance, not merely at wide intervals, but with a frequency that seemed to challenge and defy the criticism of his less wealthy or more parsimonious fellow-citizens. His door was always open, and the very light of day shone in upon the domestic life and habits of the family, illumining the inner recesses of the household. Nothing could be hidden. A great number of respectable and intelligent people—gentlemen and ladies of fortune, business men, trades-people, servants, employés, and retainers of every description—had ingress and egress to and from his residence at all times. If all these people did not know the true condition of the family, the relations of its various members to each other, then no man's friends, neighbors, or servants can ever know how he lives. They did know, and they thoroughly agree as to the facts. As to the tender and loving affection of every member of the family to every other member, there is not the shadow of a doubt. It was, and is, the unqualified belief of every friend of the family, from the most intimate to the most casual and occasional visitor; it was, and is, the uniform testimony of every servant and employé, of every tradesman and solicitor, who had any means whatever of forming an opinion, that the relations of the deceased to his wife and children was that of the best and most loving of husbands, of the kindest and most devoted of fathers, and that this was reciprocated to a degree in real life seldom equaled, and never surpassed. To this testimony there is not, we believe, a solitary exception in all the years the family has existed. The closest intimates of the house, those who had a seat at the jambs of the fireplace, were, and always have been, the most enthusiastic in their admiration of what they describe, with unvarying uniformity, as the absolute perfection of the united, devoted, and loving household. Two months ago this family was separated for what was intended to be a short interval. The wife and daughter paid a visit to the Atlantic States, leaving General Colton at home. His apparently well-established health took from the separation every possible misgiving as to a speedy reunion of the family. But in the inscrutable wisdom of Providence, and before they could return—although quickly telegraphed for—the husband and father was seized with what proved to be a mortal illness. The best medical skill was promptly called to the patient's bedside; not merely one, but several physicians, eminent in their profession, and well known as men of probity and honor, stood around him, doing all that human power was capable of doing. All of his personal friends within reach hastened to him. When his case became hopeless, these gentlemen made known to him his condition. With the courage to be expected from such a man, he at once and cheerfully set about preparing for the great change. He made his will, leaving his estate to his wife, at the same time employing his latest dying breath in uttering expressions and leaving messages of regard and affection for her, describing her as the "idol of his heart," the object of his "tenderest and life-long devotion," and died breathing her name. These are facts, authenticated as thoroughly as the death-bed events of any man, public or private, within our knowledge. It is certain that General Colton died of the disease and in the manner described by his physicians. Meanwhile the grief-stricken family were flying overland as fast as steam could carry them, first in the hope of seeing the dying husband and father still alive, and, that hope gone, to attend the obsequies. But steam and lightning were slow when compared to the rapidity of malicious rumor. The poisoned shafts of slander were like the arrows of Xerxes' host—they filled the air.

To enumerate the different calumnies that had already obtained circulation would fill a book. It was gravely stated "that the family had not lived happily together; that a separation was imminent if it had not actually taken place." As if the grief of the wife at being absent at such a time was not enough of itself, malice must add the additional sting of a suggestion that it had been purposely final. But these lies, though bad enough, were not the worst that confronted the afflicted widow at the threshold of her desolated home. The cause of the husband's death was made the subject of hateful and malignant question. "He had not," so they said, "died a natural death." "He had been in some mysterious way taken off by violence." Just how no two of the poison-distributors could, or apparently tried to, agree, but it was whispered about the clubs, and always in a semi-confidential way, that General Colton had been murdered, and that his friends and physicians were trying to keep back the interesting fact from its proper receptacle—the club lunch-tables—and even to conceal it from the lunch-eaters themselves. From the clubs the lie soon found its way to the street corners, and in one case into a second-rate journal. In vain the dead man's physicians denied, asseverated, expostulated; in vain the friends of the deceased pointed out the absurdity and improbability of each of the diabolical inventions, and the utter incongruity of all; in vain they asked what reason anybody had to suppose them or any one of them likely to be guilty of permitting the murder of a friend to go unpunished, and to commit such a crime as the compounding of a felony to accomplish it; in vain they reminded society of what it must know, or at least ought to know, touching the house where it had been so often entertained, and the household now broken up and rendered desolate. Nothing would satisfy the scandal-mongers. The club-loungers and lunchers still winked and nodded, and whispered as before, and the stories (ever changing in form, according to the taste or ingenuity of the inventor) continued to circulate. That they were ever actually believed by anybody we greatly doubt. They were always too improbable for genuine belief; but their existence produced perhaps the only effect intended by the authors of these lies. They added something, just how much or how little it is difficult to estimate, to the anguish of the only real mourner any man ever has—his wife. She was stung by the doubt cast upon the love of her life, and the stains upon the memory of him to whom it belonged. To the rest of the world the question was idle, whether true or false. It was scandal, and consequently sweet to hear and tell. But to the widow the stories were not mere words; they were weapons wielded with terrific force—poisoned arrows piercing her heart.

If it is any comfort to the slander mongers to know this, let them be encouraged, for they have succeeded. The physicians have no time to follow each story with a specific denial. They have other work to do. They put on record a detailed statement of the facts as they occurred for the benefit of those who wish to know, and there stopped. If anybody would rather believe the truth than a lie they can read it. Time, which sets all things right, will in the end do justice to the memory of General Colton; who, whatever faults he may have had, was certainly a man worthy of his time; a man whose energy and judgment have had as pronounced an effect in the development of California as those of any other named individual, be that other who he may, and for that we owe him something. But besides this, he in his lifetime brought together, set up, and cared for a home and family, that loved him because he was to them all that ever can be contained in the words husband and father. And it is some consolation to know that, whatever the world may say, to these at least his memory will ever be pure and precious.

A "Bit of Color."

A lady correspondent of the East stirs some solemnly sweet memories with the following gentle rhapsody anent autumn in the valley of the Connecticut:

"It is but a few days—so long and lovingly has the autumn lingered with us—since I returned from a woodland walk all aflame with the many-tinted foliage of October. I entered the house 'clothed on' (for the easier carrying thereof, I had wreathed a small forest about throat, and arms, and waist) with golden walnut leaves, the rosy bloom of the maple, the royal oak's imperial purple, and the crimson splendor of the sumac. Only the evening before, the woods (how one loves that old-fashioned plural!) had looked comparatively green; but that morning one might have fancied that a battle had been lost and won, so ominous, so lurid, so wickedly lovely was the bloody red of the poisonous ivy, and that of all its venomous kindred. But no, it was only the gay foot-print of Autumn, following softly after, and pressing out as she stepped the verdant vestiges of her sister, Summer. To eyes accustomed for many years to the more subdued tints of California, the universal, intense greenery of New England had become a little monotonous. But in the blaze of the yearly miracle-play peculiar to these latitudes, I had to acknowledge that the East possessed one preëminent glory denied to the otherwise more favored Occident. A carnival of spirit colorists might have held mad revel in the woods the night before—Fra Angelico, Titian, Correggio, Tintoretto—each leaving behind him his pallet or pigments as he fled at cock-crow. And yet fair Nature in her Eastern harlequin robes seems to me a little loud, after the rich seal-browns and delicate ambers, the snowy outlines and tender blues of the Golden State. Her yellows are a trifle tawdry; her reds, too intense; her purple, slightly theatrical; and her autumnal greens, too garish, verdi-greasy, and slimy, to quite please eyes accustomed to the dignified and solemn verdure of the Californian forests at this season. But the rounded contour of the softly-undulating hills, seen through a veil of ethereal mist, contrasting with the piquant sharpness of the Sierras, and the delicious languor of the atmosphere as a set off to our cruel trade winds, intoxicated me with delight. I loitered along the woodpaths, paved with many-tinted maple leaves, and luxuriated in the sweet habitude of being with a perfect abandon, exclaiming with Concord's sage, 'The beauty that shimmers in the yellow afternoons of October, who can clutch it?' Ah! who indeed! Who can clutch the morning-red, vanishing as one gazes; the potable gold of the matchless sunset; the rainbow scarf, flung along the mountain side; the flamboyant auroral pennants that quiver to the zenith? These magnificent phenomena may be seen in their utmost splendor in the Orient of the New World. But we outside barbarians of occidentals are not without our compensations, and one finds as one travels most extensively, that no one locality monopolizes all the beauty of the far-reaching universe."

Mr. Henry Kirkpatrick has a bronze coin of Egypt that he found in New Orleans, two weeks ago, while spading a garden. It bears the inscription "PTOLEMAIUS. S. BASILEUS," "Ptolemy Soter, the King," on the reverse. On the obverse is the head of a shaggy and bearded man. Ptolemy Soter ascended the throne 323 years before Christ, and was the first of the dynasty. The coin is admirably preserved, and is well worthy of mention. But what the old rascal wanted money around New Orleans gardens for, dropping coins that no respectable car-driver would accept, is a dark and miserable misery, Soter speak.

The following pensées are from La Vie Parisienne: Women ask of love that it shall make them forget everything or look for nothing. When a woman talks to her reason it is a sign that she is about to listen to her heart. Women generally confound their desire with their interest, hence they make so many errors prejudicial to themselves, thinking that what satisfies them serves them. Women hold more to approbation than to esteem—care less for praise of their good qualities than for obliviousness as to their bad ones. Which is the sorer for a woman, regret at not being understood, or disgust at being found out?

THE OTHER POETS.

A Gray Night.

One shadow slides from the dumb shore,
And one from every silent sail.
One cloud the averted heavens wear—
A soft mask, thin and frail.

Oh, silver is the lessening rain,
And yellow was the weary drouth!
The reef her warning finger puts
Upon the harbor's mouth.

Her thin, wan finger, stiff and stark,
She holds by night, she holds by day.
Ask, if you will, no answer makes
The sombre, guarded bay.

The fleet, with idle canvass hung,
Like a brute life sleeps patiently;
The head-lights nod across the cliff,
The fog blows out to sea.

There is no color on the tide,
No color on the passive sky;
Across the beach a safe, small sound—
The grass-hid cricket's cry.

And through the dusk I hear the keels
Of home-bound boats grate low and sweet,
O happy lights I can not see,
Leap out the sound to greet!

O tender arms I can not touch,
Gather and garner while ye may!
The morrow knoweth God. Ye know
Your own are yours to-day.

I bless you, sitting here alone;
I bless you, sitting in the gray;
For pain and passion pass at last,
As tides ebb down the bay.

And all the colors of the day
And colors of the night are one;
Content, they blend to weave the veil
That hides the setting sun.

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS.

The Tyranny of Mood.

MORNING.

It is enough; I feel, this golden morn,
As if a royal appanage were mine,
Through Nature's queenly warrant of divine
Investure. What princess, palace-born,
Hath right of rapture more, when skies adorn
Themselves so grandly; when the mountains shine
Transfigured; when the air exalts like wine;
When pearly purples steep the yellowing corn?
So satisfied with all the goodness
Of God's good world, my being to its brim
Surcharged with utter thankfulness no less Than bliss of beauty passionately glad,
Through rush of tears that leaves the landscape dim,
"Who dares," I cry, "in such a world be sad!"

NIGHT.

I press my cheek against the window-pane,
And gaze abroad into the blank, black space
Where earth and sky no more have any place,
Wiped from existence by the expunging rain,
And as we hear the worried winds complain,
A darkness darker than the murky shows trace
Invades the curtained room is on our face,
Beneath which life and life's best ends seem vain.
My swelling aspirations viewless sink,
As yon cloud-bloted hills; hopes that shone bright
As planets' vesters-eye, like them to-night
Are gulfed, the impenetrable mist before.
"O weary world," I cry, "how dare I think Thou hast for me one gleam of gladness more!"
MARGARET J. PRESTON.

Dorothy.—A Reverie.

[SUGGESTED BY THE NAME UPON A PANE.]

She then must once have looked, as I
Look now across the level rye—
Past church, and manor-house, and seen,
As now I see, the village green,
The bridge, and Walton's river—she Whose old-world name was "Dorothy."

The swallows must have twitted, too,
Above her head; the roses blew
Below, no doubt—and, sure, the South
Crept up the wall and kissed her mouth—
That wistful mouth that comes to me
Linked with her name of Dorothy.

What was she like? I picture her
Unmet for uncouth worshipper;
Soft, pensive, far too subtly graced
To suit the blunt bucolic taste,
Whose crude perception could but see
"Ma'am Fine-airs" in "Miss Dorothy."

How not? She loved, may be, perfume,
Soft texture, lace, a half-lit room;
Perchance too candidly preferred
"Clarissa" to a gossip's word;
And, for the rest, would seem to be
Or proud or dull—this Dorothy.

Poor child! with heart the down-lined nest
Of warmest instincts unconfront,
Soft, callow things, that vaguely felt
The breeze caress, the sunlight melt,
But yet by some obscure decree
Unwinged from birth—poor Dorothy!

Not less I dream her mute desire
To ached churl and booby squire,
Now pale, with timorous eyes that filled
At "twice-told tales" of foves killed;
Now trembling when slow tongues grew free
"Twixt sport, and Port—and Dorothy!"

'Twas then she'd seek this nook, and find
Its evening landscape balmy-kind;
And here, where still her gentle name
Lives on the old green glass, would frame
Fond dreams of unfound harmony
"Twixt heart and heart. Poor Dorothy!

L'ENVOI.

These last I spoke. Then Florence said,
Below me: "Dreams? Delusions, Fred!"
Next with a pause—she bent the while
Over a rose, with roguish smile—
"But how disgusted, Fred, you'll be
To hear I scrawled that 'Dorothy'!"

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } - - - - - Editors.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1879.

Owing to the absolute impossibility of getting our new title well printed in the large sixteen-page form, we have decided to replace it for a time with the old heading. As soon as arrangements can be perfected the illustrated title page will again appear, heading from four to eight additional pages. With the present size every inch of room is needed for reading matter, which is a consideration outside that of the damaging effect of poor printing.

If we could make the Republican candidate for the Presidency we would name the Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, our late Minister to Paris, as the banner-bearer of the party in the next Presidential campaign. If we could declare the President of the United States, to succeed the present incumbent, we would name the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, Senator from New York. We regard Governor Washburne as the most available candidate, and, in event of his election, he would make an intelligent, safe, patriotic, and honest administration. We look upon Mr. Roscoe Conkling as an able, high-minded, and honest-minded statesman, from whom the Republic would take no hurt. We hear him criticised by his enemies (the jealous-minded, small men, who crawl and hiss and bite the heels of gentlemen) as proud, austere, and aristocratic. We have a personal acquaintance with the Senator from New York, and he seems to us proud and haughty, and in his deportment reserved; he has the manner of a gentleman. The time has come when we demand a proud man for President; for pride is a synonym of all the manly virtues. The proud man is brave, is honest, is generous, is just; the proud man is necessarily intelligent. The pride of which we write is that which comes from birth and breeding, from education and association with gentlemen, from consciousness of an honest purpose, and a just ambition to attain the highest honors of the nation, and a resolute determination to wear those honors fitly. The man whom we would elect to the great executive office should be too proud to accept advancement secured by the arts of an intriguing demagogue; he should be too proud to consort with the gutter politicians of our cities; he should be too proud to degrade himself by association with ring thieves and plunderers; too proud to stoop to the mean and contemptible devices that make villains successful and enable base-minded intriguants to prosper in politics; he should be too proud to become the parasite of those in power; he should have the resolute, manly pride that comes from conscious rectitude of purpose, from conscious ability, from absolute self-reliance. We think the Hon. Roscoe Conkling such a man, and should be proud to advance him by our writings, our vote, and our influence to become the chief magistrate of our Republic. We do not think he will be either candidate or President; the times are too degenerate, the people too indifferent, and the Republican leadership too utterly corrupt and selfish to ever aid Mr. Roscoe Conkling to a Presidential nomination. His fate is to be that of Clay, Webster, Seward, and many others who were too great and too ambitious to ever become President.

We rank Mr. Washburne among the level-headed men of America. He is the type of the prairie land: honest beyond suspicion; equal to any position that he has been called to fill; of large experience, great common sense, simplicity of manner; devoid of personal vanity; of good habits; one who if elected President would give the political and party engine a turn back; introduce economy into all the departments of government; endeavor to bring the Republic back to something like its early simplicity of political administration; would at least attempt to choke off thieves that are fastening themselves upon every department of State. Mr. Washburne served for many (we can not state how many) years in Congress. He was Secretary of State for a month

—a foolish little by-play between President Grant and himself which we never understood. He then became Minister to France, serving through the eventful period of the German war, as the result of which the Napoleonic dynasty and empire went down in ashes red with French blood, and out of the ashes of which comes, we prophesy, an enduring republic. In all these official positions Mr. Washburne was honest, in the last he was great; as member of Congress from Illinois there is no stain upon his honor during a long political career. When the war came his patriotism rose to the level of the occasion. He discovered Grant, brought him forward, made him, sustained him, never faltered in courage or counsel, and always looked through the lowering clouds of discouragement and defeat for the bright promise of that sun that brought us final victory and national preservation. We speak from personal observation of Mr. Washburne, when, chosen to represent all the German States, he remained and held the balance of a great trust fairly between warring nationalities, doing justice to German citizens in Paris, clothing them when in danger with the garment of our flag, throwing over them the protection of our shield, feeding the German hungry and warming the German cold, protecting German lives and property against the madness of French jealousy and the hot impulse of French passion. We have seen him at midnight sending off German women and children by railroad; we have seen him by day riding amid the raining shot of Valerien, Issy, Passy, and Montrouge, defending German property from the menace of a communistic mob. We had opportunity to observe how calm and self-poised and brave an American could be when facing the dangers of a siege and the battle of barricades, when two French armies fought in the streets of Paris with artillery, cavalry, and infantry. We were in a position to observe how justly and how generously he treated all sides, and how admirably he carried himself among the contending factions that grew out of the political complications of the period.

During this period Mr. Washburne demonstrated himself more than an ordinary man. From the day that the French Emperor bore his boy to the battle-field to undergo his "baptism of fire," all through the eventful period of the German war and the war of the Commune, Mr. Washburne was placed in positions of great and varying responsibility. The "baptism of fire" became one of blood, ending in the captivity of the sire and the flight of the son. The Empire fell, the Empress took to flight, the Government of National Defense was announced by Gambetta from a balcony of the Hôtel de Ville. The Germans surrounded Paris. Gambetta escaped in a balloon to Tours, to organize a new capital, a new army, a new system of finance. France was conquered, Paris occupied by the German army. The Commune seized authority, the Germans were in occupation across the Seine, the government at Versailles was under Thiers, the army under MacMahon was shelling Paris. The fight of the Commune resulted in the victory of the Government troops. All through long months of excitement and war, Paris starving, France heroic to resist and France humiliated by defeat, Paris wrenched by civil war, the American Minister, flaunting his American flag in the Rue Chio, calmly and prudently administered the affairs of his own Government, those of the governments intrusted to him, steering himself and his embassy safely and with dignity through the dangers of constantly changing authorities. Out of all this came Mr. Washburne, having earned the gratitude of Germany, the respect of France, and deserving the admiration of his own countrymen. When the British Minister, Lord Lyons, fled from the besieged city and took up his quarters in Tours, our Minister stood at his post with those of his own countrymen and of the Germans who had not the ability or the opportunity to make their escape. Every American has a right to be proud of Mr. Washburne's conduct as Minister to France.

Such a man would make an admirable President of the United States, and in event of his election it is our confident belief that he would bring integrity and intelligence to the administration of his office equal to that of any President that has ever honored the position, except, of course, Abraham Lincoln. We except President Lincoln from all comparisons; his intelligence, his patriotism, and his integrity were a miracle of God; his administration a special providence.

Such a man as Mr. Washburne ought to be available as a party candidate. He ought to be fairly and honorably entitled to every vote of every naturalized German or citizen of German descent in America. If there is anything in the Germans' boasted love of Fatherland, if there is any gratitude in the German breast, or any pride of German nationality, they ought, every mother's son of them, to vote for the ambassador and gentleman who, through battle and strife, cold and starvation, stood by the wives and children of Germans when Paris was besieged by German arms. Such considerations as these ought to sink deeper down into the German stomach than all questions of Sunday amusement, keeping open lager beer saloons after midnight, pretty waiters, or indeed any of those other momentous political questions that are so potent to control the German vote. We know of no good reason why that other great and powerful political faction that has honored our country by choosing it for an asylum should not also give to Mr. Washburne at least enough votes to allow it to come with unblushing cheek to the distribution of spoils, and without embarrassment ask for its share of offices. With the entire German vote cast for Mr. Washburne, it is probable that Americans would be strong enough to hold the balance of power, and secure to him enough electoral votes to overcome a solid Democratic South. It is probable, too, that even the South might see its interest in foregoing its opportunity to draw sectional color lines in the coming Presidential election.

But of course Mr. Washburne will not be nominated; Mr. Conkling will not be nominated; Mr. Blaine will not be nominated. General Grant will be nominated. Integrity with service, statesmanship with learning, eloquence with zeal, will count for but little in a Convention manipulated by devil-fish, whose tentacles are stretched throughout the nation, feeling for spoils and grasping for the loot and plunder of office.

If General Grant is not nominated—and he may not be if the school of devil-fish shall determine that some unknown political idiot, whose record is too obscure to find any blemish in it, is more available—then we may be called upon to save the country under some new and unknown gentleman and statesman, whose virtues and excellencies will be made to appear as the necessity arises for their description and recital.

We await developments. It is rumored that Mr. George C. Gorham is to come with capital, type, and cheek to run a daily organ for our instruction, to rodeo the Republican animals and put his brand upon them. It is said that special attention will be given by the politicians at Washington to matters in California; that our four Congressmen and electoral vote are deemed important. It is said that the Federal authorities in San Francisco and in California have already chosen their candidate for Governor; and that the wires are laid and the batteries charged for his nomination; and the bargain made by which a Lieutenant-Governor and a Warden at the prison are to be selected. We hear two names for Congress: one for the San Francisco, and one for the Second District. One will conciliate the Bulletin, and one the Chronicle. We hear of a bargaining that shall result in a ticket of a compromise character, satisfactory to certain material interests, and acceptable to the ambition of certain political conspirators. We are convinced there is a devilish and deep-laid political conspiracy now being hatched in San Francisco, and only awaiting the adjournment of the Constitutional Convention and the adoption or rejection of its work, to put in effective operation. The parties engaged in it are the same who have twice given the State to the Democracy, who have given San Francisco a Democratic majority, and against whom we have registered a vow that they shall not succeed if we can help it.

Denis Kearny has again made a meddlesome ass of himself. His last act of Celtic impudence was to attend a meeting of the depositors of the French Bank. He had no money in the bank, could not speak the language. He abused in round terms our best French citizens, particularizing offenses against Mr. Gustave Touchard, than whom there is no man of more honorable record in our State. Denis is a cosmopolitan scold, and does not spare his own countrymen. He gives the leather of his tongue to Mr. Myles D. Sweeny, President of the Hibernia Bank, and pours out his indiscriminate blackguardism against the other directors. His sublimest act of insolence was to visit the Tax Collector's office and object to the payment of taxes by checks and certificates of deposits in bank. How long is this ignorant and meddlesome Irish blatherskite to be allowed to blaspheme God and interfere in affairs of which he is as blindly ignorant as the ass that fathered the mule he so cowardly assaulted? How long is this affliction of insolence and arrogance to be meekly endured? How much must the American citizen and the respectable foreigner submit to before they will be allowed to raise the cry, "This demagogue and all his criminal adherents must go?" He should be banished back to Ireland, where he would find a public sentiment and an administration of the laws which an indulgent public opinion does not enforce in this his adopted country. We are impatient of Denis; he talks too much with his mouth. We are anxious to have him act; we are impatient to see the scrimmage; we have never attended a Donnybrook fair; we have never witnessed the lively motion of the blackthorn, nor heard the music of its playful thump upon the Irish scone. We look forward in fond anticipation of seeing Denis and his awkward squad in argument of sticks and stones with the police.

The Constitutional Convention will probably sit in permanence; $10 a day, with the scrip selling at fifty cents on the dollar, is such an overwhelming pecuniary inducement to a majority of the body that we shall not be surprised to see its sittings prolonged through a hard winter. It is better than one dollar a day on the park with pick and shovel, and not nearly as hard work.

AFTERMATH.

We are delighted in expectation of a toothsome bit of gossip concerning the O'Brien family. We look forward with pleasurable anticipation to a long legal wrangle over a dead gentleman's property, that shall drag the skeleton from the closet, if there was one, and set the friends chattering at the hearthstone. We shall look forward to our daily journals with a new zest for sensational items in double-leaded type and alliteration of words, long columns of scandal in pica, long primer, bourgeois, brevier, minion, nonpareil, agate, pearl, and diamond. The interviewing fiend is already abroad, and, like the miasmatic exhalations of the sewers, he is crawling under bed-room doors, and stealing noiselessly through corridor and keyholes, to listen there and tattle. We are impatient for this new sensation to open. The Colton scandal dies with this issue of the ARGONAUT; the Bulletin-Call-Chronicle libel suit, with its nauseous detail of nasty epithets, drags wearily; O'Donnell smells to heaven; Denis Kearney grows flat, stale, and unprofitable. The School for Scandal threatens a vacation. The Duncan failure, escape, and trial, no longer interest us; the Constitutional Convention no longer attracts our notice, as its members have stopped dying; there is an interval of prospective dullness between this and the next election; stocks are down; suicides, murders, rapes, and burglaries are alarmingly infrequent; divorces are too common to interest; swindles, failures, bankruptcies, and flights are only an hour's sensation. What we demand is a good old-fashioned nine days' wonder—a scandal over which we may smack our lips, look wise, and whisper to each other.

We call upon the commercial and family dailies to demonstrate anew the enterprise that has so eminently characterized them in the past. Let reporters of most fertile imaginations, and interviewers of most wiggling and insinuous capacities, be sent abroad to spy into this matter. Let the newspapers be bloody, bold, and resolute; inventive, spicy, and original; then all themasses will read them, and we shall rejoice and be exceeding glad, and our joy and our gladness will be just in the inverse measure of somebody else's shame, humiliation, and sorrow. Their loss is our gain.

Is there not a little confusion in the minds of our municipal officers as to whom they are serving—the public or Mr. Denis Kearney? This person has a habit of stalking into their offices, catechizing them with regard to the way in which they discharge their duties, withholding his approval from their methods, and finally intimating his conviction that they are thieves. Some of them no doubt are, but if they were not also cowardly demagogues, afraid of the sand-lots—and that's worse than stealing—they would kick the Kearney person with considerable energy and lasting effect. We know a public officer is "accountable to the people" (though we do not know what that means), but no private citizen has authority to demand an accounting at his pleasure; that is a right belonging only to the reporters of the daily press, if we correctly understand the law.

San Rafael is to have a beautiful new cemetery, the projector and proprietor of which is Dr. Dubois, a local physician. We hope it will be a long time before the following epitaph may be read there:

Pause, stranger, and regard this bust—
I was Dubois, I now am dust;
But men attain to greatness through
Not what they are, but what they do.
A thousand graves with each a name
Attest my work and fix my fame.

When all the dirty linen of the School Department has been washed, and mended, and aired, and hung up to dry, we hope the attention of our tax-payers will be directed to the pernicious errors and extravagances that have fastened themselves upon our free school system. What was originally contended to the children of the poor as a charity, has now become an insolent and audacious exaction. Society undertook to give a free education in rudimentary English branches to those children of parents who were too poor to provide it, and now the system has grown to an extravagant and exacting political power. The School Department is about the most corrupt of all the departments of the city government. It needs pruning, and the first member to be lopped off is the head. Expenses should be reduced not less than five hundred thousand dollars a year. All the studies of science, classics, higher mathematics, languages, calisthenics, music, drawing, should be dispensed with. All the teachers of cosmopolitan schools, and all the male teachers from Berlin and Boston who have aided to build up this expensive and costly structure should be dismissed from the department, and the whole thing brought back to the simplicity and economy of earlier and better days.

There is neither sense nor honesty in taxing the community to educate the children of the rich; let all that are able educate their own children. We ought to educate the poor; we ought to feed the poor and destitute, if they are hungry, on bread, and meat, and plain food, but not on pâté de foie gras, truffles, and champagne. We ought to give poor children a plain, sensible, common English education. If they aspire to the luxuries of learning, let them toil for them. We do not believe in over-educating. Somebody must work, and all the stuff and nonsense about education making better hod-carriers, sand-shovelers, floor-scrubbers, cooks, wash-women, maids of all work, and menial servants, we do not believe. Somebody must work, and nobody that graduates at our boys' or girls' high schools will ever become a servant. Plenty of these graduates have become hoodlums and worse, but no graduate of the Boys' High School ever become a day laborer if by his wits he could avoid it; and no graduate of the Girls' High School ever willingly attended any baby but her own.

To take any German, Irish, or Yankee child at sixteen years of age, provide it with books, carry it through a course of education and finished accomplishments, in order that it may graduate at the curb-stone, play the piano, or become eligible to the Industrial School or Magdalen Asylum, is a burden we are not willing to bear. It is a system under which society is going to the devil at a breakneck pace. It is an abuse that ought to be corrected, and the first step in the direction of reform is to tear away and destroy all this false sentimentality and spurious demagoguery that hedges in the common-school system. Make the lower schools better; give them more and better teachers; give these teachers a smaller number of scholars; abolish the high schools and cosmopolitan schools; do away with the higher teachers, and let no child be taught at the expense of the public unless its parents and guardians are too poor to educate it. This is the original idea of a free, public common-school system; all the rest is organized stealing.

"Omnium Gatherum," whose so-called "sonnet" we murderously criticised in these columns last week—even going so far as to print it—writes us a good-natured letter, showing that he isn't mad even the tiniest little bit. Confound the fellow! will nothing provoke him? Ha! we have it—go at him with an epigram:

"G." writes very little; 'tis strange, is it not?
I'll tell you the why and the wherefore:
He cares not a fig for his fame as a bard,
And he has not a fig's worth to care for.

The foregoing is not very good verse, but we feel assured that it will somehow remind "Omnium Gatherum" of Byron's—particularly of the familiar lines:

"So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
Viewed his own feathers on the fatal dart,
And winged the shaft that quivered in his heart."

We have our own reasons for thinking so—one of which is, that our epigram is by "Omnium Gatherum" himself. And it wouldn't be bad either if it were correctly rhymed.

We call attention to this fact in the Reed libel case: Two weeks ago the Chronicle very severely commented on the unfair and partial rulings of Judge Louderback. The Bulletin is now doing the same thing. While the trial is pending these newspaper litigants are discussing the question, and each in turn censuring the court. Judge Louderback should imprison all the proprietors for contempt. It is a wrong and an insult to our judicial system, and is a most cowardly and contemptible thing for any respectable newspaper or reputable person to do. Thistleton, of the Jolly Giant, or O'Donnell, if guilty of the same offense, would be sent to prison. Judge Louderback would do a brave and manly act if he would teach the insolent press a salutary lesson by sending its owners to the county jail. The community would sustain him. Judge Louderback dare not do it, because his election occurs every two years and he stands in fear of the influence of the press.

The London World says that Lord Ronald Gower has cleverly executed a bust of the late Mr. H. J. Montague, the actor, but that the expression of the face is rather more serious than that usually worn by Mr. Montague. We presume his lordship has tried to represent "poor Monty" as he would have looked had he known that Maud Granger and Jeffreys-Lewis were going to play at his funeral.

Sunday last was a white day for France, a glorious and triumphant ending of a long, bloody, and eventful struggle. The crimes, the intrigues, the wretched profligacy of the empire went out with the captivity and death of the third Napoleon, the flight and exile of the Empress and Prince Imperial. France is to-day a republic. Sunday's election, in determining the character of the Senate, fixes, we believe, for all time to come, the democratic government of France. Aristocratic birth no longer determines the choice of men who shall govern the French people. Vive la France! Vive la République! we exclaim with all the enthusiasm of a French citizen. We were in Paris on the day when the Emperor was taken prisoner by the Germans; we saw the joy of a people delivered from a usurper who had stolen an empire by perjury and assassination, and maintained it by the bayonets of Turcos. We saw great bearded men embrace and kiss each other in the enthusiasm of their joy at deliverance from the hated dynasty of Napoleon. We have watched the development of republican sentiment from the hour that Paris was permitted to sing the "Marseillaise," all through the fight of the Commune, and now sail with satisfaction the final triumph of republican government over church, aristocracy, and political power. Vive la France! Vive la République! Vive Gambetta!

There is but one advantage in "dying rich": it resuscitates many of one's relations who died years before. They come crawling out of their graves as thick as earth-worms after a rain, and they attack the estate as a regiment of Kansas grasshoppers assails a cabbage patch. And then they go back on their own epitaphs, and say that they have all the time been canning salmon at Santa Fé, or herding cats in Siskiyou, or mining for bar soap in Humboldt, or growing door-knobs in Oregon, or doing anything anywhere that there is no money in. But these stories are weak; it is not possible to mention an industry so unprofitable as to produce such destitution as theirs. A man must have been dead—and dead a long time, too—to be as poor as the contestants of a rich man's will.

If there is any day that we respect it is the Sabbath; of all the Christian ordinances that which we hold in highest esteem is the one that says we shall do no work on Sunday. Upon this holy day the bill collector has no authority to annoy us with his importunity; the devil does not pursue us for copy. We wish there were six Sundays in the week instead of one. We never could see the propriety of giving six days to the devil and one to the Lord.

We hold in grateful remembrance the fact that last year, at about this time, when threatened by a dry season, Archbishop Alemany humbly petitioned the divine dispenser of blessings, and the result was abundant rain, plenteous harvests, and a prosperous season. Reverently we suggest that he again pray for rain. It was hinted last year that his grace prayed upon a falling barometer, with clouds overhead, and a warm south wind. The opportunity is now presented to demonstrate the efficacy of prayer against a clear sky and a strong norther.

Probably the most terrible indictment that has yet been brought against General Grant is that of the New York Sun, which avers that two years in Europe have turned his head, and "made him a confirmed believer in strong governments, and an imitator of the usages of kings and emperors." We confess it seems to us that a strong government is not necessarily incompatible with national welfare, if it is a good one; indeed, if that is so we should say the stronger the better. A government is so potent for good or evil that when its energies are intelligently organized and beneficently directed every patriot will wish "more power to its elbow." If Grant is a convert to "the usages of kings and emperors" he does not materially differ in that respect from the rest of us. Kings and emperors eat, drink, sleep, work, marry and are given in marriage, play, and do pretty much as men of less exalted station do. In addition to this they have done most of the good governing. Perhaps our contemporary means that Grant is an imitator of bad kings and emperors. Well, he was not made so by his tour in Europe, but by his stay in Washington.

It seems almost too ridiculous that in this age and at this period of American life and culture it should be necessary to remind a great journal that "the usages of kings and emperors" are not always and necessarily wicked—that human nature is pretty much the same in a man who is called a sovereign and a man whose title is President. Shall we ever recover from this childish terror and detestation of "crowned heads"—the mark and sign of a republicanism that is but "skin deep" and distrusts itself? Why can't we let the "crowned" heads alone, and do something to improve our own?

General Grant is now stumping Ireland for the Presidency. His speech at Dublin was a most excellent one, and well calculated to catch the Irish vote. Cork is not so complaisant; the Irish have obtained control of the City Council, and they refused to vote the Republican candidate the freedom of the town and a gold snuff-box. The consequence was he refused to visit the town, passed on to the castle and groves of Blarney, where he has gone to kiss the Blarney-stone in preparation for his American campaign when he gets the Republican nomination as a third-term candidate for President of the United States.

It will be rather a blow to the members of the City Council, however, to learn from the cable dispatches to the American press that "General Grant had made up his mind that he could not visit Cork, before hearing of their official action." As for us whose "withers are unwrung" it merely reminds us of Cataline's speech, as reported by the Oil City Derrick man:

"Banished from Rome! What's banished but set free
From daily contact with the things I loathe?
And I was about to move out of town anyhow."

They have a saloon in Bodie called "The Argonaut." We hope we appreciate this compliment, if for no other reason, on account of its rarity. There have been no churches named "The Argonaut" we believe.

UNA BODA.

From the Spanish of Emilio Castelar.

I.

The skies were showering snow over Warsaw on a gloomy night. It seemed as if a winding sheet were being woven to protect that corpse—the old city. Everything that hovers about the grave hovers there: cold, silence, loneliness. In its desolate streets there lurked uncouth guards, mounted on small Tartar horses—like birds of prey that darted into that sepulchre. Yet, in the midst of so much desolation, a ray of light was gleaming, an aspiration of love, one of those flowers that find light and life even through the gapings of the tomb. In a large, spacious hall, there could be seen a maiden decking her brows with a wreath of white orange blossoms. It was the nuptial crown which she had arranged for the following evening—the evening of her wedding. She was entering on her twentieth year. Long and golden curls fell over her shapely shoulders like rays of light. Her blue eyes, tinged with melancholy happiness, glittered like a serene sky. Through the snowy whiteness of her complexion the rich veinings of the blood could be traced. She was so graceful, so slender and so elegant, that well could she be said to resemble by the fullness of her brow, the deep blue of her eyes, her aquiline nose, her well-defined lips, her pliant neck, and stately countenance, the statue that represented the genius of her country—that typified Poland. It seems that those enslaved, ravaged countries, in their hours of martyrdom, are wont to bring forth beautiful daughters—the offspring of the most sublime inspirations—the inspirations of anguish. Do we not remember those daughters of Israel who swept their harps under the willows of Babylon, mingling their tears with the waters of a foreign river, who by their dazzling beauty unnerved the persecutors of their country.

II.

The maiden laid aside her crown of flowers after assuring herself that it became her well, and moved toward a window as if she awaited the coming of one longingly expected. At that instant, she saw passing, almost obscured by the drifts of snow, a body of Cossacks loudly reviling and execrating Poland. The maiden retraced her steps with horror and mechanically sat by the piano. She dropped her head on her breast in despair and ran her fingers over the instrument. The piano gave forth a melody profoundly sad, one of those melodies which are the wail of a whole generation, the elegy of the soul of a people. Instantly there appeared at the door an old man, bent and tottering, who with anguish uttered these words: "What dost thou? Thou knowest not that this melody—this canticle of our sires—may cost us our lives?"

"True, grandfather," replied the maiden; "but what is life without our country?"

"I have faith that our country still remains for us," rejoined the old man. "I believe that this people, stoned yesterday like St. Stephen, corrupt to-day like Lazarus, has yet hope."

"Where is it?"

"In God," said the old man.

"And when will God hear us?"

"When we shall have satisfied his justice by our sufferings."

"And yet more martyrs!" exclaimed the maiden, in a painful tone. Two tears, two large tears, rolled down her face like two bitter rivers of sorrow. The old man lowered his voice and said:

"There is still hope if we put our trust in battle. How can there be love when thou embracest a corpse? Why begest, when thou begetest a slave? Cursed be the heart that sacrifices love of country to its selfish passion; cursed be the womb that begets children to be devoured by the tyrant. Thou deckest thyself in thy betrothal veil. Unhappy maiden! Poland's daughters were born in a shroud. Their cradle is a sepulchre. What must their nuptial couch be?" And the old man disappeared.

III.

On bearing these words Maria became dumb and perplexed. But a short time had passed when she recovered herself, and turned her steps toward a picture of the Virgin which sparkled on the walls of the salon.

"Mother mine," said she, kneeling, "mother mine, hear me. The mariner, when the clouds darken the stars, when the wind raises the waves and the tempest roars, invokes thee and thou hearest him, and heaven again uncovers the stars, the ocean sleeps like an infant, the tempest turns into a breeze, and the waves curl themselves like the wings of a bird, and the ship comes safely into port. Why succour not this people drowning in a sea of blood? Our houses are pantheons, our couches sepulchres, the altars of our temples stalls of the Tartar horses, thy children the spoils of its fury. This nation is sinking in a sea of gall. When her voice falters she raises her purple and blood-stained hands toward thee, supplicating thy aid. We have already suffered the torments of a crucifixion. We have already slept the deep sleep of death at the foot of our Calvary. Will not the hour of resurrection dawn for this crucified of nations?"

The prayer was interrupted by the appearance of a youth, who entered from without, his heavy coat covered by the falling snow. Maria rose and hastened to meet him. It is impossible that a more beautiful couple could be found in the whole of Poland. Both of them were young, both were fair, both were erect and tall, both had blue eyes. They were alike, but with the difference that the youth had all the strength, all the noble austerity of manhood; and the maiden all the gracefulness, all the delicacy, all the beauty which Goethe calls the feminine ideal. Their hands, their eyes, their breath, their souls were one. For a time there reigned that infinite silence which no human phrase can express—that religious quiet which has ever been the sublime eloquence of love. Had that ecstasy lengthened itself all through the extension of time, it would be celestial beatitude. That magnetism of two glances joined in one desire, that meeting of two souls merged in one idea, that harmony of two hearts beating in common accord, that aroma of two sighs which mingle in one, that union of two lives indissolubly bound together as the soul and the flesh, as the eye and the retina, as the bosom and the breath—ah! that is love. Why not say Love is always selfish—always. It is the sublime selffishness of youthfulness; the concentration of life in itself, as if to gather strength, and enlarge itself, and expand into new beings. As has been said by the sublimest of modern poets, Love is the selfishness of two. For it, there are not, in its moments of rapture, either country or humanity; there is nothing but itself; all the earth is the space which the being of his love inhabits, and all humanity is epitomized in the idol of his heart. And this is why Maria was oblivious of everything at that moment: the words of the old man, the grief of her heart, the desolated country, the howl of the Cossack, her prayer, her tears; she could not see the earth from the heaven of her love, encompassed in the blue eyes of her lover, where her whole soul had centred.

IV.

How happy were these moments! The youth cherished the idea of his wedding as the attainment of all his wishes—as the goal of an ambition which he had caressed all his life. He had loved that woman from his childhood, ever since the first feelings had sprung from his soul. A thousand insurmountable obstacles, a thousand impediments, had crowded upon his path. His unutterable love attracted him toward Maria, and yet destiny separated him from her. Finally, after wrestling and struggling, after expending entire years in great despair, he was on the eve of the consummation of his hopes. With impatience he was counting the minutes that were yet lacking to seal with an eternal vow the alliance of two hearts born to love one another—worthy of being blended in one existence. The aspiration of his being at the age of twenty-two years, when all the fancy of the mind is color, all the intelligence light, all the sentiment passion, all the ambition love, was to unite himself with the woman of his dreams. The satellite does not look on the planet, the planet on the sun, the nightingale on its nest, the brook on the sky, nor the sky on God, as that lover looked upon the object of his affection. I, poor narrator of this history, could not divine what he was saying to her; I could not repeat his half-spoken words. The artist has not yet been born who could picture the depth of loving eyes; the musician has not yet been born who could transcribe the note of a loving sigh. Where is the poet capable of repeating the words of a loving breast? Far easier is it to repeat the unending murmurs of the ocean waves. A heart filled with love is the universe. With love, with hope, with happiness the heart of young Ladislao is filled. Both had forgotten the world. What value could country have for them, when the magnet of their love lifted them beyond the earthly sphere?

V.

That rapture, however, was interrupted by the old man, who entered again and exclaimed:

"Love! To love when Poland is trodden in the dust, covered with ashes and blood, to love is a crime. Dost thou not hear the byenas crushing between their teeth the last remnants of the corpse? And art thou happy? Behold, behold!" and he uncovered his bosom; one, two, three, four, five, six scars. "Through these wounds I have poured out the blood of my veins, through them pieces of my heart have leaped out. I have grown gray in Siberia. The weight of my chains has bent me. I am feeble and without strength to live longer, yet I feel I am strong enough to hate. Poland can yet recover herself. If she is to-day the scorn of the world, to-morrow she will be the exterminating angel of tyrants. Ladislao, go and die for Poland. Maria, send him to die. Thy first embrace will be accused because it will beget the soul of a slave. If on the morrow Warsaw fails to rise again in arms, the next day thou wilt be sent in chains arm in arm to Siberia. Let thy bosom hold nothing but hatred; let thy arms be weapons; let thy breath be fire; because I, an old tottering man, who have fallen a hundred times on the battle-field, I am going to die at last on the bosom of my enslaved country."

And the old man made an effort to rise and run as if he were a youth, but his limbs quivered, and he fell on his knees before the image of the Virgin. At that moment there was heard a wild cry of "Long live Poland," followed by loud reports of musketry.

VI.

The youthful Ladislao pointed at the old man, then toward heaven, and drew Maria closely to his heart.

"Art thou going?" asked the maiden.

"I am going, Maria; the country calls me."

"It is but the sound of the wind," said Maria.

"No, it is the din of battle," replied Ladislao.

"O heaven! and what will become of our love?"

"Our love! Would our love," asked the youth, "last only as long as life?"

"To-morrow," said Maria, "to-morrow is our nuptial day."

"My heart tells me," exclaimed Ladislao, "that to-morrow thou wilt be mine."

At this instant another and a nearer report was heard.

"Ladislao," exclaimed Maria, "for God's sake, go not!"

The maiden had not the heart to tell him not to leave her. But she added, as if to deceive herself, "Ladislao, it is the wind."

"No," said the youth, "it is the spirit of the country."

"Farewell; to-morrow, remember," exclaimed Maria, "will be our wedding day."

The youth rushed into the street, and the maiden fell at the feet of her grandfather, before the image of the Virgin.

VII.

For a whole day the battle raged. The blood ran for many a long hour. The sons of Poland have fought anew. All the men have rushed to the battle-field, all the women to the altars. Maria prays and weeps. From the depth of her despair rises a lonely prayer. A new night follows. The din of battle has ceased. The result is not doubtful. Poland struggles in vain, knowing that she is doomed to fall. A dreadful silence hangs over the city. That was to be the night of Maria's nuptials. Her crown of flowers is there, the veil is there; but her lover is not. Maria awaits him, but he comes not; Maria calls him, but there is no answer. The maiden becomes delirious. Where is the battle-ground? Disordered in mind, she assumes the nuptial crown, clothes herself in the veil, and prepares to start. "Where can Ladislao be?" she asks her grandfather, who lies expiring at the foot of the Virgin's picture—expiring with grief and fatigue.

"Blessed be they who die in the Lord!" answered the old man.

Maria comprehends all. The night is dark; the snow is falling. The maiden, robed in white, wrapped in her veil, alone, and in the midst of the fierce storm, resembled the soul of a virgin who returns from heaven. Her temples throb and her heart beats as if she were going toward her bridal chamber. She goes to the outskirts of Warsaw, to the battle-field. She searches eagerly with her hands among the piles of the dead. The shadows are so thick that she can not distinguish the features. Suddenly she hears a moan, which is the last sound of a life drifting into death.

"It is he," cries she, "it is he!"

A ray from the moon pierces the clouds. Maria recognizes the features of Ladislao. They are livid, tinted by the pallor of death. She places her hand over his heart; it beats not. She places her ear over his breast; it is silent.

"Thou hast died," said she. "On this night wert thou to have received my first kiss of love," and she pressed her ardent lips upon those of the pallid corpse. In that kiss she absorbed death.

On the following day the bodies of the insurgent dead were being carried to the cemetery, and among them there was one of a very beautiful maiden enshrouded in her betrothal veil. Did those who buried them know the secret of that death? I can not tell; nor do I know whether the youth and maiden filled the same grave.

THOMAS M. JEWETT.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 10, 1879.

The Late Mrs. Simson of Texas.

Singular, and affording a curious exemplification of the business-like habits of Americans under all circumstances, is the story told in the Paris Figaro, of the 5th of December, by M. Adrian Marx. The gentleman, it seems, dined recently at his club with one of the "richest and most honorable merchants of Kentucky," who spends three months of every year at Paris. It was this Kentuckian who advised "Prevost-Paradol to accept the mission to Washington as an 'advantageous post, sir, especially as you can do a big outside business at the same time.' Conversation having turned upon the recent theft at St. Mark's, one of the others called it "a singular occurrence," and the American gentleman said it was "a good speculation," the managers of which would make at least $400,000. His auditors seeming surprised, he said—perhaps it would be better to reproduce M. Marx's story in his own words—

"They will manage as did the people who stole in Texas, an hour after her death, the wife of an opulent manufacturer of salt beef."

"What did they do?"

"Formed a company, for it requires a pretty large cash capital to obtain the cooperation of adroit auxiliaries, to elude the vigilance of the police, to keep the books, etc. They issued 500,000 francs' worth of shares like this," and the American rapidly sketched on a page of his memorandum book the following:

Joint Stock Company (capital $100,000) for DEALING IN MRS. SIMSON'S CORPSE.
(Formed under an agreement drawn up by M. Cok, Notary, under the style of JOHN AND CO.)
One Share, Payable to Bearer.
No. 10,707.
Signed by
WILLIAM, President of the Council of Superintendence of Corpse.	TOMY, Manager of the Corpse.

"Eight days later," said the American, "the capital was subscribed, and the shares had paid a dividend of quadruple their value. A gentleman called on the widower and said: 'Dear sir, it is very disagreeable not to know where lie the remains of a beloved wife, or to think that they are in the profaning possession of bandits. It is a question of money. Let your banker to-morrow take $200,000 to Peterson's saloon, 104 Sixty-second Avenue, and within a quarter of an hour a cab will bring the corpse to your door.'"

"And the widower accepted?"

"He had to."

"But suppose instead of sending his notary with the money he had sent a platoon of policemen?"

"Such things are not done among us," said the American, haughtily. "Well, they got their $200,000, and when the corpse, which was brought punctually in a cab, was unpacked the husband started back in terror. Instead of his wife there was the body of a man scarred with innumerable knife-wounds! Almost instantly he received a letter as follows:

HONORABLE GENTLEMAN:—We regret the error we have committed; we sent you the wrong corpse! You must, however, forgive us, the pressure of business being so great. Since your lady has been in our hands we have become much attached to her, and the articles on the subject published in the papers, and the unhappy attempts of the police, increase our interest in her. It will be a sore trouble to have to part with her. However, send $200,000 to-morrow to 104 Eighty-second avenue, to the bar of the man named Foxon, and this time we pledge you our sacred honor you will have the pleasure of being able definitely to inter the unfortunate woman, the object of the present correspondence.

(Signed)

TOMY,
Manager of the Corpse.

P. S.—You may keep the other body as a reward for your trouble.

"Gentlemen," said the American, "the widower sent the money."

"But," I cried, "it was atrocious."

"No; it was practical."

"You wouldn't say so if such a thing had happened to you."

"That's where you are mistaken. The stolen corpse was my wife!"

The engraver of the Turner illustrations to Rogers' Italy and other poems, Robert Wallis, has just died at Brighton, England, at the advanced age of eighty-four. Many other of Turner's works were engraved by him, the "Approach to Venice" being almost his last plate. A few weeks ago a proof impression of his large engraving of "Lake Nemi" was sold in London for $450.

INTAGLIOS.

The Wounded Knight.

I know of an ancient story:
Heart-wounded there lies alone
A rider of knightly glory,
For faithless his love is grown.

As faithless must he condemn her,
The light of his loving eyes,
And this is his sad dilemma—
His pain he must despise.

He might in the lists declare him,
"Mong riders of knightly fame:
"Now may he for combat prepare him
Who soeth his true love's name."

But to meet him no rider goeth;
In silence they stand apart;
He must turn the lance that he throweth
Against his own accusing heart. HEINE.

From "The New Sirens."

Scent, and song, and light, and flowers!
Gust on gust, the harsh winds blow—
Come, bind up those ringlet showers!
Roses for that dreaming brow!
Come, once more that ancient brightness,
Glancing feet and eager eyes!
Let your broad lamps flash the brightness
Which the sorrow-stricken day denies!

Through black depths of serried shadows,
Up cold aisles of buried glades;
In the midst of river-meadows
Where the looming deer are laid;
From your dazzled windows streaming,
From your humming festal room,
Deep and far, a broken gleaming
Reels and shivers on the ruffled gloom.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

The Wakeful Lover.

Vaporous, unaccountable,
Dreamland lies forlorn of light,
Hollow like a dreaming shell.
Ah, that from all dreams I might
Choose one dream and guide its flight!
I know well
What her sleep should tell to-night.

At Night.

Good night!
Hear the weary with delight.
Draws the day now to its close,
Busy hands all seek repose,
Till another morning's light.
Good night!
Seek repose!
Let the weary eyelids close.
All the streets grow lone and still,
Save the watchman's whistle shrill.
At night's call both friends and foes
Seek repose.

Slumber sweet.
Each in dreams his longing meet.
He whom love has robbed of peace
Shall in sleep find sweet release.
Him in dreams shall sweetest greet.
Slumber sweet.

Good night.
Slumber till the morning light.
Slumber till the new to-morrow
Comes with its new joy or sorrow.
Fear not: we're in the Father's sight.
Good night. KORNER.

Ede.

No traveler has found that mortal place
Which was the cradle of our garden race;
Where were the Blessed Fields? We search in vain;
Shall earth ever find her Eden-land again?

Know this, when Eve went forth from out its shade
It was no longer Paradise; she made
Its bliss and beauty; then why tears and sighs?
Where woman is she makes a Paradise.

A Preacher.

"And oh, my friends," the Preacher said, "beware,
However smooth and tempting seems the path,
With bowers of cooling shade, the end is wrath;
Here 'tis unsafe, that's dangerous footing there;
But follow me and have no further care;
I'll be your staff, for I am one that hath Lived long and gathered in life's aftermath—
Experience. I bid you not despair;
Reach me your hands and cast away all doubt;
I'll lead you safe along the glacier's shelf.
You say 'tis dark?' 'Tis noonday, I insist;
Besides, I know each pitfall hereabout.
I know each chasm—just then the Preacher's self Stumbled and plunged into eternal mist.

Discontent.

Two boats rocked on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree;
One was in love with the harbor,
One was in love with the sea.

The one that loved the harbor
The winds of fate outbore,
But held the other, longing,
For ever against the shore.

The one that rests on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree,
With wistful eyes looks ever
To the one far out at sea.

The one that rides the billow,
Though sailing fair and fleet,
Looks back to the peaceful river,
To the harbor safe and sweet.

One frets against the quiet
Of the moss-grown shaded shore;
One sighs that it may enter
That harbor never more.

One wearies of the dangers
Of the tempest's rage and wail;
One dreams, amid the lilies,
Of a far-off snowy sail.

The Gay Science.

Here's to the greatest best of all sciences—
Science of drinking, a study divine!
Wine to the evils of life I dedicate;
Fill up a bumper! there's nothing like wine.

Wise of all philosophical colleges,
Ancient or modern, most welcome to me,
That which the virtue of liquor acknowledges,
Passes all systems, whatever they be.

Here's to astronomy! Here's to astrology!
Here's to all arts that the sages can boast!
Everything else is for wine an apology;
All are alike an excuse for a toast.

Friendship and love shall endure to eternity,
Cynics and humbugs may say what they will;
That is my lesson—wherever won't learn it, he Merits no share in the glass that we fill.

Drink and be merry; the age of frivolity
Fades, and is gone like a midsummer day;
Wine is an emblem of folly and jollity,
Fizzes and sparkles—and passes away!

LINKS OF BRAIN SAUSAGE.

Messrs. Blaine and Kearney will apparently have to divide honors, for it is not easy to say which is entitled to the praise of being the great American plagiarist if it is true, as asserted, that the former gentleman's latest harangue against the South is "conveyed" from one of Daniel O'Connell's speeches in Parliament on the Cork election. Of course the figures, and the language also in places, are changed to suit Mr. Blaine's purpose, but the speech as a whole is said to be essentially O'Connell's and not his.

A writer in a recent issue of the Fortnightly Review has discussed in a scientific and very sensible way the relation of noise to civilization, and has concluded that men of science ought to study the means of diminishing noise, or at least preventing its present direct attacks on the ear, while the law should be improved and refined in regard to the noises that may be treated as nuisances. Of these we class the exasperating clamor of midnight church-bells as preeminent, and we don't care whether the occasion for the "barbarous din" is Christmas or the New Year. By the way, why did not—we do not wish to find fault, but why did not—Nature give us lids to our ears, as well as to our eyes? Why should we be compelled to hear what we do not wish to hear?

A physician's opinion was published not long ago, that if all the uproar of a large city were to be stopped at a given instant, many people would drop dead from the mere nervous shock of silence replacing the multifarious sounds to which they become used. This may or may not be true; the converse of the proposition is indisputable: if all the noonday noises could be sprung on us at midnight, instead of being broken to us gently by the morning market wagons, the milk wagons, and the lingering hoodlum noisily cursing the rising sun, the sharp transition would lay us out more than usually dead.

There used to be a kind of lex non scripta which required the commander of a besieged fortress to sustain at least three assaults before surrendering, no matter how hopeless the defense. Is there some such rule requiring the captain of a sinking ship to take at least one good ducking before consenting to be saved along with the others? They all appear to reject every overture of crew and passengers looking to their rescue, and all "go down with the ship." But somehow they are commonly picked up afterward, and they never jump out of the boat, as they would if to "go down with the ship"—and stay down—were a duty instead of a venerable tradition or dead-letter formality. For our part, we do not see why they should go down at all if they can get away with dry feet after doing all that is possible to save the lives entrusted to their care. Heroism is a virtue, but common sense is not altogether a vice.

President Hayes is said to have a mania for scrap-books, and makes at least one every year. The singular creatures (who ever met one?) who make the literature contained in the Sunday-school libraries would find in these eclectic volumes an inexhaustible mine of suggestion and incident. We feel quite sure that they might all be placed in the hands of the youngest reader, without fear that they would taint his morals; and that, according to the great censor, Mr. Psalm Williams, of the Bulletin, is not merely the highest, but the only literary merit worth considering. Psalm never reviewed a book without having one eye on the book and the other on a Sunday-school.

We cheerfully disavow the parentage of that final remark; it is Heine's. Heine says (as nearly as we can recollect his words) that no woman writes a book without having one eye on her work and the other on some man. This, however, he confesses, is not true of the Countess Hahn-Hahn, "who has but one eye."

A writer in the Toledo Blade tells "how to cook a husband." The first thing naturally is to catch your husband. Many good husbands, he explains, are spoiled in cooking. Some women keep them constantly in hot water, while others freeze them by conjugal coldness; some smother them with hatred and contention, and still others keep them in a pickle all their lives. These women always serve them up with tongue sauce. Now it is not supposed that husbands will be tender and good if treated in this way; but they are, on the contrary, very delicious, when managed as follows: Get a large jar, called the jar of carefulness (which all good wives have on hand), place your husband in it and set him near the fire of conjugal love; let the fire be pretty hot, especially let it be clear, above all let the heat be constant; cover him over with affection and subjection; garnish him with the spice of plesantry, and if you add kisses and other confections, let them be accompanied with a sufficient portion of secrecy, mixed with prudence and moderation.

Another journalist (we do not just now remember the name of the newspaper that his genius adorns) has invented a machine for penal purposes, the principal operating part of which consists of an enormous band with a particularly hard palm. Its modus operandi, as managed by a teacher in the primary school of the period, is interesting and instructive. The school ma'am seats herself at the instrument, with a dime novel in her hand, after placing the condemned urchin in a row within reach of the hoisting apparatus, or ice-tongs; she smiles, touches the snatch-brake with her foot, and the doomed urchin is launched into—if not eternity, he will think so before that hand lets up on him. With a smile playing over her features, she works her tiny hoof, and the avenging hand descends, the boy says his "now I lay me," and the old machine works as though endowed with life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. (Care should be taken not to work the machine too rapidly at first, as it may make it too hot—for the boy.) It will only take a moment of treading to make any ordinary boy sorry he enlisted, when he can be dropped, and the next can be snatched. A whole school can be spanked in fifteen minutes if the spanker is anything of a treader. "We make," says the inventor, "different sized machines, suitable for the primary department, the intermediate, the High School, the Normal School, and the State University."

It is not to be supposed that the usefulness of this surprising and pleasing invention is limited to educational purposes. "Every editor in the land," continues the patentee, "will thank us, on his benighted knees, for this invention, as it solves a problem that has disturbed the minds of the knights of the scissors for many generations, viz: How to exterminate the exchange fiend, the man who steals exchanges when you are busy writing. The editor can have a machine sitting in his office. In place of the hand of Providence, we screw on a cast iron fist, weighing 700 pounds. If you desire to simply maim the fiend for life, you work the treadle mildly, and merely mash his eyes out, and italicize his nose, and break his jaw bone. But if he is an old offender, and you want to make an example of him, you keep treading, and the pile driver will come down on him like a President on a Postmaster, and break every bone in his body, and flatten him as thin as one of Colfax's vindications."

No doubt the machine imperfectly described above would prove of great advantage to Herr Hans Pfeiffer, author of the following verses, in avenging his commercial and domestic honor, outraged by that unscrupulous peripatetic, "Der Drummer."

Who puts up at der pest hotel,
Und dakes his oyslers on der schell?
Und nit der fraukins cuts a schwell?
Der drummer.

Who vas it comes indo mine schotter,
Drows down his pundles on der vloor,
Und nefer schtops to shut der door?
Der drummer.

Who dakes me py der handt und say:
"Hans Pfeiffer, how you vas to-day?"
Und goes for peesness rightt away?
Der drummer.

Who shpreads his zamples in a trice,
Und dells me "Look, und see how nice,"
Und says I gets "der bottom price,"
Der drummer.

Who says der dings vas eegstra vine—
"From Sharmany, upon der Rhine."
Und sheats me den dimes outt of nine?
Der drummer.

Who dells how sheap der goots vas bought,
Mooch less as vot I good imbort,
But lets dem go as he vas "short?"
Der drummer.

Who varrants all der goots to suit
Der gustomers ubon his route,
Und ven dey games dey vas no goot?
Der drummer.

Who comes around ven I been outt,
Drinks up mine beer, und eats mine kraut,
Und kiss Katrina in der snout?
Der drummer.

Who, ven he comes again dis vay,
Vill bear vot Pfeiffer has to say,
Und mit a plack eye goes away?
Der drummer.

TO JAIL FOR LIFE.

Seven miles east of Placerville, in El Dorado County, surrounded by tall pines and spruce trees, is situated the mining camp of Newtown. This was a lively burg from 1849 to 1860. Here the miners in that vicinity gathered together on the first day of the week to discuss the news, obtain letters, papers, and mining supplies for the coming week, to settle miners' disputes, correct abuses, etc. Wrongs were thus righted until 1853, when one Lewis Foster was elected a Justice of the Peace, who was expected thenceforth to administer justice according to legislative enactment. "Lew," as he was familiarly called, was ambitious for political preferment; but "Lew" was a Northern man by birth, and the dominant party Democratic; consequently, his fitness for office at the hands of that party must be established, and he must show that he was "sound on the Democratic goose," or the slavery question.

Such an opportunity soon presented itself. A negro had been somewhat troublesome about the camp, robbing hen roosts, cleaning up miners' sluices by moonlight, and committing other petty larceny acts. Justice Foster had twice sent the negro to jail, and when his term in jail had expired he would return to plunder again. The day after his second discharge from jail, the Constable of the town appeared at Justice Foster's office with Sambo in custody. Justice Foster seated himself in his judicial chair with much dignity, opened his docket, took a look at the prisoner, exclaiming: "What! Is that d—d nigger back here again? What have you been doing now?"

The prisoner answered: "Stealing, they say."
"Well," says the Justice, "have you?"
"S'pose I have," says the negro.
"Do you plead guilty to petit larceny?"
"S'pose I do," says the prisoner.
"Then," says Justice Foster, assuming unusual dignity, "the sentence of this court is that you be taken hence to the county jail at Coloma, and there be confined in said jail during your natural life."

The judgment was duly entered upon the Justice's docket, a commitment made out, and the Constable delivered the negro into the custody of John Buchanan, then Sheriff of the county. The negro was placed in the jail and there remained for several days before the error was discovered, when he was at once discharged.

This act on the part of Justice Foster established his status as a Democrat. He was subsequently twice elected County Assessor for El Dorado County. He filled the office with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the people. Some years ago Justice Foster's commitment was filled out, and he taken in charge by the Great Sheriff of the universe, where earthly tribunals have no jurisdiction.

ENOCH N. STROUT.

Perhaps you have heard it before, but no matter. Bob, the dresser of John McCullough, once asked his master to give him a holiday. "Where are you going?" inquired McCullough, as a preliminary. "Going out with my girl, sir." "H'm!" quoted genial John; "going out with your girl, eh? I thought so. Where are you going with your girl?" "Going to see her grandfather, sir," said Bob, readily enough. "She goes to see her grandfather every Sunday." "Where does the old fellow live?" inquired McCullough, sternly. "He doesn't live anywhere, sir," rejoined Bob. "He's a skeleton in Wood's Museum at Bellevue Hospital."

The operation of extracting a Duluth woman's tooth consists in planting one end of the crowbar well down under the roots, and dropping a fifty pound weight on the other end.

The man who makes two trees grow where there was only one before may be a nice sort of a man, but he should be obliged to come around and clean away the leaves in the fall.

The ladies of Japan are said to gild their teeth, and those of the East Indies to paint them red, while in Cuzter the test of beauty is to render them black.

NEW

BOOKS

- Minor Poems of Percy B. Shelley. 12mo. $1 75
Leisure Time Studies, chiefly Biological. By Andrew Wilson, Ph.D. 12mo. 3 50
Kiss and Be Friends. By Julie P. Smith. 12mo. 1 50
The Philosophy of Existence. By E. G. Kelley, M.D. 8vo. 5 00
A Century of American Literature, 1776-1876. Edited by Henry A. Beers. Leisure Hour Series. 12mo. 1 00
Discussions on Church Polity. By Charles Hodge, D.D. 8vo. 3 50
Prince Deukalion. By Layard Taylor. Small 4to. 3 00
American Ornithology, or Natural History of the Birds of the United States, with plates. By Alexander Wilson and Charles Lucien Bonaparte. Large 8vo. 7 50
Sermons preached in the Church of the First Religious Society in Roxbury. By George Putnam. 12mo. 1 75
Conscience, with Preludes on Current Events. Boston Monday Lectures. By Joseph Cook. 12mo. 1 50
Pleasant Ways in Science. By Richard A. Proctor. 12mo. 3 50
The History of His Own Times. By Right Rev. Gilbert Burnet, D.D. 12mo. 1 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

EUREKA STONE MFC CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A
specialty. None but the best brands of English
Portland Cement used.

FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Mont-
gomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street,
San Francisco.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANguages, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English,
German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and
Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods.
Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

RARE ENGRAVINGS

MODERN FRENCH ETCHINGS.

A CHOICE COLLECTION OF THE
best Proof Engravings and Etchings always on hand. Rare Engravings, secured. All interested in Art are welcome to inspect collection either as visitors or purchasers.
W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. THE NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELDON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, or else at $10
each.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 9, 1879.

DEAR MADGE:—I believe we were all laboring under a delusion when we thought minstrelsy was played out. Taken in the abstract, perhaps it is. It has at least exhausted its capacity for the production of novelty; but there remains, and possibly will remain, enough people to make up good sized audiences to whom a good minstrel entertainment is the summum bonum of human felicity. They were out in full force on Monday night. We went early to see them come in. They say the Eastern ladies consider it mauvais ton, as Mrs. Giffory would say, to go to the Minstrels, and I had a quiet constriction of the heart when I entered, the outlook was so decidedly Eastern. But they came tramping in by and by. There was even a bonnet or two from Nob Hill in the crowd—not the state affair, of course. There was a small delegation from Rincon Hill; there was a liberal representation from Polk Street, and a bit of Van Ness Avenue; there was quite a choice assortment of heavy bangs from Happy Valley, and the African quarters on Pacific Street were left comparatively deserted. And upon each and every face was an expression of radiant anticipation and incipient cackination. I have managed to get a great many syllables in there, Madge, but that was what I saw. A howl of gratification ascended to heaven as the curtain rolled up, revealing to the gaze of the crowd a semi-circle of vacant chairs and benches, and a big bass viol, dark and ominous looking, which seemed to threaten tones as hoarse and deep as the growl of a northern bear. The Callender Minstrels abandon the orthodox dress suit and button posy. As an innovation of any kind in minstrelsy is as refreshing as a douche in July, this simple change from the swallow-tail coat to the plaid blouse predisposed the assembly in their favor. They did look rather jolly as they came marching in to the time of "Don't get weary." Negro music is always sweet while it is characteristic. When they came to ballad singing Jack muttered: "Now they give themselves away," and fell to a contemplation of the house. Jack was right. Their sentiment is always spurious when it gets out of its own domain. When they sing their own music I believe they enjoy it themselves quite as much as any one else does, for it was only when they came to "Oh, my, what a gittin' up," or some such dulcet melody, that they forgot their hoarseness—of course, they were all as hoarse as prime donne—and set the house to beating time. The troupe is composed of the usual material—an interlocutor of pompous dignity, a tenor who is something of a swell, a basso with a voice ever so many octaves below zero, and a couple of rather good singers who are unclassified. Then there are six end men, three of whom play the tambourine, and three the bones. One of these artists rejoices in a mouth to which the rest of him is a mere adjunct. Chaley Backus would be a mere rose-lipped cherub beside him, and an average shark would abase his defeated head, and gnash several hundred of his teeth before the rival who outstrips him. It would be a very funny affair if he did not think so much himself. But these children of Ham will overdo. That is where they differ from the best of the white minstrels. What a funny thing it is that a negro will smooch himself with burnt cork. I like to see them as black as onyx, but it seems strange that they should be willing to tinge themselves thus darkly after Old Master had shaded them down to écaré. A sable damsel to whom occasionally I offer a cup of coffee refused the cream because "it makes her dark," and I verily believe her scruples are conscientious, but the end men are not likewise afflicted. One of them, in the excess of his emotion, took off a patch of the false hue with a switch of his tambourine, and the native tint gleamed dimly through the black and revealed the tricks of the trade. The feature of the performance is the banjo sextet. It is a sad stretch of the imagination to call the music of the banjo sweet. It has but a stringy, twangy sound at best. Yet it is sole-moving. I believe that if she listened to it long enough even an abbess would have a disposition to attempt a Virginny walk round, and to a gallery its music is irresistible. "Did you ever know of a time when hisses, and policemen, and a disgusted dress circle, all combined, could stop the house from beating time when the banjo began?" Strangely enough in this instance the banjo itself does the work, for the leader of the sextet plays "Home, Sweet Home" with variations exquisitely, and—

"Those silver sounds, so soft, so clear,
The listener paused his breath to hear."

It is true they were neither silver nor clear, but they were very remarkable for all that. They gave for an encore the page's song from Le Petit Duc, and it sounded queerly enough on those uncompromising strings, but pretty too. It is easier to be pleased with a minstrel show than anything else, for it is an unambitious entertainment; but this is really good of its kind, notwithstanding the bill-posters, which are generally a delusion and a snare. I had thought the crowds at the Minstrels would interfere with the crowds over the way where the merry folks have come back again, with the last installment of their Christmas colds still clogging their voices, and a stale programme to start the new season badly. But it was such a relief to feel that those awful men and those awfuller women of the variety troupe were out of the way that numbers strolled in simply to enjoy that fact. They are to produce Horror's next week. Not a pleasant title, is it? but perhaps, like dreams, it goes by contraries. At all events, I hope it affords Alice Atherton an opportunity to look her best. She has not a spark of natural—what shall I say—burlesquerie, perhaps, but she is so industrious and so technically experienced that what she does goes off well. I like her infantile face. I have seen lots of blue-eyed babies in perambulators look just like her. I admire her dignity. It seems paradoxical that a woman may caper around in red tights and a purple cloak and sing "We're Two Bad Men" with Mr. William A. Mestayer, and still be a dignified woman, but she manages it somehow. The two little Edouin tots come in at the finale this week to dance. Jenny Wren lifted her plump little feet in the most business-like way, but the baby did not display the ease of a veteran. I observed that nature asserted itself over art, and that both father and mother came to an abrupt pause in their own jig to laugh with the house at the babies. The whole party looked so comfortable on the snug little stage again that I am quite certain their colds will soon be cured. They might have given us a new bill, but in that case we should never again have seen Ella Chapman as the naughty "Babe of the Wood," and such a deprivation was not to be calmly endured. Next week everything is to be new. The theatres always run like this. They never take advantage of each other's bills. They all have new attractions at once, or they are all unattractive at once. At the California Mrs. Florence has been wearing new toilets—triumphs in their way, but scarcely such marvels as last week. I presume dressing is as capricious a business as any other of the learned professions. One can not be in the throes of composition all the time, and even toilets must be beautiful by comparison. What a pity that "Bardwell Slote's" abbreviations have become so well known. The audiences have them as pat as the old politician himself, and take the sharp off his point by forestalling him. Fortunately, there is more to "Bardwell Slote" than his gag, or the play would have died the death long ago. I should like to sit near some one from the Cohosh districts and see him recognize the prototype of his legislator. How keenly these character actors must observe to pick up a bit here and a bit there, as they do out of which to form a symmetrical whole. One hardly realizes how completely they change themselves. It is interesting sometimes to sit near enough to the stage to see them disappear into the wings, to see them return suddenly into themselves—that is, when it is an actor like Florence, who, in voice, gait, action, manner, and in the very pose of his head, becomes an altogether different man. I do not observe this of the ladies on the stage, unless once in a while in hearty, natural little body like Maggie Moore. As a rule they do not return into themselves at the wings—not, indeed, excepting in solitude. Women of all degrees are apt to go about in a straight jacket of company manners, but the ladies of the stage, who are of necessity more artificial than all others, do not abandon that artificiality at the wings. If they wear a mincing smile they carry it into the flies. If they have a stiff carriage they do not relax with their exit, and yet, although they are rarely, if ever, themselves, character acting is given over almost entirely to the minority, the gentlemen. How many character actresses can one number upon one's fingers. I can think of two at the moment, but what does it matter. I suppose these things regulate themselves properly according to the period. I see by the bills that they are to bring out The Green Lanes of England at the Baldwin next week. That sounds very rural, does it not? The cast embraces the entire strength of the company, even including Bishop, who has been left out so often during the last few months that we would have almost forgotten how to laugh but for a bit of dry-twiggy, crackling humor from Jennings once in a while. I almost forgot to tell you that Barton Hill has gone East for a new company, or at least a part of one, for the California Theatre. They need it. Felix Morris is a good comedian, and Welles rather a promising juvenile. What more can one say in praise of the existing company? And yet the California is so comfortable and so popular a house. The fact of the matter is, public taste actually demands a good company in this house, and the proprietors are becoming struck with the circumstance. Fancy what a treat it must be to go to the theatre in New York with such leading men as Charles Coghlan and Charles Thorne the year round, with Lester Wallace and old Gilbert, with Maud Granger, that delightful little Maud Harrison, or some one almost as nice, to fill minor places, and where such actresses as Ada Cavendish are invited to be leading ladies; where Ward's Diplomacy Company, or such combinations, are likely to drop in almost any moment to pass a week or two. In short, they have so much variety and novelty there that they do not need so good a company as we do. Therefore, good speed to Mr. Barton Hill in his search, and I hope he will rifle New York of its best. They will find a cosy theatre, a handsome stage, and fine mountings to set off their accomplishments. The Mighty Dollar, for example, is most elaborately set. The opening scene, the house and grounds of Mr. Dart, with a view of the Capitol in the distance, reminds one of the Feast of Lanterns, while the picnic has an elaborate background which may once have been the Hudson, but in this instance is the Potomac. To such base uses may we come. "Obenreizer" next week. So, as often happens, I am once more yours, expectantly, BETSY B.

But presently the clown turned a double-back somersault, and the house was wild with excitement. "There, ma," exclaimed Miss Kellogg, laughing, "you'll admit that I couldn't do that?" "No, I won't!" said Mrs. Kellogg, warming up; "you know well enough you could do it, Clara, if you had on your 'Mignon' suit and nobody was looking."

This, from the London Athenaeum, seems to cover the entire situation: "Some persons can think stories, but can not write them; some could write them if they could only think them; very few can do both, and the great majority can do neither."

Mr. Croly, late editor of the Graphic, being moved to call Eli Perkins a liar, contents himself with remarking of the said Perkins that "the subjective order of his thought does not correspond with the objective order of the phenomena."

Here is a boy's essay on the Boy: "A boy is an animal; his use is to carry in wood; he is made of bones."

FRENCH BONBONS.

Eloquent free-thinker delivering oration at the grave of eminent free-thinker:

"Thou, noble one, wast not the dupe of vain superstitions. Thou didst not, like so many of the weaker minded, believe in the dishonoring and monstrous inventions of a god and a future state. Adieu, noble friend, adieu; may we meet in a better world than this."

Madame G. calls at a friend's house on a wet day, and her feet being damp, says to her friend:

"My dear, will you let your maid bring me a pair of your slippers?"

"My love," replies her friend—there were several people in the parlor—"do you think my slippers will fit you?"

"Oh, I think so, my darling, if you will tell her to put a pork sole inside them."

"Come, now," said a lady recently to Alexandre Dumas, "who gave you the right to judge us poor women as cruelly as you do?"

"No one gave it to me, madame," said Dumas; "I bought it."

A snob invited a connoisseur in wines to dine with him, telling him that he had laid in some wine that would astonish him.

At the critical moment the host says: "Well, now, what do you think of that, eh?"

"I don't know what you bought it for," says the expert, gently but firmly, "but it isn't that."

Mme. X. calls her servant in a low voice:

"John!"

John makes no reply, and she beckons to him and says:

"Didn't you hear me when I spoke to you a minute ago?"

"Yes'm, but you spoke so low I thought you didn't want me to hear you."

In a mad-house:

"So, doctor, poor M— has been put in your hands on account of mental alienation?"

"Yes, poor fellow!"

"Locked up among the madmen, eh? Dear, dear!"

"Oh, bless you, no. He has played a considerable part in politics, and he and I sat and voted together, and so I could never think of putting him among the madmen. He is in the idiot ward."

Every one is familiar with that form of lunacy where the patient insists on believing that he is a millionaire or an emperor, or something especially grand and glorious.

"How is old Langlumé?" said some one, the other day, meeting a country doctor.

"Poor fellow, his reason has given way; hopeless, hopeless!"

"Indeed?"

"Yes, indeed. He's mad on the subject of earthly honors—thinks he's a member of the village council."

She wept, the poor laundress, on returning five shirts, where her patron had intrusted her with six, and confessed that she had burned a big hole in the sixth while ironing.

"Never mind," says, kindly, her customer; "Christmas comes but once a year, and that'll be all right. How much do I owe you?"

"Six shirts at 12½ cents each—75 cents."

"But, I say, you burned one of 'em up."

"Well, suppose I did, hadn't I washed it before I burned it? Go along wid ye; trying to chate a poor dissolute widow."

A scientist who had been left in the lurch by a zebra, proceeded to investigate the cause of the animal's superior speed.

"The only difference between the zebra and the horse," he finally concluded, "is this—the zebra is striped; he's a rifled horse."

From that to the discovery of the rifled cannon was but a step.

We translate the following rather singular remarks from L'Art of December 1st, in which they appear as the conclusion of an elaborate review of the works of American painters in the Exposition:

"Had the United States only to their intellectual credit the discovery of the lightning rod, the electric telegraph, iron-clad monitor, and other remarkable inventions which we greatly admire, but which are entirely devoid of any artistic sentiment, we would be forced to despair of their future in the field of art. But poetry owes them one of the greatest artists of this age—Longfellow. And among their writers of romance (who are numerous and original, though their style approaches so nearly that of the English romancers that they are properly included in that class) there is at least one whose example appears to us singularly worthy to be studied by their painters; we refer to Mr. Bret Harte, the Dickens of the Placers. Mr. Harte, translations of whose work have made his name well known on the continent, is the painter par excellence of the actual manners of America; and his pictures have a color of their own, a local physiognomy, clearly characterized; a personality of design and of composition which makes us recognise them at once as something quite different from English writing, in spite of the identity of the language. Even in him a close observer will perceive certain touches of a special Americanism, rather racy than incorrect. We may have to wait, perhaps a long time, to see the Longfellow of American painting, but we expect soon to see its Bre' Harte."

"If fire," said Mr. Joseph Prudhomme, who had just laid down the paper describing the floods, "if fire is an awful scourge, water is a still more fearful one. You can extinguish a conflagration, but you can not put out an inundation."

A young lady, gazing at her portrait just finished by a rising young artist, remarked: "I look like a canvas-back duck."

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

INSTANTANEOUS SUCCESS.
INSTANTANEOUS SUCCESS.

INCESSANT SHOUTS OF LAUGHTER. | CONTINUOUS BURSTS OF APPLAUSE.

First Week Standing Room Only.
First Week Standing Room Only.—Refined Minstrelsy creates a Fashionable Furore,— —attested by the nightly throngs of the——wealth and fashion of the city.CALLENDER'S
CALLENDER'S

GEORGIA	THE ORIGINAL	MINSTRELS
GEORGIA	TRUPE OF	MINSTRELS
GEORGIA	GENUINE	MINSTRELS
GEORGIA	NEGROES.	MINSTRELS

J. H. HAVERLY.....PROPRIETOR.

They have made a genuine hit....are un- rivalled....adds ano- ther success to the Bush Street Theatre. —Chronicle.	Verdict was one of: unequivocal approval. —Alta. A sensation....Fun; buoyant, characteristic. —Call.
-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------

Uproarious Plantation Minstrelsy.
Uproarious Plantation Minstrelsy.SIX END MEN. | 13TH YEAR | TWENTY ARTISTS.
SIX END MEN. | 13TH YEAR | TWENTY ARTISTS.IMMENSE SUCCESS OF THE HAMTOWNS
The Mule creates an uproar.
The Rooster convulsively received.A GREAT BILL FOR THE SECOND WEEK
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Seats secured daily in advance.CALIFORNIA THEATRE.BARTON & LAWOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.Monday, January 13th, every evening during the week (except Friday), and at Saturday matinee, last week and continued success of the popular comedian
and character actor, Mr.W. J. FLORENCE,
Who will appear as Obenreizer in the powerful drama,
NO THOROUGHFARE.
Entirely new and appropriate scenery, mechanical effects, properties appointments, and brilliant cast.Friday Evening, January 17, FAREWELL BENEFIT of MRS. W. J. FLORENCE.
THE MIGHTY DOLLAR.Only No Thoroughfare Matinee Saturday.
Monday, January 20—
JOHN T. RAYMOND,
As Pemberton Pembroke in his latest success, RISKS.
47 Seats may be secured at the box office.BALDWIN'S THEATRE.THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURERLast two performances of the great London sensation, the
GREEN LANES OF ENGLAND.
This (Saturday) Jan. 11, matinee and evening.Sunday, January 12, Benefit of MR. H. M. BROWN (Stage Manager). The military comedy, OURS. The Franklin Light Infantry in Bayonet Exercises, Loading and Firing, and Silent Manual. Grand Musical Olio and THE LOST CHILD.Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday evenings, OURS and
THE LOST CHILD.Monday, January 20th, BENEFIT OF MR. FRED LYSER,
Acting Manager, when will be presented for the first time
the new play,
LOYAL TILL DEATH.STANDARD THEATRE.Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.
LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.
TREASURER.....C. S. WALTON.This (Saturday) afternoon, Grand Ladies Matinee at 2 o'clock.
Gala Matinee to-day at 2 p. m.BABES IN THE WOOD,
Or WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?
This evening, last night but one of BABES IN THE WOOD.Monday, January 13, first time in this city of Mr. Wm.
Gill's delightful extravaganza, in two acts, entitled
HORRORS!
Sparkling Opera Bouffe Music. New and magnificent scenery. Superb costumes.
Seats can be secured six days in advance.ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting
Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address of nearly Six Thousand Society People.THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.The ELITE DIRECTORY will be a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.READY ON OR ABOUT THE 20TH OF JANUARY, 1879.*FASHION GOSSIP.Alaska Seals vs. Copper and Behring Island Seals (Miscalled Russian Siberian Seals.)A statement appeared in the ARGONAUT of December 14th and December 21st, on information from H.
Liebes & Co., furriers of this city, in which it was stated that the Alaska seal skins are superior to the Copper Island seal skins (miscalled Russian Siberian seal), and that the trade recognized the last-named seal skins as being inferior, and consequently they were being sold for much less than the Alaska seal skins at the London sales. It was also claimed that these inferior skins were being palmed off in this city, by irresponsible dealers, as a superior article. No mention was made of any particular establishment.
An article, however, appears in the Sunday Chronicle of December 22d, headed with "Russian Siberian Sealskin Saques—A Card to the Public," in which a rival establishment vehemently denies the statement appearing in the ARGONAUT, and claims that it reflects upon their establishment as having palmed off Russian Siberian seals as a superior article, and that such a statement is of a "false, sneaking, jealous, and unbusiness-like character." It being a matter of controversy between the two above-named establishments, we give the following correspondence without comment. It may also be stated that we are informed by H. Liebes & Co. that the name Russian Siberian seal skins originated in this city, and the reason of its use is that the Russian sable being superior to all other sables, the public might presume that it is the same with seal skins. H. Liebes & Co. positively declare that the term Russian Siberian as applied to seal skins is unknown to the trade:"SAN FRANCISCO, December 23, 1878.
"GENERAL JOHN F. MILLER, President Alaska
Commercial Company—Dear Sir:—There are shipped to London by your Company the great bulk of the sealskins caught in the Northern Pacific Ocean both on the American and Asiatic shores. Will you please inform us of the relative number and value of the different kinds as determined by the sales in London, viz.: of those caught on the St. Paul and St.
George's Islands, and known as Alaska seals, and those caught on Copper Island, or the other islands near Behring's Straits on the Siberian Coast.
"Respectfully,
H. LIEBES & Co."To this letter a reply was sent as follows, which explains itself:"OFFICE ALASKA COM. CO., 310 Sansome St., }
San Francisco Jan. 8, 1879. }
"MESSRS. H. LIEBES & CO., City—Dear Sirs:—
The answer upon your favor of the 23d ult. has been delayed on account of the absence of the President of the Company from the city, and we have now the pleasure to state in reply to your inquiries: First, that the annual catch of sealskins on the Islands of St.
Paul and St. George being restricted by law is a little less than (100,000) one hundred thousand, and the catch on the Asiatic side (of the Islands of Behring's and Copper) amounts to (30,000) thirty thousand skins. Secondly, by reference to our books we find, taking the average London sales for the past three years, that the relative value of the Alaska seals is (25) twenty-five per cent. higher than those of the Asiatic skins coming from Behring's and Copper.
"Yours respectfully,
ALASKA COM. CO.,
"By E. NEUMANN, Secretary.""The Flagellation of Christ."Near twenty years ago a large number of old paintings were brought here from Mexico and exhibited at Platt's Hall; among them was one said to have been painted by the great Spanish master Murillo; but no history of the work was given, and its authenticity was a matter of conjecture. Lately a whole nest of Mexican Murillos was unearthed by the police, but our art sharps at once set the seal of condemnation upon them, and their authenticity seems to be no longer an open question. Yet a little later there arrives in this city a lady, having with her a painting, which is claimed to be by Murillo, called "The Flagellation of Christ." It is related by the owner that the picture has hung in her gallery in Paris for many years, is well known there, and has ever been acknowledged to be the work of that master; that no expert, of the many who have seen and passed upon it, has ever called in question its authenticity. But it has remained for San Francisco critics to throw a cloud over its genuineness, and, in a most unintelligent and ungenerous manner, cast slurs upon its quality. Fair criticism of a work of art is not only the privilege, but duty, of respectable journalism; but when it stoops to distort facts regarding its history and ownership, and make statements as to its quality which are self-evident falsehoods, every fair-minded person will naturally wonder what the motive could have been, and the result is less injurious to the picture attacked than to the journal which published the criticism—if such it can be called. It is not necessary to follow these writers and contradict their many foolish assertions or review their malicious criticisms.
The last attack of this character—nearly a column long, which appeared in one of the evening papers last Saturday—concludes by saying, that "the expression on the face of the Christ is coarse and hardened, and the physique has all the developments of a prizefighter." That part relating to the expression of the face may be an honest expression of opinion, although one would have to be very charitably disposed indeed to concede that such a thing was even possible; but that portion relating to the physique of the Saviour admits of no two opinions as to its utter falsity; for the very slight muscular development and delicate limbs of the Christ not only give evidence that the figure bears no resemblance to a prize-fighter, but that he was unused to manual labor of any sort. And this is the treatment a lady receives at the hands of a portion of the press of this city, who comes here an utter stranger, to dispose of a valuable property, the authenticity of which has been reluctantly conceded by the journals from whence these attacks emanate.
It was just such treatment as this lady has received which caused the resolve on the part of several of our own art collectors never again to loan from their galleries for public exhibition. Of a superb work by one of the great modern masters, it was said of the owner that he better knew how to draw a check in payment of a picture than how to select it.Yosemite Cologne.Mr. H. B. Slaven has been making heavy sales of that celebrated and exquisite toilet article, during the holidays, called Slaven's Yosemite Cologne. Its peculiar qualities in delicacy of aroma, and perfect fascination after one has come under its influence, make it one of the most popular of all toilet articles. Those who have tried it refuse any other.BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,
PARTY INVITATIONS
AND VISITING CARDS

Engraved and printed in the latest style.

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS
ARGOSY.The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE
INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPA-NY.—Dividend No. 68.—The monthly dividend for December, 1878, will be paid on January 10, 1879, at their office,
Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
San Francisco, January 6, 1879.LEE D. CRAIG,Notary Public and Commissioner of Deeds.TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties.
No. 600 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY,
SAN FRANCISCO.

227 Successor to F. V. Scudder.

Closing Picture Sale.Having disposed of their collection of oil paintings at auction, Messrs. Snow & May will, on Thursday next, sell on the premises, 21 Kearny Street, their collection of framed pictures, engravings, photographs, chromos, and water colors. The offering will comprise about five hundred works, and they will be in view at their store and a catalogue ready from and after Monday morning next, and will remain on exhibition day and evening up to the time of sale, eleven o'clock Thursday.Fine Volumes for the Library.Call at A. Roman & Co.'s and purchase for your library the magnificent edition of Thackeray's works, elegantly illustrated, also Chapman & Hall's edition of Dickens in twenty volumes, very finely illustrated.
Then the Sunnyside edition of Irving, in twenty-eight volumes, and Bulwer's novels in twenty-seven volumes; also the Waverley novels in twenty-five volumes, will be found just the works indispensable for the library. Besides, don't forget to call for that excellent work, Walpole's Anecdotes of Painters and Painting, in three volumes, very highly illustrated.
All the standard works you will find here, in history, poetry, and biography.Painting on porcelain. MISS RYDER, 26 1/2 Kearny Street.All the signers of the Declaration of Independence signed their names with quill pens except one—he signed his Witherspoon.An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.If you want an accurate likeness, a picture in finish and tone unsurpassed, go to T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.A Whitehall milkman was very mad because some one bought a quart of milk and then told him to "chalk it down."Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.Dicker Bro.'s Pianos, the leading piano of the world, at Kohler & Chase's, 137 and 139 Post St.We trust the undermost man in the fight will not forget that the proverb says that the anvil lasts longer than the hammer.Children's pictures a speciality at T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

SUICIDE.

How far is the popular verdict, "Suicide during temporary insanity," a correct one? Nobody need fear any wish on our part to recur to the old stake and cross-road method of burial; but is it not a fact that the prevalence of totally incorrect ideas about the motives of suicides has led, in the majority of cases, to the adoption of a formula which is altogether untrue, and, physiologically considered, absurd? Ancient history—sacred and profane—certainly lends no countenance to the idea that suicide is per se an evidence of insanity. Saul and Samson were certainly not mad; nor was Achitophel, who, in mortification at the neglect of his counsel by Absalom, deliberately went home and hanged himself; nor Eleazar, the Maccabee, who, endeavoring to kill the Syrian tyrant of his nation, fell crushed beneath the elephant which bore him in battle; neither was Judas Iscariot. Demosthenes, Thucydides, Mark Anthony, Cleopatra, Cato, Seneca, and Brutus were not mad when they deliberately chose to terminate their lives rather than endure the ills which severally threatened them. Zeno and Epicurus—each characteristic representative of hostile schools of thought—laid it down that suicide was infinitely preferable to the endurance of great pain or disgrace; only Pythagoras opposed it and censured its baseness and cowardice. Pliny not only asserts the right of a man to end his life when it pleases him, but actually thanks the Deity who has given mortals the power thus to end their sufferings. Valerius Maximus and Ælian, writing in the first and third centuries, gave instances of public provision being made by certain communities whereby those tired of life might decently obtain euthanasia. By some Eastern races, at the present day, suicide is held in estimation as a perfectly legitimate method of departing from this world. The "happy dispatch" formerly in vogue in Japan is too well known to need more than mention. In India, even under British rule, suicide is more or less practiced. Surely all the widows who have deliberately ended their lives on their husbands' funeral pyres were not mad?

Let any one read what Buckle, in his History of Civilization—or consult the opinions, still more to the point, which Van Oettingen, one of the greatest German authorities on vital statistics—gathers from the vast array of facts and figures he has collated. He maintains that suicide, so far from being an evidence of insanity, is one of the strongest proofs of the individual will; that the possibility of taking one's life is evidence that a man is his own master; that notwithstanding the love of life, the tendency to suicide remains, and the number of suicides in Europe has increased during the past five years from three to five per cent., while the increase of population is less than two per cent.; that the bad deed itself is to be regarded as the ripe fruit which is shaken from the tree by the storms of social life; and that, while myriads have the germ or tendency to suicide in their hearts, it is only developed by circumstances, frequently altogether beyond the control of the victim. Dr. DeBoismont declares that since the beginning of the present century no fewer than 100,000 Frenchmen have committed suicide, and he asserts that less than one-third of the number can with any show of reason be said to have died insane. At one time the suicidal mania broke out so strongly in the army of the First Napoleon that it threatened to decimate his forces, and was only checked by the strong personal appeal of the Emperor to the courage of his troops. A body of men could hardly all go mad together. Calm reflection on the circumstances of suicides which have come within our knowledge fails in any one of them to suggest madness as the cause or excuse; and we are greatly mistaken if the experience of others is not similar. Of course, the real reason of the general adoption of the verdict "Temporary insanity" is the wish to spare the deceased and his friends unnecessary disgrace and pain. Could not this be effected in future by a simple verdict of "Suicide"? It is well to be truthful even when we are obliged to confess ourselves ignorant, no matter if superstition has to suffer for it.

It must be rather embarrassing in Cyprus for the cleanly foreigner, addicted to bathing, if the correspondent of the London Daily News doesn't "say the thing that is not" in describing an Englishman's morning experience: He plunges into his bath, but, alas! there is no water in it, they have forgotten that. While he dons a few garments to go out and make his demand, a harsh, squeaking voice at the shutters shouts in Greek, "Mister, mister, six o'clock." A pair of dark eyes may be seen peering through a chink in the shutters, and as the inmate emerges from his room, he finds one of the women intently gazing through the shutter slit. He explains that it is water that he wants, and several of them go off together to bring it. It appears that he forgot to fasten the door as he went back to his bath, for in comes two of the women without any warning, one bearing a tiny cup of coffee. No amount of argument can get rid of them for some minutes, but finally the coffee is deposited on a chair—there is no table—and once more our friend is alone. But he is not left quiet for long, for the eyes continue to appear at the shutters and door until he stuffs up the apertures with brown paper.

A writer in a Boston journal gives some interesting reminiscences of the late Mr. Bayard Taylor. Speaking of the Orient, "That," said Mr. Taylor, "is where we began, whether we are tending, the land of the East. All this talk about Japan and China, the Chinese coming over here, is but the tail of the serpent getting into his mouth again." If I could remember all that he said about California, I could write an encyclopedia. He was so imbued with this question of the procession of the races, that it was a liberal education to hear him talk. He was very much convinced that the beauty of the American people came from intermixture of race; he was very full of the fact. "Such eyes, and complexions, and hair, as our Americans have, and are going to have," said he enthusiastically, "were never seen in the world; and the foot and hand are wonderful. Eve had not such feet as the young New York girl has. The water runs under the instep. The foot and hand must return to perfection before the Greek model comes to us. Cold climates and bad shoes are what have ruined the German foot; it is almost always ugly."

A woman was recently offered $1,000 if she would remain silent for two hours. At the end of fifteen minutes she asked: "Isn't the time nearly up?"

South African proof-readers die young. The last one succumbed to the description of a fight between the Umbeliniiji and Amaswazizizi tribes.

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms. The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements. It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds underlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont; water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table, range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted, rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 322 California Street.

GEORGE W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS, SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines, Air Compressors, Rock Drills, Portable Hoisting Engines, Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers, Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines, Upright and Stationary Engines, Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery, Blake's Rock Breakers, Smelting Furnaces, Quicklime Pumps, Chloridizing Furnaces, Cornish Pumps, Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

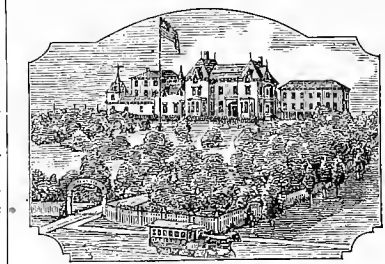

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. ⁴²⁷ Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRECH, German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—with KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age. The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1863) will commence on MONDAY, January 6th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

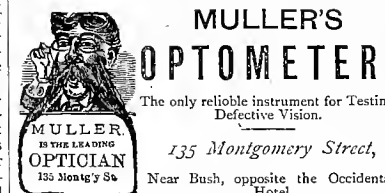

CALIFORNIA MILITARY

ACADEMY.

The next term will commence January 2, 1879.

REV. DAVID McCLOURE, PH. D., Principal, Oakland, Cal.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707)

BEST & BELCHER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 13) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Thursday, the sixth (6th) day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 5) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixth day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on FRIDAY, the twenty-eighth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. EDEN, Secretary.

Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 18th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 36) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on THURSDAY, the sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.

Office—203 Bush Street, Room 10, Cosmopolitan Hotel, San Francisco, California.

ARIZONA SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Unionville, Humboldt County, State of Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the ninth (9th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on MONDAY, the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on MONDAY, the thirteenth (13th) day of January, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

THE DEL REY SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Silver City, Lyon County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Trustees, held on the 17th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 3) of two (2) cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary or Treasurer, at the office of the Company, No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

AMT. A. CHAPIN, Secretary.

Office—No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

OFFICE OF THE CALIFORNIA

Mining Company, San Francisco, Dec. 26, 1878.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the California Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, No. 23 Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, on Wednesday, January fifteen, 1879, at one o'clock p. m., for the election of a Board of Directors for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will be closed from January 4th until January 17th.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

S. MAGGIE WHEELER, plaintiff, vs. GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to GIRAD B. H. WHEELER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—on judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds of failure to provide the plaintiff with the common necessities of life, and extreme cruelty by said plaintiff, by the defendant, and that the said plaintiff be allowed to resume her maiden name, to wit: S. Maggie Saunders, as will more fully appear in the plaintiff's complaint herein, to which reference is hereto expressly made.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fifth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

TILDEN & WILSON, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital $200,000
Assets exceed 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President.

FERD. K. RULE Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

— AND —

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS $450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Survevo

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the tenth (10th) day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 60) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the fifteenth (15th) day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on FRIDAY, the seventh day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARTHA A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—on judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETTA GOODHUE, plaintiff vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—on judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By J. H. PICHES, Deputy Clerk.
WOODS & COFFEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING
PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

 KNABE
PIANOS
Grand, Square, and Upright.
BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

 PIANOS
NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS
SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MIL-LER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

 GROVER & BAKER
SEWING MACHINES.
GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To
the trade and at retail.
J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

WAKELEE'S
AUREOLINE
PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL
Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.
PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.
Manufactured by
H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,
Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA,
SAN FRANCISCO
Capital.....$5,000,000
D. O. MILLS.....President.
WILLIAM ALVORD.....Vice-President.
THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York. Agency of the Bank of California, Boston, Trenton, National Bank, Chicago, Union National Bank, St. Louis, Boatmen's Savings Bank, New Zealand, the Bank of New Zealand, London, China, Japan
India, and Australia, the Oriental Bank Corporation.

The Bank has Agencies at Virginia City and Gold Hill, and Correspondents in all the principal mining districts and interior towns of the Pacific Coast.
Letters of Credit issued available in all parts of the world
Draw direct on London, Dublin, Paris, Berlin, Bremen
Hamburg, Frankfurt-on-Main, Antwerp, Amsterdam, St
Petersburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Christiana, Locarno,
Birmingham, Sydney, Auckland, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yoo

AT AUCTION

At SNOW & MAY'S, No. 21 Kearny Street, on Thursday, Jan. 16th, at 11 A. M. 500
Framed Pictures on view, and Catalogues ready Monday, the 13th.
GEO. F. LAMSON, Auctioneer.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants.....from $ 4 00
Suits.....from 15 00
Overcoats....from 15 00
Dress Coats..from 20 00

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin Pants
from.....$7 00
White Vestsfrom 3 00
Fancy Vestsfrom 6 00
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.
FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,
727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., January 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 17 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Monday, the 13th day of January, 1879. Transfer books closed on Thursday, January 6, 1879, at 3 o'clock P. M.
WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF THE CALIFORNIA MINING CO., San Francisco, Jan. 7th, 1879. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 39) of One ($1) Dollar per share was declared, payable on Thursday, the sixteenth day of January, 1879.
C. P. GORDON, Secretary.
Office—Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

STEINWAY

& SON'S

PIANOS

Two Highest Awards for the best Pianos and Piano Forte Material,

U. S. CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION,
Philadelphia, 1876.

The Steinway Pianos alone were accorded the "highest degree of excellence in all styles."

The First Grand Gold Medal of Honor, Exposition Universelle, Paris, 1867.
Grand Honorary Testimonial Medal, Society of Fine Arts, Paris, 1867.

Grand National Gold Medal, from H. M.
King Charles XV. of Sweden and Norway, 1868.

Academical Honors of the Royal Academies,
Berlin and Stockholm.

First Prize Medal, International Exhibition,
London, 1862.

Twenty-five First Medals at American Exhibitions.

Testimonials and Certificates,
From the Most Eminent Musicians, Composers, and Artists in the World, who all unite in the Unanimous Verdict of the Superiority of the Steinway Pianos over all others.

Every Steinway Piano is Fully Warranted for Five Years.

Illustrated Catalogues, with Price List,
Mailed Free on Application.

STEINWAY HALL.

GRAY'S

MUSIC STORE

117 POST STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 3.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 18, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We congratulate our fellow-citizens that there is no immediate prospect that the race of lawyers will die out. That large and valuable class of the community is, we are happy to say, on the increase. Mr. S. Clinton Hastings, a most exemplary citizen and excellent gentleman, once Attorney-General of California, and once upon the bench of the Supreme Court, both of which positions he adorned with his learning and varied accomplishments, has laid the foundations of a law college. This was indeed a necessity, as there was a well grounded apprehension that the race was dying out. The same fear has been felt in reference to rats, for it has been observed that when the country is overrun with them they eat each other, and thus reduce their numbers. The fish of the ocean are kept from inordinate multiplication by the fact that the large fish feed upon the lesser ones. The spawn of the salmon is the food for trout. There was a time when the manufacture of a lawyer was not of so easy accomplishment as now. It demanded for material youth of some excellence of parts, some promise of ability, some culture, some learning, some character, and then the process was a tedious one. After the academical or college course came the law lectures, the apprenticeship in the working office, and the exhaustive examination before a bench of judges learned in the law. Then, judges were created from gentlemen and scholars; now, a boy enters a law office to run of errands. He is destitute of any other learning than that acquired at the common school; he learns to write by copying papers. His only study is the Code; his only knowledge of pleading to fill blanks. His first initiation into practice is to serve subpoenas and make returns, to move the court for delay till his master comes in, to bring a suit in a justice court, to follow it to a county court, to be admitted by piecemeal, and finally to dead-beat his way to the roll of attorneys as the tramp crosses the plains on the axle of freight trains. He has never seen an institution of high learning. The principles that underlie the law are to him mysteries that he has never explored. Pleadings are mere verbiage, practice is mere cheek, argument is only forensic bluster. He is a pettifogger and not a lawyer. Of that high honor that in the earlier time was the leading characteristic of gentlemen of the bar he knows nothing; for that integrity that regarded an unprofessional action as impossible he cares nothing. He came to the profession across lots, and not by way of study. It is to him only a money-making industry. Of embracery he has never heard; of evasions, tricks, subterfuges, technical advantages, court rules, and codes, he is master.

Very many of the San Francisco bar who are entitled to write themselves "attorneys at law" are not gentlemen, nor men of learning, nor men of character, nor of nice sense of honor. They do not observe the amenities and courtesies of professional life. They do not understand the rules that govern social intercourse. They do not dress as lawyers. Their deportment smacks more of the political than the professional arena. They are avaricious and greedy; they stir up litigation; they oppress the poor; they blackmail the rich. They mouse for defective titles to land; they plot to foment litigation; they betray their clients by bad advice; they induce clients to enter litigation that they may rob them. Their track is marked by ruined fortunes and domestic dissensions. They are a nuisance to the community, a disgrace to the profession. The Hon. S. Clinton Hastings has established a college of the law. It starts off with eighty-seven students. There are not less than five hundred other students in the various law offices of the city. We are in hope that the "Hastings College of the Law" will correct the evil of which we complain, that it will aid to raise the standard of the profession. It would be a good thing if this mob of ignorant boys who are content to crowd themselves into a profession for which they are in no wise fitted could be driven to the country and made to labor. We have too many lawyers (of the kind we mention). They are, thank God, starving to death. If the Hastings College can produce a superior kind, one that will be able to drive these ignorant, superficial pretenders out of the profession, we shall be glad of it—glad as we are when rats eat rats.

Great discussion is now going on in the Constitutional Convention as to the salary of judges. We hear a vast deal about the English bar, and how important it is to maintain the dignity of the Bench, that the learning and probity demanded for properly performing judicial duties are entitled to a large compensation. Now, this is undoubtedly true, and the English Bench is the very model of resolute independence, thorough integrity, industry, and scholarly accomplishments. We wish our judges were like the English judges. We wish they were their equals in learning and probity. We wish they held their offices for life. We wish our judiciary was not elective, and that the man destined to wear the ermine had not to wade through the filth of primary elections, the slum of nominating conventions, and then to swim the muddy waters of a popular election. It is a rare mind that with poverty at home and an election pending can hold the scales of Justice fairly poised in the presence of public clamor and public prejudice. It is an honest mind that can withstand the temptation of the rich man's bribe, or the great man's favor, when the money of the one or the power of the other comes as a temptation between him and his duty. It is a resolute and heroic judicial character that, in the face of popular opinion or popular prejudice, shall dare to deal justly and decide legally when the same mob that howls to-day votes to-morrow, and when the judge knows that the same passion, prejudice, and misconception that sit scowling around his tribunal will next month have the power at the ballot-box to terminate his judicial career. Our whole system of judicial selection is wrong and bad. To occupy the bench of a municipal or State court enables the incumbent to earn $2,500 or $6,000 per annum. It is a political prize. It is put up for a political scramble. It is an elective office.

A is a man of great legal learning; he is a reader and thinker; he has graduated from a learned university; he has a mind disciplined by study; he has had experience at the bar; he is advanced in years; he is well-grounded in principles of the law; he is modest, retiring; is not a politician, has not the power of political combination, does not know how to organize a primary, plant a convention, or secure the favor of ward manipulators. He would make an admirable judge. B is a political adventurer; he has a smattering of law, picked up in police court or justice's practice; he has the gift of gab, can drink, tell stories, chew, and smoke; he is in the vigor of life; he has brass, cheek, dash; he is hand in glove with all the ward loafers, cheek by jowl with all the adventurers, demagogues, and political plunderers that live by party plunder; he will plot in bar-rooms, and "combine" with every vagabond that hangs upon the ragged edge of politics, in order to advance himself to a judicial position. In competition with such a man the modest and learned gentleman has but an unequal conflict—and this is where we are drifting. The same plotting that enables the pound-keeper to succeed and gives him jurisdiction over wandering dogs, stray horses, and vagabond swine, places a good-for-nothing ward politician upon the judicial bench. The first step successfully taken emboldens the criminal magistrate or the justice of the peace to aspire to the supreme bench. Around our judicial positions there are now swarming an aspiring mob of ill-educated, ambitious, legal hoodlums, whose only qualification for judicial place is their ability to get it. It is an evil sign in our political horizon. It is a presage of decay and dissolution. It is a weak spot in republican government that our judicial positions are being filled with the weak, the ignorant, the dishonest. Excepting here and there, the Bench of California is not filled with able, high-minded gentlemen. It is growing worse and worse every year. The better lawyers will not take a judicial nomination to run the gauntlet of a political campaign.

The Bench has lost and is losing its dignity. We can not better illustrate this fact than by calling attention to its relation to the press. The newspaper press comments upon cases pending, discusses the facts and the law of cases while on trial, criticises the court, denounces its rulings, charges it with being controlled and influenced by selfish considerations, threatens the judge with political consequences, and denounces an attorney pleading his case as being a thief and forger; things which if done by the editors of the London Times would send them to prison for contempt of court. A gentleman who can earn a living at the bar, or who has means to exist without a judge's salary, will shrink from putting himself in position to become the butt of a licentious and dishonorable press, as he will hesitate to be dragged through the filth and mire of politics to attain judicial honors,

The question of salary, in comparison with other questions, is unimportant. If political parties can place upon the Bench of this State a lot of illiterate underheads a very small compensation will express our estimate of their value. If the Convention will make the judicial a position for life, to be secured by appointment, to be lifted above the intrigues and plottings of party, and do that which will secure learning, integrity, and industry in the judge's office, we should favor high salaries. There is a great deal of humbug about the pay of judges. If it is too high the office is scrambled for by mercenary knaves; if it is too low the position is likely to be filled by the incompetent and dishonest.

There is one fact that may be profitably considered, viz.: there is only one judge in California at present in office who does not desire a reflection at his present salary. It is also true, as a rule, that the present judiciary receives all it is worth. It is true, as a rule, that the present judges did not earn as much money practicing law as they now get for salary. It is true that they are not overworked, but that, as a rule, they have a very easy, idle life. They have long vacations, short hours of service on the bench, and the taking of cases "under consideration" is a pretense rather than an opportunity of study. If every nisi prius judge were compelled to decide a case the hour that it was submitted, it would be better for the litigant than to allow him to hold it under consideration. It should be a misdemeanor, or crime punishable by fine, or, what would be worse, loss of office, for any judge to hold cases, as some do, for months, and even years. We have but a qualified respect for the law as now administered by our courts, and we question sometimes whether the toss of a coin would not as often determine the right of a litigated controversy as the present vexatious, tedious, expensive, and uncertain machinery of our courts.

When gas was $5 a thousand our bills were not larger than now. When the capital of the gas company was $2,000,000 it did not pay a larger interest than it now pays on $10,000,000. When gas was selling at $3.50 a thousand our bills were twenty-five per cent. less than now at $3. Mr. Bloomfield, the Gas Inspector, went East at the city's expense to acquire information that might have been obtained by letter. He estimated the cost of manufacturing gas at nine cents a thousand more than the company were willing to sell it for. His salary was $400 a month for certifying that gas was sixteen-candle power, when everybody knows it is not five; if he estimates wear and tear of conscience he ought to be paid at least $1,000 a month. His salary was reduced to $200 a month; then to $100; and if it should be cut down to ten cents a year he would not resign. The city pays over $300,000 a year for lighting the streets; coal oil at half the price would give a better illumination. The San Francisco Gas Light Company is an immense imposition; and if the Board of Supervisors renew the contract, it will be strong presumptive evidence that, of the twelve members, seven are dishonest.

England's military glory has finally culminated in a victory over the half-armed, half-organized troops of the Ameer of Afghanistan. By an expenditure of a little money, the loss of one or two young-gentlemanly officers, a few score of Indian soldiers, and General Biddulph's camels, England adds another brilliant page to her history. The more brilliant is this particular historic page because she writes it herself. Her victory over King Theodore of Abyssinia, in which no English soldier received hurt in battle, is another triumph of English arms. The full measure of this triumph may be estimated by imagining a war between American soldiers with arms of precision and Digger Indians armed with bows and arrows; the English fleet bombarding San Juan, and burning the huts of cane thatched with straw; the recent demonstration of English valor upon our Pacific Coast. All these things are illustrations of that prudent courage the cowardly bully exercised who boasted that he knew whose face to slap. We hope to live long enough to see England engage in a war with some first-class power. We have always thought it a great misfortune that instead of our civil war we could not have aired our valor in a brush with England.

"Bryart is hardly cold and now poor Bayard is gone," mused Theresa Corlett; "God knows how will claim Longfellow and me."

A LITTLE GAME AMONG GENTLEMEN.

Showing why Blondin Duval left San Francisco.

Pericles Fanytre was a native Californian; not a Greaser, but belonging to the State by birth. His father was an aristocrat of the ancien régime—that is to say, he grew rich on monopoly twelve years ago or more. Ten years stand for a century in San Francisco society, and Fanytre père achieved success just in time to send his only son to the fastest college of New England. The young man hurried faithfully, for he had a career before him and there was no time to lose.

Four years at Harvard; two or three prolonged tours in Europe, with a Fortunatus purse at his girdle; a little playing at medicine among the students of the Quartier Latin of Paris; some curious adventures, and some still more curious love affairs. That was the story of Perry Fanytre's life at thirty.

At the time our story begins Pericles was at the top round of his ladder. He had been at home a year or more; long enough, at least, to win his place in society and to gather around him an admiring company of good fellows—sub-heroes. His personal attractions were rather peculiar: He had a tanned head—like most of his neighbors—perfectly cut features, which he did not disfigure by a beard, and a colorless face, save for a faint olive tint. In short, he looked a handsome apostate monk. He was mysterious; that made him delightful. His dark eyes were inscrutable; his manner never varied, and yet he was never tiresome. Society and draw poker took up so much of his time that of course there was no room in his life for trivialities.

But one morning old John Fanytre blew out his brains. Then he had a whole page in the live paper, and a big funeral. Of course the estate was bankrupt. So the two girls went into fashionable mourning, and, after a suitable time had elapsed, went to Venice for the winter.

Pericles behaved beautifully. Anything in bad taste was so repugnant to him that he refrained from exhibiting the least emotion at his father's funeral; and when a benevolent uncle offered to relieve him of the care of his ten sisters he accepted the offer gracefully, believing that a refusal would wound his uncle's susceptible feelings. He also devoted himself to disentangling the late Mr. Fanytre's business, and the result was that the creditors received fifty cents on the dollar, and were impressed with the belief that even this was owing to the son's generosity.

Perry kept his pleasant little rooms on Shadow Street, and really one could not see much difference in his mode of living; but it came to be whispered about that he had a private income which had come through—well, we'll say through his mother's family.

Part of this—according to rumor—had been devoted to the ravenous creditors; but there was a modest residue, which doubtless sufficed for the quiet little parties in the quiet little rooms, for the losses at "draw," and the quiet little turnout in the Park which could pass any other fellow's if its owner was willing. But Perry was never "fast," never "loud." Really, you would never have known but that he came of the Van Vloodts of New York, or the Winthrops of Boston. He was so sure of himself; he had so much repose; and his chivalry and philanthropy never varied any more than his manner. Perry was a social hero. How he threw all the other young men into shadow at Mrs. Bullion's grand fancy ball given for the benefit of the "Old Woman's Knitting Club."

He was Abelard (by courtesy), and the lovely Mrs. Fessenden, by the merest coincidence, had taken the character of Héloïse; curious, wasn't it? They were old friends, these two, and I fancy that Emily Fessenden knew more of our hero's affairs than anybody else; but then she won confidence everywhere. A pathetic-looking little creature, with wistful brown eyes and caressing ways, whose head held more ambitious plots than a "boss" politician's. She looked ten years younger than she really was, and had slipped so artistically from her widow's weeds into cheerful colors that nobody knew just when to make ill-natured remarks about it.

But she loved Perry with the unreasonable folly of a young girl, and her pale face flushed a trifle when he came near on that memorable night. He looked tired and distrait, and dropped carelessly into a seat beside her, after a swift survey of her costume.

"I want your advice, Emily," he said, abruptly. She lifted her eyes with a questioning glance which needed no emphasizing words. "I intend to marry," he went on, rapidly, "and settle down, and be respectable. Shall I not make a delightful Benedick?"—with a harsh laugh.

"Who?" began his companion.

"That is for you to tell," he interrupted. "You know all these princesses better than I. Only remember, I shall sell myself dearly. The truth is, my dear friend, I want money. It is a sad truth, but the merriest men reach it once in a while." Mrs. Fessenden winced a little.

"And women, too," she added softly. Then, smiling gayly as she turned toward him: "Shall we go and pick out the princess who is to make you rich?" and they moved away together.

Two or three hours later Perry ran up the steps which led to his rooms. He stopped a moment on the landing. A bright light streamed through the half-open door, and a murmur of manly voices came out to meet him.

"I'll give myself one more chance," he muttered, and entered the room. Four men in evening costume were playing poker, one of them with the vivacious viciousness of a devotee as yet but amateur. Perry took in the situation at a glance. "Four Injuns," he muttered inaudibly. "I'll take a hand, if I may," he said aloud. "Delighted to have you," said Frank Tidewarden, alias "the British Lion." "Of course," said Charley Yerrington. "Certainly," said the others.

Among the players sat Blondin Duval, whose pet name was Blondie, in tribute to his tawny curls. He was less than twenty-six on the night of which I write. Men like Perry called him a "molly-coddle." Misses of sixteen said he was "too young." He might have played "Armand" to "Camille," for as yet the blight of too much knowledge had not touched him. He believed in God, in womankind, in republican government; and he was sitting down to his first game of draw poker.

The fourth man was incorrectly classed under the phrasing "Injuns." He was of the class inelegantly named "capper," and of superior rank in his profession. He had once been a fighting editor, and was designated by a rival journalist as a "scribbler to whom pugilism was a fine art, and draw poker an exact science." His name was P. Henry McPatrick. His exact relations with Perry Fanytre have never been determined.

Perry carelessly drew up a chair and sat down directly opposite the quondam fighting editor. By the merest coincidence each of these two players faced a wide pier-glass, in which occasional glimpses of ill-concealed hands—but that is mere gossip; I was not there.

The five-handed game went on apace with varying fortunes and meagre sensation. The British Lion played carelessly, though by no means recklessly, with the assured jauntiness of a man who could afford to lose, and lose he did pretty uniformly. Charley Yerrington played carelessly, too, but there was a dash of method in his madness, a spice of bravado, which generally follows good luck.

Perry was playing abstractedly—it seemed to three of the others. Perhaps he was thinking of the Princess Fanytre that was to be; perhaps he was reasoning out the process by which his vis-à-vis won every time he lost. Clearly, he was not outwardly interested in the game. Of the game played by Mr. McPatrick the less said the better. There are mysteries too inscrutable for human penetration; there are emotions too deep for human tears. Mr. P. Henry McPatrick's game in "draw" was the one, and the belief inspired thereby was the other. The rude jargon of the West has designated Mr. Patrick's method as the "hogging game," and I am painfully constrained to acknowledge that for once the rude Western jargon is wonderfully apt.

But of the five players Blondin Duval was the only one thoroughly under the spell of the game. To Tidewarden it was killing time, to Yerrington merely high class excitement, to Perry Fanytre routine, to the "capper" bread and butter; but to Blondin, young, ardent, attuned to pleasure as yet untainted by positive shame, the first sensation was expectation more than realized. He played at first modestly and not unwisely; he lost about a hundred, won it back, and another hundred as well; lost that, and won and lost again.

It was 2 A. M. The British Lion gave a great English yawn and wished himself in bed. Yerrington ventured a witticism at the expense of his wife, and looked up to the ceiling. "Let us play one more hand, gentlemen," said Mr. McPatrick, in his blandest tones.

"Well, if we must, we must," said the novice, regretfully. Perry nodded; was it merely in assent, or was it in veiled signal to the dealer? Perish the ungenerous thought!

Curious, wasn't it, everybody had a playing hand. The British Lion chipped to open the pot, Yerrington raised him five dollars before the draw, and all the others came in. Tidewarden drew two cards, Yerrington one, Perry three; the novice took none. "Five," said the British Lion.

"Pass," said Yerrington, and rose to put on his coat.

"Raise you twenty," drawled Perry in his sweetest society tones. Blondin shoved two twenties into the centre. The capper passed, and Tidewarden laid down his cards.

"Twenty more," drawled Perry.

"Forty better."

"Fifty."

"Better."

"A hundred."

"Lend me five hundred, Charley," said Duval, with a white face, and eyes aglint with excitement. "A hundred more."

"Three hundred."

The novice looked over his hand, once or twice, nervously, as if he doubted his own senses.

"Call you, sir," he said.

The silence, the expectancy, the suppressed excitement, was a study for Hogarth.

Slowly, one by one, Perry laid his cards face upward before him: four aces.

With something so like an oath that I can't trust myself to paraphrase it, Blondin flung down his cards: one, two, three, four kings, and one ace! "How is this, sir?" he said, hotly, turning his flushed face to the passive dealer. Mr. McPatrick gingerly picked Blondin's ace from the table and turned over the back. It was an odd card! Every one examined it, and it was too plain. The gold lay still on the table glittering in the rays of the drop-light, temptingly, mockingly. Perry put out his hand to draw it toward him.

"A moment, Fanytre, if you please!"

Blondin was very pale, almost wild-looking in his pallor. "Is this just—just the regular thing at draw, among gentlemen?"

"Certainly," said the one-time editorial pugilist, blusteringly.

"I was talking to your employer, sir. I have already paid a fair price for doubting the men who called you a blackleg."

Mr. Henry McPatrick's hand was in his pistol-pocket in a moment; but the next moment his muscular arm was writhing in the vice-like grasp of the swart Briton, whose weight was 246 and his muscle proportionate.

"I should not like to soil the pavement by dropping you out of the window, Mr. McPatrick, and so you will please keep very blank still. As for you, Mr. Pericles Fanytre, delicacy forbids me to call you a knave in these rooms, for the laws of hospitality clearly disarm you under this roof. The pot will be divided, sir. I believe Mr. Yerrington agrees with me."

"Yes I do," said Charley.

Was it not "bad form" of Perry Fanytre to color like a school-girl, and say between a snarl and a falsetto scream? "Gentlemen, that money is mine, fairly. Am I responsible for another's blunder? I won that money, and I mean to have it; and if that cub stands in my way, by—"

It was a sherry decanter which the impulsive, but unerring, Blondin flung at Perry's hapless head. It was Emily Fessenden who went into gratuitous mourning for a man quite unworthy of the compliment. It was Blondin Duval of whom the Valparaíso mammas used to warn their daughters: "He has a history, my dears, and such men are dangerous."

SAN FRANCISCO, January 10, 1879. IGNOTUS.

There is nothing which fills the soul of a young man with consternation so much as to take his best girl to prayer-meeting and have the managing elder call upon "our stranger brother for a few remarks and a prayer."

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Imprudence of too accurately Forecasting the movements of Frogs.—The Leonine Basso Profundo.—New and Startling Versions of Familiar Scripture Stories, by the author's brother, William.—Studies in Suction: the Exploits of Franky, that's the Baby.—Dogs and Fools.

One time a boy he cot a frog, and tuke and put it in his fathers bed, and jest fore bed time the boy sed to his father: "It's been mity wet wether lately, and the frogs has all been drowned out of the pond, and mebbly some of them big green fellers has cum in the house and gone to bed like fokes."

Then the boys father he loked up from his newspaper and he sed: "Charley," cos that was the boys name, "I gess you better go to bed your ownself, cos yure intleck is a wanderin mity wild agin, and you might do yure self an injury by swollerin the cole skuttle, or buttin yure brains out agiust the sofy piller."

So Charley he went to bed, but after a while he was woke up and see his father standin there with a canule, and his father he sed: "Charley, I didnt pay much atention to wot you was a sayn a bowt frogs, but after I had gon to bed, and I seen things was a beginnin for to turn out jest like you had sed, wy I hollered rite out, cos I was so dlited for to think I had sech a smart boy. Didnt you hear me holler, Charley, didnt you hear yure ole fathers xcamations of satisfy, and feel the house shake wen he arose for to cum and fondle you?"

Then Charley he said wot did his father hav in the hand wich was be hine his back, an the ol man he said "O, thats the fonder."

But my sisters yung man, which tole me the story, he sed that the fonder bore a fancifle re zembalance to a black snake wip.

But the rattle snake, with the castinets onto his tail, is the feller for me, yes, in deed, wen he dont bite. One day Missy, thats my sister, she see a little snake bout 6 inches long in the gardn, an she hollered like pirates.

Snakes is serpents, and eels is fish, but the lion he is the king of beests and his roar is offle!

Once there was a operry man, wich hired fokes for to sing, he was a goin thru the woods and a lion come a long and loked at him, and wipped itself with its tail, and sticked its mane up, and opend its mowth, and rored fritefle, yu never seen sech bellerin! The operry man he sed: "Thats ol rite, thats ol rite, consider yure selluf engaged for the seeson at yure own terms, but I got to be xcused now, cos seven teen barry tones is waitin for me to hear thein." And the opperry man he wakled a way mity lifely, like he was frade the barry tones wuld bust theinselfs a holdin in the sing fore he cude git there.

Mister Pitchel, thats the preecher, he sed: "Billy," thats my brother, "do you know wot for they put Dannie in the lions den?"

Billy he spoke rite up and sed: "Yis, sir," and Mister Pitchel he sed "Wot?"

Then Billy he said: "Cos he snook in under the sho tent without payin."

Then Mister Pitchel he sed: "Wy, William!" And after a while he ast a other time: "Wot made the lions not eat Dannie?" and Billy he sed: "They wude et him if thay had knew he was good to eat."

But I gess if Franky, thats the baby, had ben there he wude put Dannie in his mowth an chewd him a wile any how.

One time Franky was a suckin the end of a ax handle which had been sawd off, and Uncle Ned he see bim a suckin it, and he hollered to me: "Run quick, Johnny, and pull it out, its too late for to save the ax, but the hannel wil do for to rebuke Mose with, wich is the cat, and exort Bildad, thats the new dog, to a better life."

A other time Franky was left a sleep sick and father he went in the room for to luke at him, and wen he cum out mother she ast: "Has he got sech a hot fever like he had?"

Then father he said: "No, not quite, but I gess he wil have agin purty sune, cos he is a usin the fire poker mity viggerously in his inside."

And wen mother she went for to see, Franky was a suckn the black end, but lickerish is the stof for me wen it comes to suckn sumthing.

And now I wil tel you a little story. A man wich was a wood choper he had a big dog, and the dog wude wotch his dinner in a little tin pale wile the man was cutn the trees down, and I can tel you its mity gude fun for to see em fall, but one time one wich ole Gaffer Peters cut down it fel onto, a cow an she had to be et. Wel, one day the man wich had his dinner in a little tin pales dog it et it up its own self, sted of wotchin it for him, and he was mity mad, and waled the dog offle til it was sick a bed. But wen it got cured it et it up a nther time. So the man he put pizen in the dinner wich it was the dogs bizness for to wotch, and took a other dinner without no pizen in it, and hid it a little way of. But bime by he forgot and et the pizen dinner his ownself and hollered wild! Then the dog rose up its bed were it was eatin the other dinner, wich it had found, and looked at the man reel sollem, much as to say: "Pore feller, you dont appear to be no better satisfide wen lme a honest dog than wot you was wen I was a theef."

But the man he didnt take notice, cos bis toes was in his eyes, for the pizen had shet him up like a jack nive.

Uncle Ned he says one time there was a king wich had a cort fole, and one day wen the king was to his dinner he had a reel nice pudden, and the fool he sed: "May it please yure majesty, I have got a carime on my contience, and if yule make that wrasle, the Prime Minster, eat that pudden lle confess."

But the king swore a wicked oth and sed: "You got to eat it yure ownself, you notty pizener!"

So the fool was made eat it every little tiny bit up, and wen it was et he patted hissef onto the stumack of his belly and sed: "The royel suspitchins was unfounded."

Then the king sed: "Wot was yure carime, then?" and the fool he sed: "A treezenable ambition for to eat my masters pudden my ownself."

But you jest ot to see me and Billy eat a raisn feller!

SAN RAFAEL, January 12, 1879.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S LAST VISIT.—I.

Bayard Taylor's last visit to the Pacific Coast was in June, 1870. He came here, encouraged by the success of his early experience in the California lecture field, to make $2,000 to pay off a debt he owed in Chester County, Pennsylvania. He wanted an agent, secretary, etc., and I was introduced to him as an applicant for that position. My first impressions of Mr. Taylor were most favorable. His manner was cordial and without the slightest approach to haughtiness, or that self-complacency which might be expected in a man who had won so many laurels in the field of letters. We agreed to terms, and Mr. Taylor, Wandesforde, the artist (who had known Taylor intimately in New York years before), Charles Warren Stoddard, and myself, sat down to dinner at the Grand Hotel. Taylor, who had a wonderful fund of anecdote, was delightful. In regard to this accomplishment, during a trip with him, extending over a period of six weeks, I have never passed an hour in his society that was not marked by some anecdote, and I have never heard him repeat the same story twice. San José was our first port of destination; but although we had sent on numerous posters, and advertised largely in the newspapers, the harvest was a very poor one. The subject of the lecture was "Russia and the Russians." It was heavy and uninteresting, and the small audience that heard it went away disappointed. The next morning we started for Santa Cruz. Taylor had a seat outside the stage with the driver, and so entertained that worthy with his experiences in California in '49 that he pulled up his horses whenever Taylor wished to gather specimens of the flowers and shrubs on the way; and this was so frequent—for Taylor was an enthusiastic botanist—that we were more than an hour behind time, and the agent in Santa Cruz believed that some accident had befallen us. The Santa Cruzians were more anxious to hear about Russia and the Russians than their neighbors of San José, and we had a fair house. While here Taylor received a long and interesting letter from Longfellow on the subject of his (Taylor's) translation of Faust, which was then in the printer's hands. The poet praised it highly, and made a prediction, which was afterward fulfilled, that it would add more to Taylor's fame than anything he had yet achieved. Taylor was charmed with the spirit of the letter, and as I was then affected with an autograph mania, presented it to me.

At Watsonville we met our Waterloo. It was a drizzling, disagreeable evening. Opposite the hall where the lecture was to take place an itinerant quack was selling patent pills, a cure, he assured his audience, for every disease under the sun.

"Do not let my entertainment," he shouted, "interfere with the entertainment of the other gentleman, who lectures in that hall to-night. It is true that I will heal your bodies, and confer upon you the priceless boon of health; but he will improve your minds, and therefore there is no antagonism between us, there can be no antagonism between us; and moreover, fellow-citizens, there shall be no antagonism between us."

But, unfortunately for the appreciation of the good citizens of Watsonville, the pill-seller's performance did interfere most sadly with the receipts of the lecture. We had a "baker's dozen" in the house, the quack's retainers extended from sidewalk to sidewalk, and the pills went off like the last edition of a newspaper in war time. After the lecture, as we were taking a night-cap at the bar before turning in, the pill-vender entered, a comforter about his throat, and carrying a canvas sack well filled with halves and quarters.

"Put this in the safe," he said to the bar-keeper, in a basso profundo.

"Will you have a drink?" said Taylor.

"Thank you, sir, with pleasure," rejoined the quack, courteously; and then: "Aren't you the gentleman that lectured to-night?"

"I am," said Taylor.

"Then I hope my performance did not interfere with yours. I tell you, sir, it does not do for gentlemen of our profession to meet in these small country towns. They can't stand two entertainments on the same night. Now, we'll have a talk over our respective routes, and arrange it so that we won't clash as on this evening. Your good health, sir," and he swallowed his hot toddy with complacency, and beamed upon Taylor with fraternal regard. This incident delighted Taylor, and he chatted and drank with his professional brother, who was an odd character, until the drowsy bar-keeper shut up the shop.

The next morning we took a long walk to see an old Spaniard who was one of the original owners of this beautiful Pajaro Valley. On this trip Taylor spoke most affectionately of Longfellow, and dwelt upon a visit that Longfellow and he had made to Tennyson four years before. "After a perfect English tea," said Mr. Taylor, "our conversation naturally turned on literature, and Longfellow asked Tennyson what portion of the 'Idyls of the King' was his favorite. 'I will read it for you,' said the poet, and began that passage describing the parting of Arthur and Guinevere:

"I do not come to curse thee, Guinevere—
I whose vast pity almost makes me die
To see thee laying there thy golden head,
My pride in happier summers, at my feet."

"Tennyson read in a deep monotone, and seemed much affected. Longfellow was positively in tears. It was a grand, a beautiful piece of reading. After the ladies had retired Tennyson told us an anecdote that was as coarse as any 'gentleman's story' could well be. Longfellow, who can never endure anything of this nature, found some pretext for retiring. Meeting me alone on the lawn he expressed his astonishment that a man of Tennyson's intense refinement could be guilty of such coarseness. I explained it by saying that he required some relief from the strong emotional pitch he had been worked up to in his reading, and had probably found it in this direct contrast to refined sentiment. Tennyson, who suspected that Longfellow did not relish his story, gave the same reason before the conclusion of our visit."

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

An Irish waiter at a Christmas gathering at an uptown hotel complimented a turkey in the following manner: "Faith, it's not six hours since that turkey was walking around his real estate with his hands in his pocket, never darning what a pretty invitashun he'd have to jine you gentlemen at dinner,"

THE UNFAIR SEX.

Lady Thornton, wife of the British Minister, is said to be very domestic and fond of knitting. She is tall and lank, and not given to wearing French toilets.

A brute beast of a man says that when you want to get the best of an argument with a woman of thirty you should lead off with: "Now, then, a woman of your age—," etc.

A charming young thing at a New York school examination, in reading her exercise before a large audience of parents, changed Keats' line, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever!"

"Certain circles of Washington official society," says the Herald, "are much agitated over the question: 'Which shall first call on the other, the wife of a corporal of infantry or the grandmother of a boatswain's mate?'"

At midnight, in his downy bed, John Turk, of Iowa, was dreaming of how he had locked his two daughters in a room up stairs. An hour passed on, they lowered themselves to the ground, eloped with their lovers, and were next heard of in Chicago.

Of Secretary Eyarts' two daughters, one is a brunette with intensely black hair, and the other a pale, fair-haired New England blonde, the very opposite of her sister. Both are extremely popular in Washington society, and would be if they were anybody's daughters.

There has been the greatest difficulty in inducing the Duchess of Edinburgh to go over and take up her abode in England, even for a few weeks, though the Queen had intimated the propriety and reassuring effect of such a measure. She idolizes her father, and does not love the English Court.

May Fiske is an actress of the vigorous sort, both on and off the stage. In Montreal she was offended by her agent. She threw a water-pitcher at his head, but he dodged it; then she scratched his face, pulled his hair, and was trying to throw him out of a window when the bystanders rescued him.

The beautiful Miss Gabrielle Greeley, daughter of the eccentric Horace, intends becoming a Sister of Mary the Virgin, says rumor; but Mrs. Grundy has frequently so reported, at different times, of this fair maid of Chappaqua. Her aunt, Mrs. Cleveland, sister of Mr. Greeley, is giving literary receptions this winter. No refreshments are expected at these feasts of the soul.

It is related that the Princess Louise, just before leaving England, called at the studio of Mr. Rossetti, the painter whose pictures are "sold from the easel" and never exhibited to the vulgar herd, but it was intimated to her royal highness that the artist was not at the beck and call of princesses. Mr. Rossetti is evidently not in the habit of displaying his courtesy any more than his pictures.

The following "fashion note" from a contemporary makes us blush, but we know our duty and shall not swerve from its performance. It goes: "New sets of flannel chemises, drawers, and skirts are seen at A. T. Stewart & Co.'s in all colors and white, embroidered in delicate colors and in white. The drawers are confined at the knee with an elastic, run in a casing above an embroidered edge forming a ruffle. These sets are intended for wear over the under vests and drawers and the linen or cambric underwear."

Just before a recent concert began at the Crystal Palace the death of the Princess Alice was announced from the platform, and the "Dead March" from Saul was played, all up-standing. The greater part of the audience had not heard the unhappy intelligence, and the effect of its solemn announcement, followed by the funeral march, was painful to witness. A great many ladies burst into tears, some went out, and those who remained had frequent recourse to their handkerchiefs, while upon the countenances of all gloom and depression were visibly seated.

Two ladies boarding at the Windsor Hotel, New York, after being on friendly terms, quarreled and became deadly enemies. They both went to Washington to visit, one to the residence of a wealthy Congressman who gives frequent entertainments, the other to the Arlington Hotel. The latter desired to make the acquaintance of the above-mentioned Congressman's family, so as to have the pleasure of attendance at these festivals. There was but one way to accomplish this. It was to boldly ask to see her enemy on a reception day, and to ignore the disagreeable past between them. She did so, and rushed with a Judas kiss to embrace her fair enemy, when Miss S—t very quietly drew back and said: "Madame, you are mistaken; neither myself nor my uncle's family have ever known of your existence until this moment." The assembled guests looked astonished for a moment.

The day before her wedding a Turkish bride is taken to the bath, accompanied by all her friends, and there in solemn ceremony submitted to the ordeal of soapuds and scrubbing-brush. Her hair is made sleek with the oil of the daphne, her nails on feet and hands dyed brown with henna, and her skin Rachelled by the application of some pasty preparation. Lumps of sugar are broken over her head as a forecast of the sweets of matrimony, and when she at length emerges from the steaming chamber completely got up, she is met by a group of dancing girls, who conduct her to the banquet which closes the day's entertainment. The bridegroom, supported by his male friends and relations, has to undergo, on his side, much about the same ordeal. I was once present at one of these wedding feasts, says a writer in Truth, when the question was raised as to whether the bride and bridegroom had ever seen each other. "No, never," answered some of the old folks present.

FOR THE LITTLE ONES.

The Smiling Dolly.

I whispered to my Dolly
And told her not to tell (She's a really lovely Dolly—
Her name is Rosabel).
"Rosy," I said, "stop smiling,
For I've been dreadful bad!
You mustn't look so pleasant,
As if you felt real glad!"

"I took mamma's new ear-ring—
I did, now, Rosabel—
And I never even asked her—
Now, Rosy, don't you tell!
You see I'll try to find it
Before I let her know;
She'd feel so very sorry
To think I'd acted so."

Still Rosabel kept smiling;
And I just cried and cried—
And while I searched all over,
Her eyes were opened wide,
"Oh, Rosy, where I dropped it
I can't imagine, dear;
And still she kept on smiling—
I thought it very queer."

I had wheeled her round the garden
In her gig till I was lame;
Yet when I told my trouble
She smiled on, just the same!
Her hair waved down her shoulders
Like silk, all made of gold.
I kissed her, then I shook her,
Oh, dear, how I did scold!

"You're really naughty, Rosy,
To look so when I cry.
When my mamma's in trouble
I never laugh; not I."
And still she kept on smiling,
The queer, provoking child!
I shook her well, and told her
Her conduct drove me wild.

When—only think! that ear-ring
Fell out of Rosy's hair!
When I had dressed the darling,
I must have placed it there.
She doubled when I saw it,
And almost hit her head;
Again I whispered softly,
And this is what I said:

"You precious, precious Rosy!
Now I'll go and tell mamma
How bad I was—and sorry—
And, oh, how good you are!
For, Rose, I hadn't lost it—
You knew it all the while,
You knew I'd shake it out, dear,
And that's what made you smile."
—St. Nicholas.

The Land of Nod.

Far away in the Land of Nod,
Where only in dreams man's foot hath trod,
Dwells the Slumber King on his shadow throne,
Where he patiently sits till day is done.

Then he rises and puts his thinking cap on.
Now, as he thinks, he doth often smile,
And he busily nods his head the while;
Then the dyes of sleep, as he sees them come,
Quickly lay hold of them, one by one,
And fly to the homes of earth, 'tis said,
Where they place a nod on each one's head,
Till the eyes can no longer keep open wide;
The head with the weight turns from side to side,
And little by little doth on them creep
The wondrous blessing of quiet sleep.

But ere the grown folks find repose,
The king's son, Jack Nod, on his tip-toes,
First comes to the children, the cunning elf,
And he brings the sand-man as well as himself.

Then the poor wee people rub, rub their eyes,
Until gentle sleep takes them all by surprise,
And they never can tell of what they can think
Just a minute before their last blinky wink.

Sometimes in the daytime, so I am told,
This same Jack Nod, so cunning and bold,
Throws dust in folks' eyes, the saucy chap,
Which makes them take what is called a nap.

Manners.

I'm often quite sorry about it,
And feel that it's terribly sad,
But though I live long beyond manhood
My manners, I'm sure, will be bad.

In language I seek for improvement,
And strive to the best of my power;
And yet I am saying, they tell me,
"O jiminy!" ten times an hour.

I rush into rooms with my hat on;
I hop on one leg through the hall;
I slide down the balusters madly;
I roll round the floor like a ball.

I speak while my elders are speaking;
And—one thing that greatly annoys—
I'm apt in a general fashion
To treat girls as if they were boys.

But though I'm a boor beyond question,
And want to reform, goodness knows,
There seems to be nothing in manners
As splendid as people suppose;

For sometimes they're worn, I imagine,
To hide what we'd rather not show.
They're like a fine jacket that covers
A shirt all in tatters below.

Now, this is not my case, it's certain,
Although I'm rude, noisy, and pert:
The jacket may be very ragged,
But never you fear for the shirt!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

Mrs. Lucy Hooper, in a recent letter from Paris, says that the plot of the play called The Danicheffs is from real life, and that the heroine has recently attended several entertainments in that city "in all the brilliancy of her unfaded and wonderful beauty."

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

The event of the week has been the resumption of the Orchestral Matinées under the direction of Mr. Herold, with a very attractive programme, and—I fear—not very remunerative audience. I may be hitting very wide of the mark, but it appears to me that the unattractiveness—let me go further, and say the utterly dreary and desolate air—of Platt's Hall at a morning performance is to a certain extent responsible for the sparse attendance at these concerts; the room is as dark and chill as a subterranean cavern, and it requires somewhat of the heroic quality to sit out a Symphony in it of a cold day. I suppose the stirring Marches that Mr. Herold usually places at the commencement of his programmes to be in a sense intended to counteract this effect; they are certainly exhilarating, and serve to warm up the audience and make matters lively for a little while. But they play sad havoc with the Symphony that immediately follows, especially when this happens—as this week—to be one of the older ones, scored lightly for the brass (without trombones), and in which the charm lies rather in the beauty of the themes and their musical treatment than in effects of sonority or contrasts of tone-masses. Beethoven's fourth symphony, although not of his greatest, is undoubtedly one of his most charming works; it seems to be a loving glance backward from his second period—of which the Eroica (the third) may be classed as the first orchestral production—into that earlier style that reached its full bloom of perfection in the second symphony, in D major; it has much of the charm and grace of many of his early works, the same general characteristics of instrumental color, form, and treatment. But without the most tender handling on the part of the orchestra in matters of detail—nicety and accuracy of accent, light and shade, etc.—and the most infallible certainty on the part of the conductor in the suggestion of his tempi (especially where the character of the composition requires that they should be slightly varied), this symphony is very apt to prove wearisome and uninteresting; and this is precisely the impression I received from its performance on last Wednesday. It seems ungracious toward an artist of Mr. Herold's extensive knowledge and experience to be constantly finding fault with his tempi; it will seem, too, to many readers, like harping unnecessarily upon a matter in which there is nothing to be gained. But I cannot believe this, since it appears to me that in his faulty reading—as I consider it—of these movements Mr. Herold gives a wrong impression of them, and consequently of the entire works of which they are part. When I observe an audience unmoved during the performance of a movement at once so beautiful and soul-stirring as the wonderful Adagio in this fourth Symphony, I am convinced that there is some cause for this apathy outside of Beethoven, since what he wrote here it is impossible that mortal should hear and remain unsympathetic, if it be properly put before him. I turn to the orchestra, and the cause of the apathy is clear to me at once; the movement is being taken slightly—only slightly—too fast, and there is a sense of unequilibrium about the performance—not arising from the tempo alone, but affecting it, and causing it to appear faster than it really is—that entirely destroys the beauty of the movement, robs it of its repose, its breadth, its placid character, of everything that renders it—as it really is—one of the loveliest pieces of music that we possess. I am aware of the reasons generally given for this hurrying of slow movements: that with an orchestra not fully up to the mark it is advisable to hurry along and get over them; that they are apt to bore the audience, prove tiresome, etc. But I think this is founded upon error. It is precisely when they are hurried out of their true character that such pieces become tiresome; they are deprived of their only charm without receiving any attractive feature in return. There is a deal more to be said on this subject; let us reserve it for another occasion.

The other pièce de résistance of this interesting concert—the Ruy Blas overture had a good performance, and the stupid Horn quartet, by Schanz, a much better one than it deserved—consisted of the first three of Schumann's "Scenes from the Orient," scored for orchestra by Reinecke. The pieces are originally for the piano forte (four hands) and are quite undoubtedly not only among the best works of their composer but of any composer. I do not think I go too far in calling them the most delicate bit of local color I know in the whole range of musical literature; they are redolent of the perfume of Arabia and full of the charm of the poetry of Hafiz; they are more subtle, and at the same time more exquisitely suggestive, than anything in "Paradise and the Peri." Group together Hildebrandt's sketches, Goethe's "Divan," Rückert's "Makamen," Bodenstedt's "Mirza Schaffy," "Eothen"—in short, the best that we have of painting and literature about the Orient—and you shall not find me, out of all of it, more truthful coloring or more refined suggestion of character and sentiment than in these "sketches." It is a work about which it is difficult to speak temperately or coherently; the only language in which they can be truly described is their own. Even Reinecke's translation of them for the orchestra—beautifully done, and full of the spirit of the original, as it is—fails to convey the full charm of their subtle grace; performed as they were on Wednesday they lose it almost entirely. I do not know but it will be as well to face at once the fact that works of this nature, requiring, as they do, the most refined delicacy of treatment in regard to light and shade, tone, quality, and color, and, above all, a sympathetic appreciation of their poetic drift, are, as yet, and under the existing limitations as to rehearsals, etc., simply impossible for our orchestra, and must necessarily remain so until Mr. Herold can afford to devote more time—that is, a greater number of rehearsals—to their study and preparation. The pieces, beautiful and easy to comprehend as they are, failed to make any impression whatever on the audience; nor did I wonder at it. There is nothing to be gained by entering into details, especially as I hope that—after more rehearsals—we shall hear them again. I speak of the inadequate performance only to beg those who heard them to consider the disadvantages under which Mr. Herold labors in endeavoring to produce music of such difficulty with insufficient rehearsal, and to ask that they will suspend judgment with regard to the pieces themselves until they can hear them properly performed. Surely these "sketches" in their original piano forte, four hands—could not fail to be very interesting to our music-lovers, especially just now, that we are hearing them by the orchestra. Why should not Mr. Schmidt—as it seems to be decided that we are to have another series of soirées—incorporate them in one of his Quintet programmes, played, say, by Miss Alice, and some one of our many excellent pianists? There is something in this well worth considering, and well worth doing, too.

Among the many attractive pictures at present on exhibition at Morris & Schwab's gallery, on Post Street, there are to be seen three coast scenes, which, from their contrast of intention, as well as method and general characteristics, are especially deserving of the attention of those who are interested in these matters. They are the great canvas of De Haas—"A Storm on the Coast of Maine;" a lesser one by Yelland—"Twilight off Cape Ann;" and one still more modest, by Mr. T. R. Harrison, who makes his début as a full-fledged artist with a bit of Californian coast scenery, studied from a point near Monterey—the same picture, I believe, that gained for him the distinction of the gold medal at the late concours of the School of Design. It seems to me that we have never—certainly very rarely—had on exhibition in this city at the same time three pictures affording a more favorable opportunity for studying the varying standpoints from which scenes of great general resemblance to each other can be seen through artists' eyes, and the art feeling that lies behind them. The theme of the three is nearly identical—a bit of coast, with an open sea beyond—and yet it is hardly possible that three pictures should bear less resemblance to each other than these do. The "Storm" of De Haas is a picture of great power and a quite wonderful fidelity to a phase of nature with which I may as well, at this point, confess myself to be entirely out of sympathy. This lack of sympathy with the subject of a picture undoubtedly exerts its influence over one's capacity for appreciating its merits; certain of them are likely to be overlooked entirely, while others—often great ones to those who are in accord with the feelings of the artist—become positive defects, and cause real distress to the unsympathetic beholder. Mr. De Haas' "Storm" affects me in this way; it distresses me. But in this very effect that it has upon me I recognize a proof of its great power; it seizes upon me with an iron grasp, and turn from it as I will, it forces me back to the storm-lashed rocks and seething breakers. It compels respect, if not sympathy; it will not permit itself to be ignored. My recollection of the great "Storm" by the same artist, which was exhibited here several years since is not sufficiently accurate to enable me to compare the method of the two pictures, but this latter affects me as undeniably the greater of the two. It is simpler and broader; is made up of less material, and appears to be painted with greater power and directness of purpose. It is a great picture, although not a pleasant one.

Mr. Yelland's "Cape Ann" is, on the contrary, a thoroughly congenial and delightful work, so transfused with the spirit of rest and contentment that a mere sight of it brings refreshment to the weary sense. It seems to me that the picture can not fail to impress even the most prosaic beholder with a sentiment of perfect repose, and to one who is sympathetic with the poetic quality from which it emanated—for it is as much a poem as a picture—the spell of this sentiment is so complete and absorbing as to induce an almost perfect forgetfulness of the admirable manner in which it is painted. Out of much good work hitherto exhibited by Mr. Yelland, I think that this picture is by far the best; it is the most perfect expression of the poetry of nature—of the immense power of a mighty force at rest.

Mr. Harrison expresses what he has to say in such a frank, manly way, and with so much directness of aim, that I find it difficult to recognize in him the pupil who has but just been set free from academic tutelage. His picture has not only much of promise for the future, but also of present achievement, and bears the best evidence of close, faithful study of nature. It is, perhaps, a little cold in tone—not a bad fault in a young painter—and formal in its lines, but it is at the same time such a thoroughly healthy bit of painting, such a fresh, breezy rendering of out-of-doors, that I should be apprehensive of the least change of form or mellowing down of color, lest it should endanger the ingenuousness of the artist's statement of the fact as he saw it. This young gentleman seems to have a deal of the best stuff in him, and has in this picture given a promise of which nothing short of great work in the future will be accepted as a fulfillment. Let us see what he makes of it—for with youth and strength the matter is in his hands, whether it is to be an artist or merely a painter!

Following is the letter mentioned in another column, by a writer who no doubt thought himself more competent to deal with the subject himself:

EDS. ARGONAUT:—Will you give us an article rebuking the Protestant clergy for their abuse of the Apostle Peter. My pastor is in the habit, and it is growing upon him. Good, brave old Peter! A fifth rate attorney could successfully defend him before any military or civic court in the world. He was the only one of the Disciples who "had a bit of sand in his craw." The rest "ran like scared hounds" when the trouble commenced. All alone, and unarmed, but believing what his Leader had told him of the success that was to crown their exertions—then was the time to show fight. He disarmed an enemy, and before he was overpowered had made one furious slash at the first head that came near. Although he was outnumbered, his enemies respected him, and allowed him to retire in good order. But his Master and friend was carried off a prisoner. Did he give up the fight? No! With a bravery that has been unsurpassed in history, he followed his Leader into "the jaws of death!" He still believed that some fortuitous circumstance would occur that would, with the promised assistance, enable him to rescue his Master. He was a spy in the enemy's camp. Being there, he was warranted—under all military laws, and under the universal law of self-preservation—to use deceit to avoid detection. More than this, it was his duty, for to himself become a prisoner was not the way to be of service. It is not surprising that the Catholics exalt Peter. He is the one above all others to be intrusted with the key to the gates of heaven. PRESBYTERIAN.

THE THIRD TERM HORROR.

When I was in the city during the excitement, beating some of those fellows in the Stock Board out of their hard-earned coin, I lodged at No. 608. Next door to me, that is in No. 606, was lodged a scientific person. He wore windows on his eyes; smoked tobacco in a pipe; was a smallish man with a Prussian cast of countenance; wore a cap on his head, which cap had only one leaf—should have had two leaves, because he had some forehead behind owing to loss of hair; he went up and down stairs, to second floor, with his head poised backwardly so as to give his "specs" a chance from under his cap-leaf and to keep his pipe-bowl out of his beard; in fact, his entire countenance was beard, pipe, spectacles, and cap-leaf, with a slight dash of red nose. Thus everything about his head indicated the German scholar and Teutonic savant—a slight odor of Limburger cheese only heightening the expression of his profoundly erudite appearance. But No. 606 was not a German, yet was he erudite in a way. Upon closer examination his hands had a certain grimy and claw-like appearance, such as the gas-man and the undertakers have—chemists sometimes have such hands—but he was not a gas-man, nor a chemist, nor yet altogether an undertaker. He had a black tin sign with gold letters, down at the front hall door, and a similar sign on his room door, as follows:

No. 606.
TAXIDERMIST AND OSTEOLOGER.

Putting out from the corner front window, second floor (for his was the corner room on that floor) he had a small whale's lower jaw with a stuffed gull on one side of it, and a skeleton goose on the other, while a stuffed coon occupied the line of the symphysis murtis. These melancholy remains announced to the reading and unreading world, as it passes on the street below, that there was business up stairs.

My acquaintance with 606 was formed very slowly but surely. I wanted some stuffing done—I often do. I engaged 606 to do my stuffing. He did it. While he was at it I called in to see him several times, and by degrees, one way and another, I came to know him quite well.

"What do you have in that stout square boxing?" I asked, pointing to it, while he was twisting about at his bench, working the wire attitudes of a rare bird.

He paused in his work, directed the glitter of his spectacles toward the part of the room indicated and replied, as he resumed work:

"That's my little forge where I weld and solder my work. I keep it boxed up like a Dutch emigrant trunk so landlords won't know it, because the thing, though more innocent than a kerosene lamp, is frightful when you call it a forge."

"How large iron or steel can you weld in your forge?"

"About half inch."

"You don't often need to weld that size?"

"Yes I do, though."

Oh, ho! thought I, skeleton keys and burglars' tools—but I only drew my ring of keys from my pocket and asked.

"Do you ever mend keys?"

"Mend keys? Oh, yes—sometimes."

I was going to give him a cracked key and ask him to mend it, but I took a second thought and put the ring in my pocket; if he made keys for burglars the fewer he had of mine the better for me. He went on with his work, and nothing more was said till I asked: "What do you keep in that tall box which stands on end in the dark corner?"

He stopped his work, began refilling his pipe, while he looked at the tall box.

"No!" he said, as he struck a match across the table corner, "I'll not tell you what's in that tall box—ask me something else;" and, putting his pipe to his mouth, went on with his regular work and smoke.

I took a smoke, also, and sat silently watching, as he worked, for some time.

At length he flung the point of the tool he was using into the board his work was on, and said: "Yes, I will;" and, walking over to the room door, he turned the key in the lock; then, coming back to his seat, he added: "On one condition I will tell you all about what is in the tall box over there."

"Name the condition."

"But hold!—first, are you in favor of third terms for President of the United States of America?"

"I am. I'm in favor of whatever comes to pass, because I find it useless to oppose anything; if it ain't to be it won't, or, if it is to be, you can't stop it. Everything that is inevitable, or it would not be."

"That last remark settles it," he said, jumping up with excitement and slapping me gently on the back; "I'll tell you anything you want to know, on condition that you repeat it to the first newspaper man you meet."

"I'll do it," said I, shaking hands with him.

"All right," said he, and he threw back his shoulders to bring his head-lights to bear on my face, and he was going to proceed when I held my hand up before my face, exclaiming:

"Take off those d—d specs."

"My dear sir," he said gently, "I could not do that. You pluck out mine eyes to say so."

"Go ahead, then, specs and all, if it kills me."

"You remember," said 606, "that some years ago there was a great hue and cry about the desecration of the tomb of Mr. Lincoln, the martyred President?"

"I do, I confess it." Because under the glare and glitter of those spectacles I would confess anything.

"Well, they said, the papers did, that Mr. Lincoln's remains were not taken from his tomb. The papers were mistaken, as usual. That is Mr. Lincoln over there in the tall box."

"What!!" I fairly yelled, as the malign light of the spectacles danced like a whirling chromotrope.

"Aye, I will show you."

"O Lord! No, don't—please don't."

"Why! are you a calf?"

"No, sir—oh, no—I'm only a bull—I mean I'm a bear—I don't know what I do mean."

"Well, then stop that shouting, or, there will be another martyr in this room. Sabe?"

FASHIONS IN FINERY.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—It is decreed that there shall be no more promenading through square dances, cotillions, quadrilles, and the like, with an accompaniment of a running fire of conversation permitted between partners, but that we must return to the manners of our ancestors, at least in the dance, and do our "steps" according to rule. I fancy it will be very nice, and will have two or three good effects, not the least of which will be that only those who really know how to dance will dare make the attempt in public, and there will be considerably less blundering; hence the performance to onlookers will be decidedly more agreeable, though the list of "wall flowers" may be greatly increased thereby. Round dances, too, will materially decrease in favor, and the new waltz, "The Wave," just now vexing the souls of virtuous Washington correspondents, will drop out of sight in company with its kindred abomination, the "Boston Dip," when the stately Roger de Coverly takes the floor. I can not quite agree with Mrs. Sherman in her diatribes against dancing, but it does seem to me that the graceful and dignified waltz has been infinitely degraded by the so-called improvements of the past few years. In the same connection, I see it is predicted that short ball dresses will also be en vogue, as it will be impossible to execute the newly-revived dances with the present burden of dry goods. The distance between the picturesque costumes of our great-grandmothers' youthful days and our own is every day growing less, and we may soon look for a return to quilted petticoats, bouffant overdresses, and stately stomachers of a hundred years ago. The panier is steadily gaining ground, and bids fair to supersede entirely the hideously straight-seamed garments of the past two years. Ball dresses, particularly for young ladies, are much worn with a long point at the back, and a plaited front, the necks being cut low, either round or square over the shoulders. In garnitures, white lace is all popular, the newest method of employing it being to lay it flat on the dress, either edge upward, according to fancy, so as to resemble embroidery. In fact, it is used in every conceivable way, on all sort of materials, and on all occasions—black being out of favor except for very old ladies. Were I a spiteful masculine chronicler, I should probably add that, "there being no longer any old ladies in society, the trimming alluded to is no longer seen." Chemille embroidery on garments, or combined with seed pearls and gold and silver thread, on a lace foundation, is the most elegant of the lighter trimmings, though marabout fringes, in black, white, and every other color, as it is now made, and the once popular swansdown, revived, are also à la mode, being very stylish and suitable for the rich goods so profusely used. Speaking of laces, I hope to find some of the Genoese Point, so much admired at the East, in our own market before the season is over. Breton lace, another new favorite, is described as being a bobbinet imitation of Mechlin, one marked difference being that instead of being finished on the edge by scallops, it is either edged with small "saw-teeth," or the purll edge maintains a straight outline. Something still prettier is lace that has the veins or outlines of the pattern marked by beads or floss; the iridescent beads are suggested as being specially suited for this purpose. Expensive laces are not so well adapted for this style of ornamentation as the more moderate priced, as the weight of the beads is likely to break the delicate mesh, and effect irreparable injury. For party wear, slippers and other shoes are invariably of the same color and shade as the dress, and are ornamented with buckles or buttons of the Rhine quartz, or else tiny bouquets of suitable flowers. Hosiery in corresponding shades is the correct thing. Evening gloves are still the "Provost," or side-cut, which are found to be unsurpassed in excellence of shape and fit. Four to ten buttons are the fashionable limits. For street wear undressed kid, of roasted coffee color, are the favorites, and white, in the same style, for mourning. Lambkin, an American article, is said to be an excellent quality for everyday wear, and is, moreover, cheap. Foot-wear does not change much at this season. The most popular shoes are the side-button, made of kid the prevailing color of the suit and the uppers of the material itself, which settles the fact of the continuance of the combination costume for the street for some months to come at least. The possibilities of this style are so varied, I wonder the fickle goddess herself does not declare in its favor as a perpetuity. Another goodly fashion is the polonaise, that is still faithful through all the varying years. It is so easy to make, looks well made of pretty much anything, is so obliging in the matter of trimming and drapery, and, like charity, "covers a multitude of sins" in the way of half worn underskirts, otherwise useless. A handsome walking suit is made by combining the jacket, bodice, and vest styles with a slightly bouffant overskirt, drawn back, not too tightly, over an underskirt finished with a deep kilt. But is not this simply perfect—a plum-colored cashmere, having a kilt plaited skirt headed by a band of the same in double box plaits, a long, tight-fitting sacque lined with dark fur, say a seal skin, the only ornaments large fur buttons and loops, collar and cuffs of fur? Fur has never been more fashionable than it is this winter; even the coon skin, with us in America associated with the corncake and the cotton-field of Southern negro life, is utilized, having been advanced to a social position second only to the lynx, fox, and sealskin. A new and expensive fur, the Russian cat, is being patronized by those whose pocketbooks will permit the extravagance. I am assured by one of the leading fur dealers in this city that the finer qualities of sealskin have never been so low priced as at present, and—mark this, ye who are yearning after that convenient article of dress—will not, for some years to come, be as reasonable as now. The lighter and more fluffy kinds of fur are largely used for indoor trimmings, wrappers, etc., being furnished with cuffs and collars, and toilet slippers of velvet being bordered to match. It will be a wonder if the present severe winter at the East has not brought back the comfortable and becoming sealskin hoods of fifteen years or so ago. To fulfil its intention, a bonnet should be of only two shapes: the close, hood-shaped, covering the vital points at the back of the neck and the ears, in winter, and a broad brimmed hat, that shades the same parts, in summer. But, alas! things are as they are, in this world, and not as they ought to be. There are, to-day, over seventy-five varieties of the genus flat, and not one in danger of being called perfect, though some are very pretty, notably a style that is a modification of the Gainsborough, that depends on the lavish use of glossy black ostrich tips for its distinguishing feature; and its opposite, a very small, round crown bonnet, that comes well down to the ears, and has a simple ruching of the material plaited up in front. The most modern is one as yet unnamed, high, and narrow across the back, which is finished by a band only, with a brim not worth mentioning, worn close to the head, and a high crown, on which the trimming is massed—altogether a revival, in a mild way, of the fashion of '76 at least. From head coverings to heads themselves is a natural transition. What between bonnets and coiffures, the outside of the average feminine head gives its owner a deal more trouble and thought to garnish than does the inside. Of the two extremes in hairdressing, the latest is that which demands that the hair be laid flat against the back of the head and neck in braids of many strands, held down by ornamental pins, beetles, and what not. This is called according to your ruling fancy, either Egyptian, Japonaise, Chinoise, or by the general term "Oriental." If the fancy runs to any great extreme, we shall doubtless see our belles promenading Kearny Street, six months from now, bonnetless, à la Chinatown; for no civilized milliner can be found to construct a suitable covering for the multitude of skewers and ear flaps that will be sure to follow this beginning. In the opposite extreme, the dressing of the hair high on the head—a fashion now seven years old—there are several pretty modifications. One, the plaiting of the braid in two loops, each of five strands, which are looped crosswise on top, the front hair crimped slightly or woven in water scallops. Crown braids are very fashionable, and deservedly so, as they can be so readily adapted to different styles of face; light, fluffy braids being most suitable to short persons, and heavy, smooth ones to taller. Crown braids permanently crimped and plaited may be had anywhere for $20. It is known as the Psyche coiffure when it has the addition of two short curls at the nape of the neck. In the place of the long-used ginger puffs are now bows or loops of the hair. Sometimes a tuft of short crêpe-cour curls is used to fill in the centre of the crown braid. Short, flat curls, made by rolling the hair in a bit of tissue paper and pressing it with flat-irons, are very much worn by young ladies, and are exceedingly becoming to those of advanced years when the face has grown thin or is naturally of the oval type. For full dress all fashions seem to be wrought together, the result being a combination which, an irreverent friend suggests, could be worshiped without breaking the commandment, as it is the "likeness of nothing in heaven above nor the earth beneath." With every style it is impossible to have too much ornamentation—combs, pins, slides, swords, arrows, daggers, lizards, etc. Only for very young girls are the simpler styles yet retained, the principal of these being two long braids, the ends fluffed out about two inches up and tied with bright ribbons. One long, heavy braid to be brought carelessly forward over the left shoulder, after the manner of Nilsson's "Marguerite," is another pretty fashion. This may be further added to by small flowers studding its entire length, deep red or golden hued blossoms being most suitable for dark locks, and white ones for blonde hair. If a braid is added to the crown a small wreath of the same is worn round it. Of course, the character of this depends on the mode of wearing the shoulder braid. The Marie Antoinette switches you see mentioned are woven with silk and mounted on six fine silk cords to be plaited in the stylish chataine braids now worn. There is a pleasant precedent for some of our stores to follow. A Philadelphia house has fitted up a room, well equipped with rocking-horses and other juvenile delights, where mothers may leave their little ones during a day's shopping. Some of our flourishing establishments, particularly those having a large counter trade, would, I should think, find this a matter of more profit than expense, and at the same time call down upon their efforts the blessings of scores of tired mothers and wearied little ones.

LILLIAS DUBOIS.

"Quaint and Curious Volumes."

A lady correspondent (E. O. N. E.) writes us as follows from New York:

"Yesterday I visited the Lenox Library, but did not pass beyond the wonderful old books which it contains. The 'Mazarine Bible,' the first printed book, is there in all its glory. It was done at Mentz between 1450 and 1455 by Gutenberg and Fust. The illuminations, in blue and scarlet, are as fresh as if but just painted. Next comes a Latin Bible, the sixth dated book, and the first edition which contains the name of the printer and the place and year of its execution. I was particularly interested in a copy of the sacred volume printed at Nuremberg in 1477, which contained commentaries, emendations, and interlineations in the autograph of the gentle and sainted Philip Melancthon. His dainty, Greek-looking manuscript, almost blotless, was as fascinating as the marvelous illuminations with which it abounded. Then there were two precious leaves of the 'History of Troy,' the work of William Caxton, and the first book ever printed in English. Its date is 1474. 'Tyndall's New Testament,' the first part of the Bible printed in English, lay near. 'Coverdale's Bible,' the first complete copy of the word of God in English, with its delightfully clear print, must not be forgotten. The first edition of King James' Bible, date 1611, is in the library. I must mention the 'Wicked Bible,' where the not is omitted in the fourteenth verse of the twentieth chapter of Exodus. The inconvenient little negative was removed by the naughty wife of the printer, one night when everybody else was asleep, and a whole edition struck off before the sacrilege was discovered. They tried to destroy all the copies, but a few escaped the hangman's search. The poor little woman paid dearly for her foolish joke, by the terrible fire-death of that terrible period. The 'Greek Gospels' in manuscript, on paper of the twelfth century, were exquisitely written, and made one sigh to think that so dainty a fashion had passed away. Still more delicious was the Latin Vulgate, on vellum, of the fourteenth century. The marvelous colors of the initial letters absolutely seemed translucent, they shone with such a living luster. The exquisite beauty of the miniatures set between the wide columns of that wonderful penmanship is indescribable. The dead gold, the effably tender blues, the flaming carmines, and the variously unimaginably lovely; the very rainbow itself unbraided to produce them.

I looked for his eyes, and sabed immediately.

"Now keep still and I will tell you. Not from any disrespect for Mr. Lincoln did this thing occur; quite the contrary. I loved the man, and twice voted for him. We did not get him the first time, nor the second time we attempted it; but we did get him, and we left another set of lengthy bones in his place."

"Who's we?" I asked.

"Myself and Dr. Crow, acting on behalf of the Third Term Association, G. A. R."

"Ah, just so."

"Our object is patriotic. We wish to preserve the republic. In fact, our watchword is 'Vive la République.' We saw there was no hope of any more talent combined with virtue in the party for which Mr. Lincoln sacrificed himself, and we early concluded once more to give the old man a chance. I was deputed to prepare him for presentation to the people. First I was ordered to take him on a trip to the various courts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and around the world; but on further consideration I convinced my confederates that such a course would look too much like a mercenary theatric display hence; we abandoned that plan. Then I was ordered to bring him to this coast, and have him prepared for a grand trans-continental tour just prior to the nominating conventions in 1880. I am proud to say"—and he threw himself into a defiant attitude, smiting his chest with a sonorous blow—"that we are ready for the grand spectacle."

"Hurrah for Lincoln!" I shouted on the spur of the moment, and began singing—

"We are coming, father Abram, six hundred thousand more."

"Stop that d—d racket!" I shouted 606.

"I can't," says I; "memory rushes upon me with the 'Old Glory' waving to the breeze."

"Tramp, tramp, tramp,
The boys are marching."

"If you don't stop that music I'll—"

"John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave,"

I sang, waving my hat with growing excitement.

"Stop it," roared 606, catching me by the collar.

I stopped it.

"Now let me show you," as he stepped over and opened the door of the tall box in the corner of the room. "You see, I have fixed this sacred relic of the Republic in such a way that he can sit or stand, but he can not walk. Very good; nobody wants him to walk. Also, he can shake hands and nod his head. He can make a speech, yet not such a plain, kind-hearted, human speech as he once could make, but still about as good a speech as other candidates for the high office have made. Listen:—"

"Fellow-citizens, this is the first time I was ever in this beautiful place. I shall come here often if I get the chance. I thank you all for this hearty reception."

"There, you see, that is the internal working of Edison's invention. I found an Illinois clergyman who has a voice like the deceased, and I got him to do a set of speeches for the phonograph. This is a grand idea—a sort of special providence—for no living man can do anything with our party since it fell into the field of small potatoes. At the proper time we shall charter a train of overland palace cars, send for Schuyler Colfax, Babcock, Pomeroy, James G. Blaine, B. F. Butler, Williams of Oregon, Carr, Sargent, and a host of other deceased and disappointed statesmen. These we will surround by the whisky ring, the land ring, the mail ring, and all other rings—"

"Stop, stop right there!" I exclaimed. "Can you keep Mr. Lincoln's bones quiet in such company?" There was a power of honest indignation in the old man.

"Pshaw! the excitement will carry everything. There will be a grand Pacific Slope 'ovation,' old memories will revive, the bloody chasm will yawn anew in the red light of history, the colored troops will fight nobly; step by step, eye to eye, foot to foot we will once more put down the rebellion, make treason odious, issue greenbacks and bonds by the ton-load, steal them by the armful, point to the glorious record, and preserve the best government God ever made."

"Three cheers! Yi-yi-yi!" I shouted, rushing fearlessly up to shake hands with Mr. Lincoln; but, I added, thoughtfully: "Will Kearney and the sand-pipers support this thing?"

"Certainly; they always go for Bones."

J. W. G.

The third of the Assemblies at Steinway Hall will take place on Tuesday evening next. The managers affirm that the society reporters of several daily and weekly papers have erred in stating that the invitations were controlled by the patronesses; the invitation list was made and controlled entirely by them. As a successful German is an impossibility where the number of dancers exceeds one hundred, the invitations were necessarily limited. The Assemblies are not, as some may suppose, a series of club parties, but are strictly private parties, given by the managers, who invited a certain number of gentlemen to subscribe for the series. The subscription entitles them to equal privileges, leaving the control with the managers, who incur the responsibilities. As the first two Assemblies were thoroughly enjoyed by the subscribers, expressions of dissatisfaction are asserted by the managers to emanate from persons who were intentionally excluded.

The California Horticulturist appears to have taken a new hold on life, and is now a really useful and entertaining monthly under the editorial management of Mr. Charles H. Shinn. We are rather glad to observe these signs of prosperity in a publication belonging to Mr. Carmany: it dispels a deucedly uncomfortable faith in the justice of temporal rewards and punishments. If Carmany is permitted to prosper we think we shall pull through somehow.

During twenty-six years of active practice at the bar of San Francisco, the writer of this paragraph was never but twice consulted—professionally—in reference to domestic difficulties between married Israelites, and neither of those cases resulted in divorce.

The man who tries to build a fire with wet wood acts in a damp fuel-ish manner.

THE FOOT-HILLS OF THE SIERRA.

Geological Formation.—The western base of the Sierra Nevada bordering the Sacramento valley is known in this State as the foot-hill region. These foot-hills extend from Redding, at the northern end of the valley, to Caliente, at the southern extremity, a distance of three hundred and fifty miles. I am indebted to Mr. A. Bowman, formerly of the State Geological Survey, for the following description of the formation of this portion of the State. He says: "Generally speaking, there are gradually rising low outliers of upper tertiary gravels, sands, and clays all along the western base of the Sierra. They are often capped by volcanic matter, and cut through by erosions—the dry, winding arroyos through the flatish hills that are familiar to every one who has followed along the edge of the Sacramento and San Joaquin plains. These erosions in some places cut down into the middle tertiary, and even into the cretaceous beds; but there is little surface area of the latter. On the plains all is covered up by the recent deposits. Patches occur of middle tertiary and upper tertiary, where denudation has removed great masses of tertiary country, with these exceptions: for example, at Millerton, on both sides of the San Joaquin, a patch of middle tertiary hills about three by ten miles is seen, and at Ione valley, several miles square of steep hills of this period are laid down in slightly pitching beds. The tertiary formations reach away up into the Sierra, in the shape of ancient river deposits. They change at from 300 to 1,500 feet altitude into fluvial deposits; although a large portion of the plains, tertiary to below the present sea level, is also fluvial, interbedded with lacustrine or marine, sometimes apparently in alternate order. The surface areas may be said to change, going eastward, from recent to upper tertiary (pliocene) as the soil belongs above or below the volcanic outflow; and then to the slate and granite formations of the Sierra, extending to the summit. The cretaceous formation shows scarcely any surface area along the base of the Sierra except in Shasta County, although from Folsom north the ravines and canyons expose its edges; especially north of Oroville. At Reading's ranch, and from there north to Pit River, the flat country is all cretaceous, the tertiary being mostly removed by denudation. The same is true of patches between there and Oroville. The patch between Fort Reading and Pit River is about twenty miles square. The foot-hill cretaceous of Butte and Shasta counties is overlaid by the Shasta coal measures which are, I think, middle or upper tertiary; and these again by the upper tertiary formation of the ancient river gravel period, and by the volcanic outflows from the Lassen volcanic chain. No cretaceous rocks have been identified intermediate between Folsom and Tejon Pass. Lithologically the cretaceous beds are much more silicified and compacted than the tertiary. They are the shales and conglomerates found in these regions, while the tertiary are often loose and fragile, and scarcely worthy of classification in the harder category. Both are very regularly bedded and only moderately tilted here; while on the opposite side of the valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin they are both tilted and altered—remarkably so in comparison with those on the east side, and in proportion to their age, generally speaking. The older rock formations of the Sierra foot-hills are, in the main, granites south of Fresno River, and slates north. The slate region contains patches of granite often several miles square, and there is between Folsom and the Central Pacific Railroad a larger patch, eight or ten miles square at the least, extending from the valley to near Auburn. The granite region at the south has also patches of slate. Opposite Visalia, at the edge of the valley, are two isolated patches ten by twelve and ten by fifteen miles. It remains only to trace the boundary between the slate north of Fresno River and the tertiary of the valley. Along the line, beginning at the south, are the Buchanan copper mine, Indian Gulch, and Spellings, near the western Mariposa County line; Lagrange, Knight's Ferry, near the Tuolumne line; Telegraph City, Campo Seco, Michigan Bar, and Mormon Island, near the edge of Calaveras, Amador, and El Dorado—in short, a line separating these mountain counties from the valley counties, or very nearly. Further north the framers of the counties did not study the soil. In Placer County, Rocklin on the west and Auburn on the east mark the granite limits; and from there north in Yuba to Oroville in Butte County, the first steep foot-hills of the Sierra are of the slate formation. The flat-bedded, unaltered formations of the foot-hills, described as upper tertiary, rise to very different altitudes in different places. The Oroville Cherokee mesa is, if I remember aright, considerably over one thousand feet above the sea at the Cherokee end. Similar isolated middle and upper tertiary (miocene and pliocene) hills are found left in remnants all along the base of the Sierra south of Oroville, while to the north they are plastered up against the Sierra with a cretaceous base, and preserved by a volcanic capping covering nearly the whole country. The slates and granites extend to the summit of the Sierra, the line between the granites of the south and the slates of the north running slantingly from the point mentioned on Fresno River through the heart of Mariposa County toward Lake Tahoe, in a tolerably direct line."

Climate.—From Redding in the northern end to Sumner at its southern extremity, as has been stated, is a distance of 350 miles. The mean annual average temperature of Redding is 64.15 deg. The lowest point to which the thermometer has fallen since a record has been kept was 27 deg. in December, 1876. Its annual average rainfall is 48.05 inches. Sumner, at the southern end of the valley, has an annual average temperature of 68.29 deg., and an average rainfall of 4 inches. The lowest point to which the thermometer has fallen at this place was also 27 deg., on the same day in December, 1876. There is a remarkable uniformity in the climate throughout the Sacramento Valley. In a difference of five degrees of latitude, between 35 deg. 30 min. and 40 deg. 30 min. only lowers the annual average temperature 4.15 deg. The difference of the annual average temperature between corresponding degrees of latitude in the Atlantic States at an equal distance from the ocean is more than eight degrees. It has been found that the foot hills of the Sierra, up to a height of about 2,500 feet, have apparently the same temperature as places in the valley having the same latitude. It has also been found that with increased latitude there is an increase of rainfall over those places in the valley having the same latitude as, for illustration, Sacramento with an elevation above the sea of 30 feet has an annual mean temperature of 60.48 deg., and an average fall of rain of 18.25 inches, while Colfax, with an elevation of 2,421 feet, has an annual mean temperature of 60.05 deg., and an average annual rainfall of 42.72 inches. This uniformity of temperature and increase of rainfall appears to be the law throughout the whole extent of the foot-hills of the Sierra, with the variation as relates to temperature, namely, as latitude is decreased the temperature of the valley is continued to a proportionally greater elevation. To illustrate, approximately, if the temperature of Redding at the northern end of the valley is continued up the foot-hills to a height of 2,000 feet, then the temperature of Sacramento in the centre of the valley would be continued up to 2,500 feet, and that of Sumner in the extreme southern end of the valley up to 3,000 feet. The increase of rainfall on the foot-hills in the latitude of Sacramento, due to elevation, is about one inch to each 100 feet. South from Sacramento the proportion decreases until at Sumner the increase due to elevation is but half an inch to each 100 feet. This is shown by the record kept at Fort Tejon in the Tehachapi Mountains, near Sumner, at an elevation of 3,240 feet, where the annual rainfall is 19.53 inches. There is no record kept at any point in the hills above Redding, but probably in this latitude the increase due to elevation is about one and a half inches to each 100 feet. The increase of precipitation on the hills at the northern end of the valley gives greater density to the forests, and permits them to grow at lower elevations than in the southern end of the valley. At the same time the difference in temperature is so small that the character of the vegetation of the hills at each end of the valley is not dissimilar. The trees that are found in the vicinity of Redding, at the northern end of the valley, below an elevation of 500 feet, are not found at the southern end until we pass Caliente at an elevation of 1,300 feet. It would seem that the temperature of the valley prevails up the Sierra to an elevation that equals the average height of the Coast Range of mountains. If a line were drawn parallel to the surface of the ocean from the top of the Coast Range east until it met the flanks of the Sierra, it would mark a level on the Sierra below which the temperature would not materially differ from that in the Sacramento Valley. This fact is probably to be ascribed to the prevailing southwest return trade wind which blows over the State from the ocean for more than 300 days in the year. Passing the summits of the Coast Range but small portions descend into the valley; the remainder reach the sides of the Sierra at about the level of the summits they have passed.

Arboreal Vegetation.—At the northern end of the valley, at an elevation of 500 feet above the sea, of the California oaks are found Quercus lobata, Sonomeis chrysolophis, and Wiskenii; of pines, only the nut or Digger pine (Pinus Sabiniana); the buckeye (Esculus Californica), and chemical (Adenostoma fasciculata). This is the characteristic arboreal vegetation throughout all these 350 miles. Its presence everywhere shows increased rainfall over the valley and similarity of temperature to that of the valley. Our pasture oak (Quercus lobata) is found at lower elevations, in the valley, but always on moist land or near river courses, proving that it demands, in addition to temperature, the increased moisture. In the southern end of the valley this vegetation prevails at higher elevations, because it there finds the proper temperature and moisture. Wherever on the foot-hills any of the trees named constitute the predominant arboreal vegetation, it is evidence that the temperature is the same as that of the valley, and that plants that can be successfully grown in the valley can be grown to as high an elevation on the hills as these trees abound. If one tree were to be taken as the evidence of this uniformity of temperature it would be Sabin's (the nut, or Digger) pine. It is never seen in the valley or on the hills below an elevation of about 400 feet. It is not found at a higher elevation than that in which the temperature is the same as that of the valley. It is never found in groves, but singly among other trees, yet it prevails throughout these 350 miles of foot-hills. While the vegetation is more dense on the hills at the northern end of the valley, due to increased precipitation, there are also local differences—where there is similarity of soil—due to exposure. Throughout all the lower hills the greatest number of trees is found on gently sloping eastern, northeastern, and northern hillsides, which necessarily are more moist and cool. The southern aspects contain less trees because exposed to the direct rays of the sun and to the full force of the prevailing winds.

Area of Foot-hill Region.—On the line of the Central Pacific Railroad the foot hills commence at Roseville, which has an elevation of 163 feet. From this point to Colfax—elevation, 2,421 feet—in a direct line is a distance of 32 miles. To allow for all possible errors it would be safe to estimate that the width of the foot-hills, where the valley temperature prevails, is 20 miles. This region, therefore, embraces a tract of country from Redding to Sumner, 350 miles long and 20 miles wide, or 4,480,000 acres. The principal towns in this part of the State are Oroville, Nevada, Grass Valley, Colfax, Auburn, New Castle, Georgetown, Placerville, Colma, Jackson, Sonora, Columbia, Mariposa, and Havilah. In the vicinity of these towns, and also near the line of the Central Pacific Railroad, the land is occupied by settlers. It would be using a large figure to state that a half million acres of these foot-hills have been preempted. If we estimate that another million is composed of lands granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, ravines, river beds, and lands too rocky or precipitous for cultivation, there would remain nearly 3,000,000 acres of land, all of it timbered, all having abundant rainfall, in a semi-tropical climate, and to which title in 160-acre tracts can be acquired by settlement and complying with the rules of the United States Land Department. Throughout the whole region ever living springs are numerous; and in those parts where there has been placer mining there are many canals from which water by purchase can be obtained for irrigation. The immense precipitation that takes place during the rainy season along the western face of the Sierra passes through this region in streams that are tributaries to the Sacramento and San Joaquin. Within this distance there are fifty-four of these principal streams, whose waters are perpetually adding to the volume of the Sacramento and San Joaquin.

Adaptation to Cultivation.—Every agricultural product that can be grown in the valleys, including the semi-tropical fruits, can be grown with equal facility in these foot-hills.

Ordinarily the land has to be cleared of the trees found upon it, and cultivation must be continuous, for on the whole western face of the Sierra the native trees, when cut or burned down, are rapidly replaced by a new growth of the same kinds. These lands are found to have all of the requisites for the successful growth of orchards. Fruit trees thrive better upon them than on the lands of the valley. None of the many theories advanced as to the cause of the treeless condition of many plains and prairies having ample rainfall seem to be entirely satisfactory, but experience has demonstrated that orchards grow best and thrive with less artificial aid on lands that in a natural condition are covered with trees. The increasing exports of small fruits, such as strawberries, blackberries, and raspberries, from the vicinity of New Castle and Auburn, and their superior size and quality, prove that this region is better adapted to their culture than any place yet found on the level lands of the valley. The peaches of Coloma have a State reputation for flavor and size. The apples of Nevada and Georgetown are equal in size, taste, and keeping qualities to the best imported from Oregon. The Oroville oranges have been pronounced equal to the best Los Angeles. The vine grows with luxuriance and bears abundantly wherever it has been planted throughout all this region. The wines of Coloma have more than a local reputation. Persons competent to judge assert that wine from grapes grown on the foot-hills is free from the earthy taste that characterizes much of the wine of the flat land of the valleys. They also express the belief that if ever wine is to be made in California as light as that from the Rhine, and as free from alcohol, the grapes will be grown in the higher elevations of the foot-hills, where snow falls and remains on the ground a few weeks each season. It is said that the long summers and great heat of the valleys develop the saccharine matter in the grape, which by fermentation is converted into alcohol.

The Lands Open to Settlement.—There is but one Spanish grant in all this region, the Fremont grant, in Mariposa. The land, therefore, can only be obtained from the Government in tracts of eighty and one hundred and sixty acres. A monopoly of the land in large estates is consequently impossible. The character of the country being of rolling and rounded hills prevents the possibility of very large farms. Experiments have shown that the soil is more productive than the dry plains of the valley, but of course it does not yield crops as largely as the deltas and bottom lands of the rivers. It is certainly better and more productive than lands similarly situated in France, Switzerland, and Italy, which now sustain a population of millions. Wood is everywhere to be found, and in this region north of Oroville there is an abundance of water in the streams and springs not yet appropriated. These lands have remained open for settlement because, up to the present time, sufficient Government land could be found in the valleys. The legislation by Congress has been, and still is, unfavorable to their appropriation for agriculture. The river bars and benches of this region originally contained the placer gold mines. Positive legislation by Congress forbade their survey for many years after the State was admitted into the Union. When surveys were ordered the Land Department at Washington was so fearful that they would be occupied by farmers to the injury of the miners that more than one million acres were reserved as mineral land. The placer mines of these foot-hills have ceased to yield gold even at Chinese wages for the past ten years, yet the Land Department at Washington continues the mineral reservation on these lands. The effect of this is to increase the expense of obtaining title from the Government, and thereby the settlement of this region has been retarded. Where a farmer settles on land that has been reserved as mineral by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the expense has to be borne by the settlers of showing by testimony that his farm contains no mines, and that it is only valuable for agriculture. There are two million acres of these lands on which there is no mineral reservation, and which can be obtained by homestead and preemption as cheaply as were the lands in the valley. It can not be but a few years before the unwise policy of reserving lands as mineral, that in fact are not mineral, will be abandoned, so that these lands can be obtained by settlement, preemption, and homestead as cheaply as other lands. As I have shown, there are more than three million acres of these lands open to settlement—fallow from the flood—waiting for occupants; capable of supporting a population of a hundred thousand people, if they will but cultivate them; situated in a semi-tropical climate, and in all the higher regions free from miasma. One need not be a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, to foretell that before many years the agriculture of California will become varied, and cultivation will not be confined to one cereal. Then the foot-hill region of the Sierra will be occupied by a prosperous and happy rural population.

B. B. REDDING.

"Well, old fellow, how goes it?" said kindly the visitor to the invalid, who, extended stiffly on his right side, gazed feebly at him and replied with difficulty:

"Pretty badly."

"Pretty badly, eh? Well, that's bad, but I hope it isn't so bad after all. Have you up again throwing back somersaults, and walking a thousand miles in a thousand hours in less than no time?"

"Oh, no; the doctor says my case is very critical; in fact, when he went out, half an hour ago, he told me to remain lying in this position, for if I should turn over on my left side I'd die instantly."

"Oh, bosh!"

"I tell you that's precisely what he said."

"He didn't mean it."

"Don't you believe I'm as sick as that?"

"No, really, I think he's exaggerating."

"Then I'll prove it to you." (Turns over on his left side and dies triumphantly.)

When General McClellan reads about Dr. Schliemann's excavation and what he is digging up, he turns green with envy as he thinks what he might have done had he gone over that ground for one campaign with the army of the Potomac.

Action is eloquence, and the eyes of the ignorant are more learned than their ears.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, {
 FRED. M. SOMERS, { Editors.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1879.

The formation of a "Real Estate Landlords' and Tenants' Association" is a most wise and prudent movement. We can see that great good may be accomplished by such an organization. The following gentlemen are named as directors, and we can not say that there is an objectionable name in the entire list; they are, we believe, without exception, most excellent citizens, active business men, and large property owners. The curious fact in connection with the thirteen persons named is that there is only one American-born citizen, so far as we know. The selection of so many foreigners is undoubtedly due to accident, and we call attention to this fact only because it is a curious one: John Center, Scotch; Charles Mayne, French; Theodore LeRoy, French; J. L. Moody, unknown; L. Sachs, Jewish; N. Van Bergen, German; George W. Grannis, American; J. M. Byrne, Irish; Levi Strauss, Jewish; Claus Spreckles, German; M. P. Jones, English; James R. Kelley, Irish; James Irvine, Scotch. The association has, by strong resolutions, declared itself non-political. This is just what it ought not to have done. Real estate values are suffering from but one cause, and that is alone attributable to political mismanagement. High taxes are the cause of depreciated values. Political stealing and political extravagance of administration are what's the matter. This association ought to be political, and ought boldly to avow its object to be the correction of political abuses, and the reform of the city and State government in the direction of economy. We would suggest arresting the two mistakes; first, by adding to the committee the names of thirteen Americans; second, the prompt repeal of the non-political resolution, and the passage, in its place, of one declaring that the object of the association is to protect real estate and reduce taxation. Let it be anything and everything necessary to bring about the result of honest government. Let the qualification of membership be the ownership of real estate. Let the objects of the association, to wit: reduced taxation, economy of expenditure, and improvement of real estate values, be brought about by every honorable and effective means. If there are members who think this result can be attained by prayer, let a committee be appointed to pray for the thieving politicians, and wrestle with the Throne of Grace to save us from the Street Department; another which shall supplicate the Divine Power to prevent the School Directors from throwing away half a million of dollars in the vain attempt to defeat God's providence by so over-educating stupid boys and girls that they are ashamed of their fathers and mothers and their occupations, and become worthless hoodlums and good-for-nothing lawyers, brokers, and politicians. Every member of the association ought to be a politician of the most active and lively kind. It ought to be a cardinal principle that every member should attend primary elections, all party conventions, get into all the nominating caucuses, go to the Assembly, Board of Supervisors, and Board of Education. It ought to be the dominant, controlling, and most influential of all parties, holding the balance of power between Republicans and Democrats, having enrolled among its members every workingman and mechanic that has a homestead or ever expects to have one. Every savings bank depositor who has money invested in real estate should be eligible to membership; every Republican, Democrat, Protestant, Jew, Catholic, Dunker, Hardshell Baptist, or Mormon who owns real estate should be taken into fellowship.

This association, or political party, ought to become a fixed and permanent power—a political, ecclesiastical, and social power. Women and non-voting foreigners should be eligible to membership. It should have permanent rooms, with one or more capable men as salaried officials belonging to it. It should have a council composed of able men to sit as a deliberative body to consider all questions touching the interest of real estate. It should keep retained the best and ablest lawyers. It should keep a pack of bloodhounds, keen of scent and quick of foot, to get on the track and hunt to the death with bloody fangs every dishonest political party thief, contractor, and ring plunderer that lives by stealing from the tax-payer. It should elect the Superintendent of Streets, Assessor, Tax Collector, Auditor, Attorney, Recorder, Supervisors, and Board of Education from its own members; should be a committee of the whole sitting in secret executive session to spy out, detect, correct, and punish every man who transgresses in the direction of real property. It should take charge of this question of bad gas, should control water legislation, and, if deemed best, should purchase the Spring Valley Water Company's works and regulate the rates. It should control the Fire Department, and demand from the Governor the right to choose the commissioners for erecting public buildings, for constructing and controlling the public wharves, the public parks, and all other municipal property. It should be imperium in imperio—a power behind the throne more powerful than the throne itself. It would embrace a majority of citizens, because a majority own land. It would embrace the wealth of the community, because real estate is the thing of longest and most permanent value. It would embrace the intelligence of the public, because intelligent and prudent people always own lands and lots. It would embrace the best of the community, because, as a rule, it is the provident, the industrious, the sober, the economical, and the respectable who accumulate property, while it is the reckless, lazy, drunken, profligate, and criminal who have nothing.

Any other kind of real estate association than the one we have outlined will not amount to a pinch of snuff. It will not have enough blood in its body to wriggle its tail when the next party convention of political bummers sit down upon it. It will not possess sufficient vitality to smell bad when it is kicked, and killed, and thrown over the fence by the next Board of Supervisors, with its traditional ratio of seven thieves, three honest men, and two fools. It will do as all kindred, non-political organizations do: linger, do nothing, die, and be forgotten. Out of the thirteen very respectable and eminent gentlemen named as composing the Real Estate Landlords' and Tenants' Association there are not more than four men, and we believe only two, who will or can give the matter the time and the attention necessary to accomplish any result. The secretary is a man of no influence, and does not possess the knowledge, push, dash, and daring to find out and defeat attacks on real property. The secretary should be a person thoroughly known, thoroughly capable, and thoroughly in earnest, who has nothing else to do, and who is paid a good round salary. The president, vice-president, and advising council should be gentlemen of wealth and leisure, whose interests are more largely in real estate than in anything else, and who in giving their time to the public would feel that they were protecting and preserving their own interests. There should be retained for the association one or more ambitious, active, earnest young lawyers, and they be allowed to consult with one or more leading senior members of the bar, and these should be paid for their services. The association should exclude from its deliberations and councils all who are not members. It should revise all party nominations for municipal officers first, the council and executive officers reviewing the claims and qualifications of all candidates, and these should, after notice, be submitted to the members of the Association at large for ratification. A ticket nominated by a party convention—Republican, Democratic, or Sand-lot—that had to run the gauntlet of an investigation by the men and women who own the town would be likely to be a good one. In this way, and in this way alone, we can secure an honest, efficient, and economical city government. It would be an association of great effectiveness and great power. It would control the politics, the press, and the public opinion of San Francisco; there would be no Governor, nor Mayor, nor Legislator, or Councilman who would be bold enough to set himself up in opposition to such a body of citizens. Its fiat would be law, and in event of a bad man presuming to steal while in office, he would be shadowed, and followed, and watched for a thief. If the press should, for partisan, mercenary, or selfish motives, set itself up in opposition to the decrees of such an organization, it would be squelched in a summary manner. A resolution withdrawing from any newspaper the advertising patronage of its members would send the boldest commercial journal to its knees, howling for mercy. No Senator representing California in the Senate of the United States, and no member sitting for us in Congress, would have the presumptuous audacity to refuse to do any just thing which such a body would, after deliberate consideration, declare to be for the interest of San Francisco. No ambitious man in the State, looking forward to future honors, would dare to place himself in antagonism to such a Sanhedrim.

Such a movement would realize the principle that property has a right to have a large voice in legislating upon all questions touching its management; that intelligence and wealth have claims to the exercise of greater authority in municipal government than the ignorant and the propertyless. It is the self-protection of those who have something against those who have nothing; it is a shield against socialism run crazy, and a defense against that kind of communism which prompts the idle and the criminal to steal and take by violence property from the industrious and the prudent. It is a guard against the encroachment of corporations, and builds up a colossal power that may laugh at the insolence of wealth and set at defiance the menaces of combined capital. Such an organized association would be a shield and protection to the men of small means; they would even in the association outvote the more wealthy. The owner of a house would have an equal voice with the owner of a commercial block. It would be democratic, and it would teach the man or woman of small means and limited wealth that his or her interests were identical with those of men of larger capital, and not with the vicious, ignorant, propertyless, and rascally councils of the sand-lot.

There is no better property in the world than real property. There is nothing so fixed and permanent in value as a part of God's earth. There is no place where real values are so stationary as in cities that are prosperous and thriving. There is no city in the world that has been for a generation so rapidly developing as San Francisco; from nothing to the second city of commercial importance in America, from drifting sand dunes upon a desert ocean shore to a great emporium of trade, from nobody to a population of three hundred and fifty thousand, from nothing to a wealth of a thousand millions, this peninsula has advanced in thirty years. It now lies in the great highway of Oriental commerce; its wharves receive the wealth of India, and send it booming across the continent by rail for Eastern and European distribution. Its port is the only practicable harbor upon twelve hundred miles of ocean shore; to it must come all products west of the Rocky Mountains. Of those products, gold and silver, grain and wine, fruits and fish, are inexhaustible. Within the territory belonging to our jurisdiction we have less than a million of people—a space where fifty millions might live in comfort. We have a climate that would give us population if we had a sterile soil; we have a soil and mountain wealth that would give us population if we had a rigorous clime. The peninsula upon which San Francisco is situated has a limited extent; its boundaries are fixed by bay and ocean; its increase in population and wealth is inevitable. No decree of God is more indelibly writ, no prophecy more clearly outlined, than that San Francisco is destined to become a great, populous, prosperous, wealthy city; a city of vast commerce; a centre into which the ships of the deep waters of the Pacific, and the vessels of the coast, will bring their trade; a city to which centres a great railroad system that stretches northward to inexhaustible forests, and southward to inexhaustible mines; and yet our people look blue, and wonder whether real estate is a good investment in San Francisco, are nervous over a depression that results from stock gambling and Democracy; fear that God Almighty, preordination, fate, and destiny, are to be outwitted and defeated by an ignorant Irish drayman with his unwashed mob of Celts and Teutons; that this ragged regiment of sand-lot loafers are to turn aside the world's great current of trade, and arrest the progress of San Francisco, and dry up its current of prosperity.

San Francisco is in a healthy financial condition. It has no bonded debt. The taxes are exorbitant only because we are paying as we go. We are building a system of docks and wharves; we are building an extravagant municipal palace; we are beautifying parks, paving streets—paying today for the future. If we were getting the full money's worth of our heavy taxes we would not grumble. We can reduce taxes just as soon as we can agree to come together, form such an organization as we have described, and look out for ourselves. When we do this there will be no city in America, and we believe none in the world, where a real estate investment will be more desirable or more remunerative than in San Francisco. We are convinced that there is no kind of property where an investment will be more certain and more profitable than in this city. Sudden fortunes may be realized from investments in commerce, mines, manufacturing, stocks, banking, merchandise, or speculation; but the history of the past, both in America and Europe, has demonstrated the superiority of real estate for permanent investment.

Once, some ten years ago, we asked William Duncan, of New York, what was to be the fate of that city in reference to real estate values. Tweed and the other fat vagabonds of the Americus Club were then feasting and fattening off the plundered municipality. His answer was this: "When Tweed and his gang steal half the town we shall wake up and rescue the balance." They did so. Tweed died in prison, others of the gang are now in exile, all in disgrace, and no one now enjoys his ill-gotten plunder. It was an immense triumph, this victory of law over villains. San Francisco has the lesson, and will follow the example of New York City. If it would not wait for rings to strengthen, nor for the issuance of bonds to become a mortgage upon all our property, it will be well to organize now. An organization to prevent fraud, extravagance, and robbery must necessarily be a political one. It takes thieves to catch thieves. It takes politicians to outwit politicians.

AFTERMATH.

In the famous libel case of Reed vs. Pickering and Fitch, in which the De Youngs were on trial for not allowing Frank Page to send them to the county jail of El Dorado, the result was a victory for the Chronicle, and a defeat for the Bulletin-Call. But it was such a diminutive mouse for the Chronicle's labor, and such a small baby for the Bulletin-Call, that we are not disposed to rejoice over-much with the triumph of the one, or be over-indignant at the misfortune of the other. We should be very glad to see these unhappy journalists reconciled to each other; nothing would so much delight us as to see them forming a happy family, sleeping gently in the same cage. We can conceive of no spectacle that would afford our community a greater pleasure than to see these four gentlemen behind iron bars, drawn through the streets by four horses, after the elephants, camels, giraffes, and other animals, attended by a band wagon, with small boys throwing peanuts at them. It would be, perhaps, equally edifying to see in the same cage a broad-breasted female, dressed as the Goddess of Liberty, sitting between them with a broomstick while they scowled defiance at each other. There ought really to be some variation to the spectacle; we have paid our money now for about eleven years simply to see them throw ink and adjectives at each other.

Our friend Pickering, of the Call, says that Judge Louderback is a part owner of the Chronicle newspaper, and the Chronicle declares that that statement is libelous. How would the innuendoes be framed to show that it is a libel to declare a person joint owner with Messrs C. & M. de Young of the Chronicle? Something like this: "And he, the said Pickering, well knowing the atrocious character of said journal, and the notoriously bad character of the said De Youngs, did then and there write of and concerning him, the said Louderback, that he was part owner of the said disreputable newspaper, and a copartner with those desperate and atrocious individuals, the De Youngs," etc.

Certain word-carpenters, who believe the imperfections of their native tongue can be repaired by their native ingenuity, are proposing a new pronoun—of the common gender—in order, apparently, to avoid the awkwardness of saying at a molasses-candy-pulling party: "Let each take hold of his or her end." The genius who has thought out "hesh" (nominative), "himer" (accusative), and "hiser" (possessive), is generally conceded to have struck it a trifle richer than his envious competitors, and is now, we grieve to say, the object of considerable villification. But the advocates of an ideally perfect language propose to secure his fame and perpetuate his noble invention by a monumental brass with his verbal darlings, "hesh," "himer," and "hiser" engraved on it in letters an inch deep.

Of course there are not wanting conscienceless pirates who seek to despoil this reformer of his fairly earned renown by "improving" his idea—as one hen, by simply sitting on the eggs which another has ingeniously devised and laboriously laid, makes the chicks her own. One of these graceless buccaneers of philology sends us the following apparently artless but really crafty lines:

Two pronouns won't suffice—you want a third,
You would-be language menders.
Can you than "hymen" find a better word
To join the opposing genders?

He shall get glory from neither his wit nor his invention, for we suppress his name.

When, we wonder, will this school feud end? Just now it is a six and six controversy in the Board of Education. If stealing and extravagance can not be carried on by an equally divided board, we hope it will not become reconciled. When, we wonder, will this investigation of school ma'ams come to a close? It is a curious fact that all the female teachers that are charged with getting the questions improperly are young and pretty. Would it not be a solution of this vexed problem just to turn all the nice-looking young girls out of the department, and keep all the sour old maids, wives, and ill-looking widows, trusting they will never err, because never tempted?

Writing in these columns a few weeks ago of the social storm raging on our northern border in consequence of the Princess Louise's order concerning low-neck dresses at her receptions, we used the following language: "In this grave emergency it is hoped that the attitude of our Government may be consistent with a decent and honorable observance of international obligations—until the time comes for more decided action." We thought that sufficiently preposterous to satisfy the requirements of ironical humor. Indeed, we feared we had rather transgressed the limits of literary art by the daring suggestion that a petty dispute in the Canadian newspapers between the Princess Louise's hall porter and the husbands of certain women with bony necks might embroil two nations in a war. But Professor Goldwin Smith has either read our remarks, and with true English stupidity taken them seriously, or with almost American acuteness has independently evolved the view therein apparently expressed. At any rate, he writes regarding the same matter in terms of severe censure against the new Governor-General and his ceremonious wife, concluding thus: "It is a still more serious question for them whether they will encourage the policy of intensifying the political antagonism between Canada and the American republic, and thereby sow the seeds at once of future disturbance on this continent, and of future enmity between the people of the United States and themselves."

The literary staff of this journal has not, unfortunately, been recently reduced by death, but whenever it shall please an all-wise Providence to remove from among us that tender father, loving husband, faithful friend, and social ornament, our salaried joker, we shall be happy to offer to Professor Goldwin Smith the vacant position. Of him we are confident it can not be said, as of the usual aspirant to preferment in this great and free country: "There is no doubt of his acceptance; it is only a question of capacity."

Mr. Volney E. Howard, of Los Angeles, is, as we have always understood it, a descendant of the best and bluest of the azure-veined who came to England with William the Conqueror. In his veins flows untainted the blood of all the Howards. We have always looked upon him as one of those proud sprouts that, transferred from English to American soil, grew more thriftily than the old tree. In fact, we regarded him as an aristocrat—one of the old nobility—of proud, resolute character, who was as ready to exhibit his moral courage in debate as his physical valor on the field of personal combat. If he is not a demagogue; if he has not enlisted under the banner of the sand-lot; if he has not time again in debate appealed to the lowest passions of the lowest minds—denouncing men because they are rich and enterprising and prosperous, ringing in railroad monopoly and Chinese immigration when they were entirely foreign to the question under discussion, and he knew it, to attain a base victory—then he has been misrepresented by gentlemen who have sat in Convention with him, and who expected of him better things.

An irascible contemporary confidently expects to "assist at the ARGONAUT'S funeral." Yes, if he doesn't die first, for the ARGONAUT will probably live until the conversion of America to the religion of Zoroaster; and among the Parsees it is a funeral custom to lead in a dog and let him have a look at the corpse.

One of our sand-lot statesmen, who mends furniture when at home in San Francisco, but who is now engaged at Sacramento in mending the Constitution, is responsible for the following bit of wisdom. The Bill of Rights was under consideration. When the clause was read declaring against the passage of ex post facto laws and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, Mr. Joyce, turning to General Miller, said: "Do you hear that, now, General? Be jabers, I'm opposed to it. I'm ferninst all contracts; it is the only way we can defeat the Superintendent of Strates and the thaving strate contrhactors in San Francisco."

It was the same Mr. Joyce who, when argued with upon the provision taxing corporations, and told that it would drive money out of the State, and that the great foreign insurance companies, English, German, and Eastern corporations, would withdraw their capital from both foreign and marine underwriting, said: "And that's just the thing we want. We'll drive these furniners and their money out of the country, and then we'll compel Mr. Jim Flood to take the $20,000,000 he has invested in government bonds at four per cent. interest, and make him open an insurance company in San Francisco, and kape the money in the country."

The finest Shakspearcan library in the world was burned the other day in England. It contained eight thousand volumes—one volume of Shakspeare, and seven thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine volumes of biography, commentary, and criticism. Every lover of literature will deeply regret the destruction of the volume of Shakspeare.

From an article on fencing, in a New York journal, we have pleasure in extracting the following: "There are some excellent swordsmen in the Olympic Club of San Francisco. General McComb, editor of the Alta California, used to be known in the fencing school as 'Iron Wrist,' from his power of disarming his opponents." We had always supposed that General McComb disarmed his opponents with his smile, and many times have wondered at the number and malignant persistency of the enemies whom he seemed to be triumphantly subduing.

If we had been asked, after the result of the election of delegates to the Convention had been known, who of all the members possessed the highest moral and physical courage, we should have answered the Hon. David S. Terry. He has been tried in scenes that test the stoutest and bravest hearts. He is of undaunted courage in the assertion of what he thinks to be right. And yet this ex-judge proposed to allow entry upon one hundred and sixty acres of unused private property by any individual desirous to enjoy it, and to have the same valued by appraisalment, condemned, and appropriated to the trespasser. Such a suggestion demands an explanation to every one who has ever esteemed him, and who gave him sympathy when he needed friends. It can not be that the memory of old grievances hangs like a cloud around the brain of this gentleman, and that the controlling impulse of his legislative action is hatred of San Francisco, and a desire to visit the sins of the fathers upon the second and third generations! But his course in the Constitutional Convention is inexplicable upon any more generous hypothesis.

When Charley Lee, a Chinaman, was sentenced to be hanged, the other day, by Judge Bellinger, of Portland, Oregon, he thanked the Judge, and with a bright smile that only the dignity of the court prevented from becoming a merry peal of laughter said: "You have got the wrong man." "That is so," gravely assented the Judge, "but I have passed the right sentence."

Troy Dye kills Tullis in order to administer on his estate, and everybody protests that the motive does not justify the deed. We do not say it does, but there are greater criminals than Troy Dye—the poets, for example, who murder people for the purpose of writing obituary verses on them in the Call. The killing is not more criminal, but the verses are. But below this lowest deep of rascality there is a lower deep, as Milton (an indubitable Irishman) hath it. There is a class of miscreants who kill to plagiarize. No sooner does our lively contemporary print an obituary quatrain that has not before appeared in its death-column than the literary thief begins to take action in the matter. He feels the divine fire glowing in his soul; he yields to the temptation, kills a man, and applies that same verse to the corpse. That is how it happens that a particularly charming epitaph has a run of at least ten successive days. The one subjoined ran eleven:

"Our greatgrandmanimy has left us,
For the angels wanted her worse.
'Twas the hand of God that bereft us,
But we have to pay for the hearse."

After such a poetical performance as the foregoing, the following seems even more melancholy from the manner of its execution than from the nature of its subject:

"Mamma, mamma, do not cry,
I'll be better by and by.
So she is, for she took wing
Where the angels sit and sing."

These lines have, as yet, been used but three times—and only in the Bulletin. There is a good property in them for somebody.

Speaking of poets, some of them have a habit of sending us their work without letting us know their real names and addresses. So if any one whose verses ought long ago to have been in the paper has not seen them yet, let him try to remember whether he appended his name and residence. If not, the verses were declined because we did not know who he was; otherwise, because we did. There is no question whatever of their excellence: they are ere good.

These poets, by the way, have all gone stark, staring mad on the sonnet. It is so all over the country. The Eastern journals are all ablaze with sonnets, and the Western corruscate back at them. At this office we have the utmost difficulty in compelling the fine-frenzy members of our staff to write anything but sonnets. It is easy enough to discharge the entire poetical staff, but their successors go to work writing sonnets before they are fairly installed. Now we make this proposition in serious good faith: We will publish a full column of original sonnets whenever we shall have received that many that are considered good enough to print. Moreover, we will publish them in what we conceive to be the order of their merit; the best first, the least good last. The writers can have their true names appended or not, at their option. They will get nothing but glory; this journal is not rich enough—no journal is—to pay what a good sonnet is worth, and there is no American coin of sufficiently small denomination to mark our sense of the value of a bad one. Now, if our good friends, the sonneteers, are afraid to come to the test, let them roll down their eyes, tranquilize their hair, disentangle their legs (we are addressing the males of the species) and invoke the muse in trochaic tetrameters.

A correspondent writes: "Will you give us an article rebuking the Protestant clergy for their abuse of the Apostle Peter?" Well, no, we won't rebuke the Protestant clergy—they buy the paper. But they ought really to let up on Peter. He may not have been, as our correspondent neatly expresses it, "the only one of the Apostles who had sand in his craw," but he was true grit. When Lazarus came forth from the tomb, bound in grave clothes from head to foot, it was Peter who bathed his feet with his tears and wiped them with his hair, while all the others passed him by on the other side. When Judas Iscariot dipped his bread in the dish it was Peter who smote off his right ear with a sword. And wasn't it Peter who when the storm arose, and the overloaded ship was about to sink, said he would get out and walk? One must make allowances, but how anyone familiar with the leading facts of Peter's history can abuse him: beats us. He was honest, he was capable, he was available.

AN OPIUM DREAM.

Gaunt and lean, with a sunken cheek,
A wrinkled face, and a lustreless eye,
He sits all day in the market-place,
Nor speaks nor nods to the passers-by;
But mutters and moans with this sad refrain:
"Tis gone and will never return again."

"Why sit you here, in the market-place,
Moody and strange, with a face of woe?
Poor, with not even that pauper grace
That makes of misfortune a pitiful show,
Moaning and sighing as one in pain:
'Gone and will never return again?'"

"What seek you?" He started, like mountain-stream
That leaps from dark gorge to the light of day;
His face grew bright with a strange, wild gleam.
His sunken eye flashed a lustrous ray:
"The power," he cried, "the will, and the main,
To recall what can never return again."

"Once, when the moon was a silver shield,
And the rivers were clad in its glow and gleam,
And the flowers were sleeping in garden and field,
To my soul came the shade of a beautiful dream
That seemed my innermost life-springs to drain,
But 'tis gone, and will never return again."

"'Twas shapeless—'twas like the ungrounded tones
That are melody whole, but a discord apart,
That are moaning, or laughter, or gladness, or groans,
To tell of the rest or unrest of the heart
When the skill of the master arranges the strain;
But 'tis gone and will never return again."

"Not mine was the genius, though longing to hold
That dream in its place with its glory undimmed,
Its halls of diamonds, of pearls, and gold,
Its faces of women so gorgeously limned
That the world in wonder should shout, 'Who is this
That has drawn this rare picture of beauty and bliss?'"

"My soul was in fetters, like a harp where the strings
Are one-half harmonious and one-half unstrung;
Now close on the earth with its dull, sullied wings,
Then broad on the fresh gale of phantasy flung.
They fluttered and failed me; I wavered, then fell
From mountain to valley, from Heaven to Hell."

"The face of the woman's now here, now away—
How can I tell you of bosom or brow?
Of the charm that dwelt in the eye's sunny glow?
If but for a minute its glory would stay,
And the voice of the vision for one moment ring
In my ear, then I know I could triumph and sing."

"The opaline turret, the jewel-paved floor,
I can see—but again, like the rest, it is gone;
I am worn and weary, I would be alone
Where the soul-wrecking struggle should torture no more.
I'd give centuries of bliss for a moment of power
To place within form the shapes of an hour."

He wept, and he trembled, and crouched in the dust,
An impotent dreamer that thirsted for fame—
A moth, filled with eager, unsatisfied lust
To bathe in the splendor and die in the flame;
Still muttering and moaning his sad refrain,
"Gone, and will never return again."

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The late George H. Lewes was thought to be plain because he was deeply marked with small-pox, and his features were thin and of late much harrowed with the wear of thoughts and the constant gnawing of the kind of atrophy which at length broke the thread of life. But his countenance was always radiant with intelligence, and his large blue eye was frank and pleasant to look into as deep, clear water. He had fine teeth, also, and with his mobile features and hearty laugh, needed no Hyperion curls on his brow to make him more fascinating than most handsome men. Concerning Mr. Lewes' relations with Miss Evans—"George Eliot"—the English press has preserved a "decent reticence." If any one fancies, however, that this is in consideration regard to Miss Evans' feelings he mistakes the quality of the English journalist's mind; his forbearance is partly because he knows his public will not tolerate personal scandal in its newspaper, and partly because, in nine cases in ten, he lives in a glass house himself. The literature makers of modern England are a lawless lot, as a rule, so far as concerns "pairing." Said a friend of ours one day, as we were comparing notes in London: "Isn't it astonishing how well the disreputable portion of the English people can write?" As compared with their co-workers in America the literary standard of English writers is conspicuously higher, their social distinctly lower. If we were unpatriotic enough we could adduce evidence ad infinitum.

"When you put the end of your finger in your ear the roaring noise you hear is the sound of the circulation in your finger. Which is a fact, as any one can demonstrate for himself by first putting his fingers in his ears, and then stopping them up with any other substance. Try it, and think what a wonder of a machine your body is, that even the points of your fingers are such busy workshops that they roar like a small Niagara. The roaring is probably more than the noise of the circulation of the blood. It is the voice of all the vital processes together—the tearing down and building up processes that are always going forward in every living body, from conception to death."

"Here," said the managing editor of the London Times, to a young editor who hadn't learned the ways of the office, "here," he said, handing him twenty-one columns of proof, "you'll have to cut that down; make a paragraph of it." "What is the maximum length of a paragraph?" asked the young man, gazing mournfully at his squib. "Four columns," was the reply, and the young man destroyed the article and left the paper, saying there was no use in staying on a paper that wouldn't allow a man enough space to elaborate a useful thought.

There is much discussion in Paris regarding the disposal of the blackened ruins of the Tuileries, burned during the reign of the Commune. All, however, agree that it should never be rebuilt as a palace. Danton and Camille Desmoulins, while walking in the Tuileries Gardens in 1792, argued regarding the necessary destruction of the building. "So long as the niche exists the saint will return to it," said

SYMPATHY IN BIRDLAND.

Away up in the Sierra is a bit of enchanted land to which Ingomar and I often repaired in the summer time. I left a fragment of my heart there, and in every unrest can close my eyes and in spirit go camping in that peaceful retreat for a serene hour.

An old Virginia rail-fence runs round the blooming low meadows and up over the bold, beautiful line of the pine-covered mountain-tops, inclosing a little country where artists may find a gallery of charming pictures, and poets may rhapsodize and hang odes on hawthornes and elegies on brambles, and every simple heart go dancing with the daffodils.

Not far away is a deep cañon, seemingly filled with molten gold. One can stand facing it and have his gentlest tones and expressions distinctly repeated as if an enchantress were taking the very words out of his mouth.

There is a succession of ivy-wreathed trees that interlace their crowns of foliage, forming irregular arches, in the moonlight, reminding one of the ruins of an old abbey. There are damp glens with balls of violets and frescoes of maiden-hair, and myriads of butterflies and tinkling cascades, and tétes-à-tétes of softest moss embossed with vine and russet lichens.

One day we sat under shelter of a great oak reading from Lucile till lost in the charm of Owen Meredith's story. The quietude was disturbed by no ruder sound than the occasional distant falling of timber, the song of a bird, the drowsy tinkling of a bell, the murmur of brook and hum of insects. Such a land of sweetness, and purity, and rest! We threw the book aside and looked out on this charming scene before us.

The rich, dark pines, breathing their sweet incense, ranged phalanx-like down the mountain side. The silver firs gleamed in the sunlight and spread their branches as if in blessing. A right royal carpet, iridescent-tinted, redundant in summer bloom and beauty, spread away off to the tall trees that arched and touched their branches, forming triumphal arches through which the flowers had made their spring march from the warm southern exposures.

The sky was a picture gallery of rarest colorings. "Aurora and her Band," "Cupid Kissing Psyche," and the "Sistine Madonna," were sailing along in a sunset direction over the gilded domes of the mountains.

The dream-land, lotus-eating sensation had entranced us into a speechless ecstasy. All care was forgotten in this Happy Valley, in the lap of the grand high hills, where surely no sorrow would ever intrude.

Suddenly near us was the shrill cry of a bird—again and again piercing the air—a motherly anguish in the very tone. I started up, and, behold, the sky was soon darkened with flocks of birds coming from all directions, and circling around, finally alighting on the limbs above and about us. The trees were before long filled with chattering birds of all descriptions. Even those known to be at enmity now sat side by side by the limbf. Butcher-bird and linnet, golden oriole and blue jay, yellowhammer and robin—a thousand birds, it seemed, had come at the alarm of danger.

They had not met to sing in joyful chorus, but all set up a chirping and shrieking, discordant as the wails from broken hearts.

Ingomar sprang up. Thereupon a dozen birds wheeled down and circled about his head, uttering their cries, and imploring him to come to their aid.

"Stand away out in the meadow," said Ingomar to me; "evidently there is some great tragedy being enacted in Birdland; very likely a snake dismantling one of their castles, and very possibly a rattlesnake. Seizing a long, heavy stick, he began his search. Then how noisy, and turbulent, and excited grew the entire party, urging him on to the fray. The orioles' dainty baskets swung from limbs here and there, with tiny, fuzzy heads peeping out, and tremulous little housewives flitting back and forth, and dozens of miniature palaces were snugly tucked almost out of sight of rude eyes up in the forks of oak and sycamore, while lowlier tiny cots were perched on young trees about us—but all appeared undisturbed.

He searched some time in vain, they still filling the air with anxious cries. Presently he exclaimed: "Ah, behold the invader of their peace!"

Near us, about seven feet up a young pine, was a nest. His snakeship, about four feet long and four inches in circumference, was coiled around the tree, his head resting on the nestlings. For an anxious moment the birds ceased their chatter. Cautiously approaching, a quick, hard blow was dealt to the venomous creature, and it fell to the ground. He then carried it on the stick a short distance, and threw it across a big, black log. Then a grand chorus of rejoicing filled the air. Many of the bolder little creatures flew down, and, circling about their enemy, almost picked his eyes as he lay prostrate before them. They scoffed at him, and jeered, and triumphantly wheeled up to the limbs again—gave some thanksgiving and congratulatory notes and scattered homeward. The nest we found covered with saliva, one birdling smothered to death, and one gasping for breath, while three lay less injured beneath. The dead one we threw out; then, cleaning the rim of the nest, we retired to a distance, in order to allow the poor little mother to go to her stricken babies.

She sat near by on a high limb, chirping mournfully. Soon she fluttered down and hopped toward them, finally alighting on the edge of the nest; while the mate sat on a near stump, with his head inquiringly on one side, but at a safe distance from all danger. The precious dame was grief-stricken and full of fear as she realized the ruin in her beautiful abode, and rocked back and forth as if bewildered by the sight.

Presently she gave another cry of alarm. In a short time the entire disbanded crowd returned from all woodland directions, and, perching themselves on the limbs above, joined in the wail.

"What's up now?" exclaimed Ingomar, throwing aside his book; "perhaps that fellow wasn't thoroughly dispatched." Sure enough, upon going to the log, he found his snakeship becoming lively, and essaying to crawl to the ground. Several birds again dashed down about Ingomar's head, and admonished him as if saying, "That's right, give it to him, and fix him for good this time."

He effectually smashed the creature's head, while the rejoining birds went on, and they circled around, almost sweeping the snake with their wings. Then, at some given signal, they all once more scattered, each to its own nest, or about its pleasure.

It was a very interesting and touching incident of sympathy. Even here, in this lovely spot, we learned there was not immunity from danger and sorrows. A great and terrible trouble invaded a little home. The parents out of anguish of spirit called aloud for help, and all of their kind, within hearing of their voice, laying aside any enmity and leaving their own nests and pleasure haunts, instantly responded to the cry.

This pretty episode came back to me when the great calamity recently afflicted our beautiful South, and they called out in anguish from invaded and desolated homes, when putting aside all petty prejudice, from North, and East, and West, and over the far seas, the loving voice, and encouraging hand, and well-filled purse were extended—one grand wave of sympathy reaching to them from all great hearts, nor leaving till the terrible enemy was entirely conquered.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. RIDINGHOOD.

It was about half-past seven o'clock in the evening, when a youth created something of a sensation by passing through an Alpine village, in a driving snow-storm, carrying a banner upon which was inscribed the strange device, "Excelsior." His brow was sad, but his eye (according to all accounts he had but one eye) flashed like a falchion from its sheath, while he pushed on, looking neither to the right nor left, but not forgetting to call loudly, "Excelsior." At first the villagers thought he had been drinking, and a policeman was started on his track, but finding there was nothing disorderly in the boy's conduct, he was permitted to go his way unmolested. In happy homes the young fellow saw the light of household fires gleam warm and cheery, although coal was away up out of all reason, as it always is in cold weather; above, the spectral glaciers shone, and from his lips escaped a sigh that was heard all over town to this effect: "Excelsior!"

"Try not the pass," the old man said; "I've lived here for ninety years; I'm the oldest inhabitant, an' I never saw the signs more favorable for a big storm. Besides, the roarin' torrent is wide and deep, and if you get across you can't get back for a week, unless you go around by Rabbit-hash and cross on the bridge. Take my advice, young feller, and stop over night; you'll find the Washington, right over the way, the cheapest house in town. Shall I take your baggage?"

The boy turned up another street, indicating that he intended to climb the hill on the west side of town.

"Oh, stay," the maiden said, "and rest your weary head upon this breast." And right here the conduct of the young man became inexplicable. He did not accept the maiden's invitation, although she was comely, but sixteen years of age, and evidently belonged to the best society. He simply said he was in a hurry, and would probably stop the next time he was in town. The maiden passed into the house, slammed the door, and remarked to her mother if she ever offered to assist a man in distress again she hoped she might be blessed. The young lady was quite indignant indeed.

"Beware the pine tree's withered branch!—beware the—" "Oh, give us a rest!" screamed the boy, who was getting out of patience, and the well-meaning peasant retired without completing the warning, which was no doubt something about "the awful avalanche."

At break of day, as heavenward the pious monks of St. Bernard uttered the oft-repeated prayer, they were startled, nay, shocked, to hear a young man shouting "Excelsior," and cursing the country black and blue for being the roughest, coldest, and most forbidding of any he had seen since he left New Jersey.

"How far is it to the next village?" he asked, "for I have something here that will knock the socks off of anything in this country."

With that he passed on, still grasping in his hand of ice that banner with the strange device, while in the other he carried a little tin box labeled, "Excelsior Corn and Bunion Eradicator."

The editors of this paper take a broader view of their duty as journalists than to suppose their mission concerns the minds of their readers alone, and not the stomachs of which these minds are the highest, ripest, and best result. In pursuance of this wider duty we hereby submit the best recipe for making curry that has ever been published in this or any country. The dish so compounded is delicate enough to make one an artist, nutritious enough to make him religious, and not hot enough to make him too orthodox:

Fry in butter to a golden brown some fine shreds of onion. In the meantime, blend in a mortar well and slowly a tablespoonful of curry powder, half a small coconut finely grated, and a small dessert-spoonful of brown sugar, with half a pint of milk (or with cream), and a like quantity of stock. Rub some of the mixture well into pieces of lean fresh meat, shaped according to fancy, and put them with the remainder of the mixture into the frying-pan, stirring all together for ten minutes. Then transfer all to a stew-pan without a cover, and set it to simmer gently for an hour or more, till the gravy is considerably reduced, adding a little brownings to darken it. A few minutes before serving stir in the juice of half a lemon and a dash of tarragon vinegar, or any other distinctive flavoring, or even a soupeon of garlic. Blending the mixture well is the only secret. If the cook will not take this trouble she had better not make a curry. Rice is to be served in another dish, and should be so boiled that each grain is dry and separate. If previously-cooked meat is to be curried, shape it well, and add it to the curry mixture ten minutes before serving up, or only just sufficient time to warm it through, whatever the material may be, as this applies equally to cold fish, etc., and to tinned provisions, some of which may require more time than others. By this method the curry will not be a crude, hot stew, floating about in dull, yellow, greasy gravy, but a delicate plût, ingeniously flavored according to taste.

Lord Beaconsfield is occasionally epigrammatic. He was asked, after the recent division in the Lords, "How long he thought the Conservative Government would last?" He answered promptly: "As long as it pleases Providence to spare Mr. Gladstone to the country."

INTAGLIOS.

The Song of the Camp.

[If any reader object to the reproduction here of the following poem it will certainly not be he to whom they are most familiar.]

"Give us a song!" the soldiers cried,
The outer trenches guarding,
When the heated guns of the camp allied
Grew weary of bombarding.

The dark Redan, in silent scoff,
Lay, grim and threatening, under;
And the tawny mound of the Malakoff
No longer belched its thunder.

There was a pause. The guardsman said:
"We storm the fort to-morrow;
Sing while we may, another day
Will bring enough of sorrow."

They lay along the battery side,
Below the smoking canon;
Brave hearts, from Severn and from Clyde,
And from the banks of Shannon.

They sang of love, and not of fame,
Forgot was Britain's glory;
Each heart recalled a different name,
But all sang "Annie Lawrie."

Voice after voice caught up the song,
Until its tender passion
Rose like an anthem, rich and strong,
Their battle-eve confession.

Dear girl, her name he dare not speak;
But, as the song grew louder,
Something upon the soldier's cheek
Washed off the stains of powder.

Beyond the darkening ocean burned
The bloody sunset's embers,
While the Crimean valleys learned
How English love remembers.

And once again a fire of hell
Rained on the Russian quarters,
With stream of shot and burst of shell,
And bellowing of the mortars!

And Irish Nora's eyes are dim
For a singer, dumb and gory;
And English Mary mourns for him
Who sang of "Annie Lawrie."

Sleep, soldiers! still in honored rest
Your truth and valor wearing;
The bravest are the tenderest—
The loving are the daring.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

A Ballad of Heroes.

Because you passed, and now are not—
Because in some remoter day
Your sacred dust in doubtful spot
Was blown of ancient airs away—
Because you perished—men must say
Your deeds were naught, and so profane
Your lives with that cold burden? Nay,
The deeds you wrought are not in vain!

Though it may be above the plot
That hides your own imperial clay,
No greener than o'er men forgot
The unregarded grasses sway—
Though there no sweeter is the lay
Of careless bird—though you remain
Without distinction of decay—
The deeds you wrought are not in vain!

No. For while yet in tower or cot
Your story stirs the pulse's play;
And men forget the sordid lot
The sordid cares—of cities gray;
While yet they grow, for homelier fray,
More strong from you, as reading plain
That Life may go, if Honor stay—
The deeds you wrought are not in vain!

L'ENVOI.

Heroes of old! I humbly lay
The laurels on your grave again;
Whatever men have done, men may—
The deeds you wrought are not in vain!

AUSTIN DOBSON.

Bring the Wine.

A FRAGMENT OF AN OLD GREEK DRINKING SONG.

Bring the wine and fill the flagon!
Life is but a little span;
Troubles, like the fabled dragon,
Guard the golden joys of man.
Fill the flagon till it flushes
Like the silver of the seas,
Mirror of the sunset's blushes
Far beyond the Cyclades!
What is care that we should hearken
To its Eleusinian spell?
What is death that it should darken
Life and make the world a hell?
Fill the flagon! Who would sorrow,
When his heart is warm with wine,
Were the Hesper of to-morrow
Doomed no more for him to shine?
Wine is life, and it can fire
Spirits that are dull with pain;
Fill the flagon! Fill it higher,
Twice and thrice, and thrice again!
What are Cytherea's pleasures,
All Athena can bestow,
To the jolly wine-god's treasures
Haloed with divinest glow?
Bring the wine and fill the flagon!
Life is but a little span;
Fate our destined hour ordaineth,
Drink and joy we while we can!

REV. J. H. DAVIES.

[The first version of the sonnet by the late Richard Realf, given below, we published in the Christmas number of the ARGONAUT; the second we find in Colonel Forney's Progress, to which journal it is sent by a correspondent who believes it has not hitherto been in print. It is an interesting literary exercise to compare the two and determine their relative merit.]

I.

Love makes the solid grossness musical;
All melted in the marvel of its breaths,
Life's level facts attain a lyrical swell,
And liquid births leap up from rocky deaths,
Watching the world with wonder. Thus, to-day,
Watching the crowding people in the street—
I thought the ebbing and the flowing feet
Moved to a delicate sense of rhythm always,
And that I heard the yearning faces say,
"Soul, sing me this new song!" The autumn leaves
Throbbed subtly to me an immortal tune;
And when a warm shower wet the roofs at noon,
Soft melodies slid down on me from the eaves,
Dying delicious in a mystic swoon.

II.

I think that Love makes all things musical.
I think that, touched by its deep spiritual breaths,
Our barren lives to blossoming lyrics swell,
And new births, shining upward from old deaths,
Clasp dark glooms with white glories. Thus, to-day,
Watching the simple people in the street,
I thought the lingering and the passing feet
Moved to a delicate sense of rhythm always,
And that I heard the yearning faces say,
"Soul, sing me this new song!" The very leaves
Throbbed with the palpitation of a beautiful tune;
And when a warm shower wet the roofs at noon,
Low melodies seemed to slide down from the eaves,
Dying delicious in a dreamy swoon.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address of nearly Six Thousand Society People.

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

San Francisco Society—An article descriptive and historical, going back to early days, and mentioning the prominent beaux and belles, and the fashionable residence quarters of the city at different dates, etc.

Reception Days—General information regarding the same.

Special Address and Calling List—A carefully compiled list of society people, their residences, address, and reception days, made up from various select invitation lists and special sources of information, and comprising over two thousand families. Something of value to every member of polite society.

Oakland Calling and Address List—Giving the cream of suburban society, carefully compiled from invitation and party lists, and revised by prominent society people.

Army Calling and Address List.

Navy Calling and Address List.

Permanent Guests at the Principal Hotels.

Bar Association—History and membership.

Art Association—History and membership.

Loring Club—History and membership.

Chit-Chat Club—History and membership.

Article on Social Club Life in San Francisco.

Pacific Club—History and membership.

Union Club—History and membership.

Bohemian Club—History and membership.

Occidental Club, Oakland—History and membership.

San Francisco Verein, German Club—History and membership.

Concordia Club, Jewish—History and membership.

Spanish American Club—History and membership.

Theatre Diagrams—Giving official box office plans of all the principal theatres, with numbers of boxes and chairs, so that a ready reference can be had at home to the exact location of seats secured by tickets by comparing numbers. This feature alone is worth the price of the volume.

Shopping Guide—Giving location of places of business and general information concerning a few of our high class retail establishments.

The ELITE DIRECTORY will be a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

READY ON OR ABOUT THE 20TH OF JANUARY, 1879.

NEW BOOKS

Speaker's Garland. Vol. IV.....$2 00
Choice Selections, No. 16. Cloth, 75c; paper..... 30
Marshall's Graded Lessons in English Grammar. Boards, 60c; cloth..... 75
Hittell's History of San Francisco. 8vo..... 4 00
For Our Boys. 8vo..... 3 50
Castles in the Air. By Louise R. Upton. 12mo..... 1 25
Viva. A novel. By Mrs. Forrester. 12mo..... 1 50
Parlor Amusements, or the Art of Entertaining. By Frank Bellew. 12mo..... 75
An Account of the Life and Times of Francis Bacon. Extracted from the edition of his occasional writings. By James Spedding. In two volumes..... 5 00
Mother Truth's Melodies. (Common Sense for Children.) By Mrs. E. P. Miller. 12mo..... 1 00
The Bohemian. A Tragedy of Modern Life. By Charles De Kay..... 1 00
As It May Happen. A story of American Life and Character. By Trebor. 12mo..... 1 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

EUREKA STONE MFG CO.

EUREKA STONE SEWER PIPE A specialty. None but the best brands of English Portland Cement used.

FACTORY, 535 BRANNAN STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARKET STREET, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods. Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

B. T. STERETT, PRINTER
532 CLAY ST. SAN FRANCISCO

RARE ENGRAVINGS

MODERN FRENCH ETCHINGS.

A CHOICE COLLECTION OF THE best Proof Engravings and Etchings always on hand. Rare Engravings procured. All interested in Art are welcome to inspect collection either as visitors or purchasers. W. K. VICKERY, 22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARY S. LUDGON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Co.,
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Co.,
each.

Through two acts I wondered why Horrors was so called. It is true, it contained some ineffably tedious dialogue, which, assuming the good sense of the stage manager, must have been considerably curtailed next night, but that did not suffice to account for its christening.

Like the humor of an exhausted writer, the title is far fetched and very badly strained.

It is finally accounted for, it is true, but one does not like to addle one's brain for two hours over a thing like this. Beside, monosyllabism has become a bore.

"Horrors," strictly speaking, is not a monosyllable, but it has a monosyllabic look on the posters, and it is, therefore, objectionable.

However, as the evening passed, it became very evident that the piece was lucky to have come out of such a hodge-podge with any title at all.

A little line in fine print neatly tucked into the bills runs to the effect that it was written purposely for Mr. Edouin.

What must have been his emotions upon its first perusal! As given, with music and song and dance, action, costumes, and light, it is extremely jolly.

But it must read like the mutterings of a lunatic. As a literary effort it is not sublime.

Mr. Edouin says, "I was only thinking" several hundred times before it comes to his turn to say anything else.

As a matter of course, it was necessary to give him a gag, but it should hardly be necessary to burrow in the depths of imbecility for the weakest one that could be found.

"I was only thinking" will not even pass into the patois of the street boy. His good taste and good sense reject it as being meaningless. In matters of this kind his judgment is to be relied upon.

But Willie Edouin does not depend upon an author. This is fortunate, both for the author and himself.

He is a droll fellow, with an infinity of facial expression, and as supple as a rope-walker.

As for the Horrors they are simply a full assortment of realistic and ridiculous jim-jams.

Edouin must find it almost as trying as the real article to hold the stage for three-quarters of an hour while they are going on. It is here that he is an artist. Yet it is in the ballet that he makes his hit.

Why is it so supremely funny to see a man give the choice steps of a première assoluta?

In this instance, perhaps, it was because he was so exact a reproduction of the Babel-tongued singer, as "la jolite house-keepaire," a little French Mother Bunch in a red silk apron.

Edouin reproduced the red silk apron, etc., and omitted only the French, which the lady supplied with profuse liberality.

She sang a song for us in that queer sketchy way she has, in which one note pierces the dome, and the next becomes inaudible in the wings.

There are some sections of the voice very pleasant to hear, and we would have listened to another verse, but for her most positive declination of the encore.

Now, Miss Searle always accepts an encore in a pretty way, which shows a disposition to oblige without the over-readiness of a bad singer, and every one likes to listen to her.

She has such a pleasant habit of singing the songs we know. It is a treat once in a while to hear good music without being on the alert to catch a new air.

There are three marked elements in her popularity: a purely Grecian nose which makes her face pretty, a half-concealed timidity which makes her manner pretty, and the sacrifice of her operatic education to ballads.

What an acquisition would she not be to opera bouffe if she were an actress.

What a good thing it may be for her that she is not.

She appears on the stage just like the "nicest girl in school," who is always selected to be May queen or fairy queen in the big piece on exhibition day.

How different from little Ella Chapman, who, with her tiny little child-like voice and her more little speck of a trim figure, is yet so well up in the business of the boards.

She is as experienced in her ways as a stage manager. There is perfect fearlessness in those wide open, wide-apart eyes.

What a nimble dancer she is, and as light as a puff of thistledown, but how thoroughly objectionable and redolent of the wizard's hall or the saw-dust ring is that skipping rope afire.

She has a leaning toward this sort of thing, although she is not otherwise unrefined in her manner.

What a pity there is not a future in burlesque.

Louis Harrison might get a slice of it, for he is a light stripling.

He acts 'oo much. All adolescents of this stripe do, but he is amusing and can be forgiven.

It is those who act too much and are not amusing who are outside the pale of human pardon.

He was separated from the time from his companion in arms, Mr. Dixey, a young man whose main talent consists in tying himself up in a true lover's knot quite as rapidly as he would accomplish his morning struggle with a cravat or a shirt opening in the back. They have such a way of casting certain couples together in the theatres that these people actually look odd when apart.

Harrison and Dixey are cast so much together that the Rajah looked lonely in his grandeur.

The Rajah had a brogue.

I will say for Mr. Dixey, that though it was a brogue of peculiarly disagreeable quality, it was as thick as stirabout pudding and as Irish as a bog.

It was oddly incongruous, as was everything. There was a jester who belonged in a latitude many degrees north.

There was a French restaurant, but that may belong anywhere.

It might have been a masquerade ball, for the bewildering varieties of the scene and the utter irrelevancy of any detail. At last the mystery was solved.

The play was Oriental.

No one would have suspected it, except from a slight tendency to that style in costumes.

A consultation with the play-bills also helped the illusion. But it was studded throughout with Yankee "faculty."

That is the true name of the Rice genius.

It is this which utilizes the common jack-o'-lantern, and sets us in a roar over a shadow pantomime.

Given a papier-maché donkey, with a human donkey inside, and they will convulse a crowd.

The commonplace Saratoga trunk is worked into scenic effect.

It becomes a pyramid in Evangeline. It is strung out into a procession in Horrors.

They use the Pestalozzian school system in their choruses. A wave of the hand, a kick of the foot, a turn of the head, which is nothing as done by one, becomes catching when done by a dozen.

We enjoy ourselves we know not why, and may the Lord have mercy on our depraved taste.

We go home and analyze it, and find we have been prostrate at the feet of Mother Goose; and that respectable and interesting old lady, like the Rice brothers, came from Boston.

She, too, had Yankee faculty.

It is a good thing.

It never strains the intellect to understand.

At the California, when one goes to see "Obenreizer"—why should we say No Thoroughfare, when it is "Obenreizer" we do go to see—there is a tension.

I have observed a whole circle watching with feline acuteness to see Florence lose himself, and drop into English just once.

But he never did.

Is it a strain upon him?

His rapid, facile speech, his quick, impetuous movements, his thorough foreignness, forbid the idea.

Even his Swiss garments fit easily and naturally upon him, and among the Alpine peaks he looks to the manner born.

It is not an ordinary class of people who go to see "Obenreizer."

They are familiar with Charles Dickens' deep etching lines.

They know the plotted mysteries of Wilkie Collins.

There is a fascination in the commingling of such a pair of brains, and one likes to trace each incident and character creation home to its source.

Who can not tell that Charles Dickens drew "Sally Goldstraw," and the Foundling Hospital, and that arrant old croaker, "Joey Ladle?"

While who also does not know that if he may have conjured up a "Madame Dor," Wilkie Collins made her dumb, and that if he brought "Obenreizer" into the damps and cobwebs of the Vendale wine cellar at a most dramatic moment, Wilkie Collins took him to the Alpine abyss.

Charles Dickens must have been responsible for the melodramatic female in black—a part which Miss Prescott plays in a semi-lunatic way, which, under the circumstances, is perhaps the correct thing.

It is not so easy to trace "Obenreizer."

There is not the marked print of either hand in his suavity, his treachery, or his one passion.

If "Uriah Heep" or "Mr. Littimer" were specious, smooth-seeming villains, so was "Count Fosco."

After all, it is Florence's "Obenreizer" we go to see, and what a thoroughly satisfying performance it is.

He must be a martinet at rehearsal, for the little nothings which yet catch the fancy go with the smoothness of habit.

That wonderfully picturesque traveling costume is said to be a bona fide article, and I can quite believe that he picked up those great lumbering candlesticks from some mountain inn.

They do not look like California Theatre "props."

Mr. Florence is magnificently supported by—the scenery.

Time was in this same theatre when Mr. Florence, in this same play, was put upon his mettle to excel the others.

But then Mr. Pateman was "Joey Ladle," and the very aroma of the genius of Dickens seemed to commingle with the fragrance from the wine casks around him.

He seemed to have grown old with the cobwebs, and rusty with the cask-hoops, and not all the tarlatan cobwebs of Mr. Felix Morris' really artistic make-up could banish the memory of him.

Then, too, Miss Pateman was "Marguerite."

How charming she was.

Off the stage, but a tall, thin, small-eyed, saw-toothed, dun-haired woman.

On the boards, a tall, fair, slender, graceful creature, abounding with vitality, sometimes a breathing vision of loveliness.

Poor metallic Gussie de Forrest!

One can not damn an actress with fainter praise than to say that she is faithful and conscientious.

One might as well say plainly, she tries and tries and never succeeds.

Every effort killed by the ring of that variety-stage voice. Miss de Forrest, alas! was far outshone even by "Madame Dor," for "Madame Dor," in her peasant costume, was striking and picturesque.

Miss de Forrest, in her would-be peasant costume, was not.

What a strange thing, by the way, that whoever plays "Marguerite" plays it in the first act in peasant dress and boasts of her peasant origin, and in the next act and through all succeeding ones puts on a robe of Parisian mode—if she has it—with long trail, and thereafter says nothing more about her humble origin.

It may be remarked of Mr. Wells' personation of "George Vendale" that he disposes of his traveling wrap in a graceful and comfortable way, and one eminently adapted to an Alpine journey.

Really there is nothing more to say about him.

The new playwright is to the fore one more.

Henry Neville—which, gossip hath it, is a mere transparent nom de plume—is the new candidate for flaying.

Loyal till Death!

It is a good name, and shows that there is a nice girl in it somewhere.

No one but a woman is ever loyal till death.

And then, paradoxically, She is a French woman.

So at least one would suppose from the names, and from the advertising cartoons where they all wear white wigs, and must belong to the court of some one of the Louis.

The negroes are banjoing and dancing away at the Bush Street Theatre.

They must be doing well, for all their songs are going the rounds.

In point of fact, we are living our lives out to the tune of "Don't get weary, children."

We are to have Evangeline again.

I fancy we shall like it better than before.

Its harmless little tunes will not float to us across that wide gulf of space broken only by an orchestral chasm.

I wonder will the ball fringe be resuscitated.

I hope so.

Bed valances of ye olden time make rather pretty petticoats after all.

Then Raymond comes with a new play.

Pembroke Pemberton, Insurance Agent.

Who would think there was anything dramatic in an insurance agent?

But why not?

Insurance policies have become favorite materials in fiction, and the agent must have his perquisites.

Forgive me, Betsy B.

Dashes of French Humor.

"Lucent Syrups tinted with Cinnamon."

An American falls ill at Cannes, where he had gone to spend the winter, and the hotel-keeper anxiously consults the doctor when the latter comes down stairs.

"Well, your American is pretty low; I hardly think he will pass the night."

"Dear, dear: just fancy the harm it'll do my house! Doctor, can't you advise him to go somewhere else? I agreed to have him live here, but I didn't agree to have him die here."

A Southron had been boasting of the exquisite mildness of the climate to a stranger, and that night the snow descended, and the wind blew, and the next day there were drifts a yard deep upon the face of the earth.

"This is a—I mean this is an Arctic region of a Sunny South of yours," says, contemptuously, his friend on meeting him the next morning. "What do you call that, eh?"

"Oh!" says the Southron, "that's snow if you insist upon it, but it isn't cold snow, such as you have up North."

When Arnault's tragedy of Germanicus was produced, Martainville, the famous critic, handled it very rudely. Whereupon Captain Arnault, the dramatist's son, waited on him and gave him a frightful box o' th' ear. Martainville summoned him before the police magistrate, who imposed a fine of thirty francs. Placing a one hundred franc note on the clerk's desk the Captain gave the plaintiff a slap on the cheek that fairly made the sparks fly from the filling of his teeth, and said to the clerk:

"Take two out of that, please."

A Turkish naval officer invites a friend to go and spend a few days with him on his gunboat on the beautiful blue Danube and in the Euxine, and his friend gladly accepts the invitation.

When they had reached their destination the officer says to his friend:

"I must get the men down to business; excuse me a moment?"

"Business; what business? By the beard of the prophet, I thought it was a pleasure-trip!"

"Well, so it is, in effect, only, just to give us an excuse for drawing our rations, they've ordered us to grapple for the torpedoes we sunk last year to keep the Muscovite dogs (may jackasses sing on their grandmothers' graves!) from invading our coasts."

Dumas left Naples under peculiar circumstances. One fine morning he printed an article in which he handled the Italian people in a manner more vigorous than courteous.

At eight o'clock the paper came out; by ten Dumas had received thirty challenges; by noon, sixty. At 1 P. M. he called a meeting of the one hundred and twenty friends of his challengers, and said unto them:

"Gentlemen, I leave Naples to-night, and, therefore, have not time to fight all your principals singly. Nevertheless, I am anxious to give them all the satisfaction that is in my power, so as I have the choice of weapons I propose fighting with pistols; your sixty principals will be collected into a group, and on receiving the word, fire a volley at me and I'll blaze away into the crowd."

The proposition was not accepted.

One day at the Café de Foy one of the leading notaries of Paris was criticising severely the conduct of Marshal Marmont, when a gentleman at an adjoining table, with a mustache like a shoebrush, arose and cried:

"Sir, you shall account to me for those words."

"You are Marshal Marmont?"

"I have not that honor, but I am his senior aid-de-camp."

"Very well, sir; my head clerk will meet you when and where you please."

One night at the Theatre of San Carlo, Naples, Dumas the elder found himself chatting familiarly with a stranger, who, when the play was over, said to him, patronizingly:

"I have greatly enjoyed your conversation, sir, and hope to see more of you. If ever you visit Paris call on me. I am Alexandre Dumas."

"The devil you are? So am I!" replied the novelist, with a roar of laughter.

THE FLOWER GIRL.

Murillo had just put the finishing touches to the picture that he had been engaged in painting for the church, San Jorge de la Caridad. The painting represented the ascent of the Virgin to heaven. On a silver cloud upheld by angels stood the Madonna in all her enchanting beauty, with hands crossed on her chaste bosom, and her eyes uplifted, filled with a look of deep devoutness.

Late one evening Murillo went to the church alone. He wished to stop in quiet reflection before his image of the highest and most delightful inspiration, not from vanity, but from holy thoughtfulness, for he felt that he had been chosen by Providence to express in living colors for the children of earth this divine idea.

The evening was peaceful and warm as summer. Odors of oranges and flowers filled the air, and a nightingale was singing in a poplar grove. The clearest moonlight trembled over the place and lit the wanderer's path. Deep in poetical thought, the artist stepped into the dim and quiet church. It seemed to be empty, but, arrived at the end of the smaller passages that led to the choir where his picture was hung, Murillo saw, hidden behind a pillar, a young woman with a flower-basket in her arm kneeling before the Madonna. Soon he heard these words from the rosy lips:

"Holy Mother of God, never did I think thee so ravishingly beautiful; my poor thoughts had not the power to create for themselves anything so lovely. Oh, who then has succeeded in placing thee on the cloud? Him will I offer my heart; on my knees will I creep to his feet and bathe them in tears of joy! Lower thy glance, open thy mouth, and tell me, tell me where shall I find the master!"

"I am the master, what do you wish of me, my good Fiorina? Do you wish, perhaps, to upbraid me for ever having indifferently gone by your flowers?"

"You, beautiful youth, you are the master? Oh, then, place your hand on my head and bless me. Every day hereafter will I offer thee a white lily and a fervent prayer," said Fiorina, dropping on her knees before him. Murillo stooped over the enthusiastic young woman, kissed the raven locks, and bade her not to forget the white flower. He then told her his name and his dwelling-place, bidding her visit him after three days.

With her flower-basket on her arm came Fiorina, according to the agreement. When she saw Murillo, she held out to him a large, silvery white lily, yet moist with the morning dew. Smiling, the master accepted the gift, and taking the giver's hand, he led her before a covered picture, and said:

"I shall here present you, my girl, with a mirror, in which you will find earthly beauty and joy restored, so long as you are inwardly beautiful and good. Look at yourself often in the glass, and thank God so long as you can look without blushing, and without a sigh. Should you wish also to stand, like the Madonna, on the cloud, surrounded by angels—oh, then, see that your mirror is always clear."

Murillo then tore away the curtain, and on the uncovered canvas was a painting of Fiorina and her flowers, beneath which the master had written: "The Pretty Flower-girl of Seville."

Washington has a club of artists who study from nude living models. When the class was formed rooms were rented in the Young Men's Christian Association building. These were fitted up in a suitable manner and at some expense. Gaslights were arranged around the room so as to throw the best light upon the easels of the artist students, and at the same time to show off the model to the best advantage. These necessary improvements were completed last week, and the class at once took possession of the rooms. They had only worked two nights when the Young Men's Christian Association seemed to have become enlightened as to what the artists were doing, and, in holy horror at having naked figures exposed in their building, even for the purpose of art, immediately served notice upon the club, who were forthwith compelled to vacate, and seek other premises. A member of the class says the female models are all women of respectability, who have taken up this because they have no other work. "Sometimes no one but the committee know who the model is. Last winter the female model we had sitting for us wore a mask, and I would not know her on the street were I to see her now." There are applications for membership from ladies, and the gentleman said: "I know of the daughter of a Cabinet officer, another of an honored scientific professor, recently deceased, who are studying privately from living models." As to the moral effect, he said: "The artists come to the class to sketch or paint, and leave. They do not speak to the models, and none of them would ever sacrifice his social position—for all of them are known in society circles—by committing any misdemeanor."

Colonel Forney's new journal, Progress, is clearly determined to be "forerhanded" or nothing; but it gives us of the Pacific Coast a character for the same estimable quality, which we fear we do not deserve: "Along the whole Pacific slope the Republicans are preparing to give Grant a welcome, late next year, that will be something like the welcome of America to Lafayette, fifty years ago, alluded to in our Washington letter." This is only premature; we shall probably give Grant that kind of welcome, but as yet we have not begun to knock together the platform and arrange the seats, and no bunting is displayed.

Dan Rice says that the following compose the two principal regrets for mistakes made during his eventful life:

1st. Learning Miss Adeline Patti to swear when she was a little girl in New Orleans, during the time I was teaching her horseback riding.

2d. Encouraging little boys in early times to steal under my tent to see the circus. Experience has proven I was morally wrong, from the fact that when they grew up I had to instruct my men to keep a good look-out or they would steal the tent.

A professor in Cornell, lecturing on the effect of the wind in some Western forests, remarked: "In traveling along the road I even sometimes found the logs bound and twisted together to such an extent that a mule couldn't climb over them, so I went round."

"No, miss, I never 'sperienced 'ligion yet. 'Ligion is a mighty nice thing fur to handle, an' I don't believe in fessin' 'ligion an' actin' as I does."

Painting on porcelain. MISS RYDER, 26½ Kearny Street.

ENCHANTMENT.

There was an angelic dancer in New York who had recently arrived from England, and delighted the bald-heads in the critic's row, as well as the aspiring young swells, whose highest delight is to get behind the scenes. Her form was the successful rival of the Medician Venus, with that advantage which the poet so beautifully cites:

"No artistic beauty is like nature's own;
She having the advantage, too, of not being stone."

Well, our beautiful coryphée, who was properly named Celeste, to indicate the improper display of celestial loveliness, made havoc with hearts generally—in fact, a holocaust of love—until a certain rich young swell, susceptible, but green, fell so madly in love with her that his fond mamma had to consent to his marrying her, which he did by writing the Terpsichorean angel an official letter, explaining the condition of his heart and pocket. He supposed she was twenty years old; and so she was, to all intents and purposes, for business. As a coryphée she was twenty, because she looked it before the footlights. But marriage demands a close acquaintance; and even angelic brides must prove to a husband that they are real women—strange paradox, that the angelic quality, so entrancing to a lover, should be eliminated by the husband.

In snow white and orange blossoms Celeste looked as if she had been prompted several stories in the seven-story heaven. The groom was enchanted; the new-made mother-in-law resigned. Now it happened, by an accident arranged by the evil genius of Celeste, that the hotel where the couple first stopped on their wedding tour had to endure an obstreperous alarm of fire. Through smoke and flames the young groom bore his lovely bride out in safety. He laid her on a sofa and took her white hand. She had fainted. He dashed some water from the nearest fire engine in her face, and looked anxiously for returning consciousness; but, heavens! what a sight was revealed! It was a woman about fifty years old, and the "make-up" all had vanished. The youth returned to his mamma a sadder, but wiser, boy, and Celeste went the other way with her "settlement."

Gentlemen who "knew Humboldt personally, sir," when the great scientist visited this coast, will be interested in Prince Bismarck's opinion of him, for the Prince seems to have known him even better than they. Says Bismarck:

"In the days of Frederick William IV. Humboldt used to entertain the court by scientific lectures to which no one listened. I, being good-natured, was the only victim to his loquacity. For hours together he would favor us with the biography of some French scholar or architect, in which no one took the slightest interest. He lectured standing close to the lamp, dropping his notes from time to time, and extemporizing some profound remarks. Though no one paid attention, he was visibly elated at hearing himself speak. The Queen sat industriously at her embroidery, entirely absorbed by that. The King looked at engravings, noisily turning over the leaves so as to draw the voice. The young people in the background laughed, whispered, and paid no heed. Yet the scholar went on, murmuring monotonously like a sleepy brook. General Gerlach, who was often present, sat on a little round stool, preposterously unequal to his proportions, and snored. "Gerlach," said the King, on one memorable evening, "sleep, but do not snore." I was the only one who appeared to be listening. Yet even I chewed the cud of my own thoughts until, at last, cold meat and white wine were handed round. Yes, Humboldt was a great talker. Nothing displeased him more than to have to listen to another. On one occasion somebody monopolized the conversation at Court by relating something interesting to all. Humboldt was perfectly beside himself. Grumbling morosely, he piled up his plate with pate de foie gras, lobster, cels, and other indigestibles—a perfect mountain of conestibles. I shudder when I think what the old man could swallow. He ate as long and as fast as he could. When he found the gastronomic powers exhausted, no longer master of himself, he made a desperate attempt to get the ear of the company. "On the summit of the Popocatepetl," he commenced; but he did not get any further, the more popular speaker quietly continuing his tale. "On the summit of the Popocatepetl, seven thousand feet above the level of the sea," he began again with loud and excited voice. But he failed this time, too. The other narrator would not be interrupted, nor would the company. This was unprecedented. What a scandalous shame! Humboldt sat down in a rage, and moodily meditated upon the ingratitude of the human race, particularly at Court. The Liberals have been pleased to regard Humboldt as one of their own set. But he was a man who could not live except basking in the sunshine of the Court. The favor of his sovereign was indispensable to him. But this did not prevent his creeping away from the palace to Varnhagen, to gossip and slander with his trusty mate.

Respectable people beyond the Rocky Mountains may be shocked by the Western habit of carrying deadly weapons on the person, but the custom has its advantages, all the same. In San Antonio, Texas, not long ago, a chained Californian lion in a menagerie seized a little girl and undoubtedly would have destroyed her, but the contents of fourteen revolvers in the hands of casual by-standers effectually dissuaded him. The custom (like the duello) has also a softening effect on manners. Where men's lives are carried in one another's pocket they think twice before giving needless offense.

Dress modestly; talk sense; don't snicker at every little thing you happen to see; don't spend more than two-thirds of your time promenading the streets; and when you have your photographs taken, try T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street, where the most perfect pictures are taken at wonderfully low prices.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

All the Perisian theatres now give Sunday morning performances.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Extra Announcement.—The I. O. O. Life Insurance Co.

Brief engagement of the eminent Comedian, Mr.

JOHN T. RAYMOND,

Who will appear on Monday evening, January 20th, for one week only, in his world-famous creation,

PEMBERTON PEMBROKE,

The Insurance Agent who takes Risks, in Bartley Campbell's great play,

RISKS,

Or INSURE YOUR LIFE, as played by MR. RAYMOND at the Park Theatre, New York, and principal theatres of this country with unparalleled success.

The play will be produced with entirely new scenery, property and appointments, and a strong cast of characters. Only RISKS Matinee Saturday.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Mr. Raymond's engagement is positively limited to three weeks, and as he intends to produce the great Boston success, MY SON, and will also appear as "Colonel Sellers," next week will necessarily offer the only opportunity of seeing him in RISKS. 25¢ Seats may be secured at the box office.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

This (Saturday) afternoon, Grand Ladies Matinee at 2 o'clock. The new and favorite burlesque,

HORRORS!

OR THE MARAJAH OF ZOGBAD.

MATINEE SATURDAY AT 2 O'CLOCK.

This (Saturday) evening, and every evening, including Sunday, Mr. Wm. Gill's new extravaganza entitled

HORRORS!

Or THE MARAJAH OF ZOGBAD. New and elegant scenery and superb costumes.

In active preparation, and will soon be produced on a scale never yet attempted in this city,

EVANGELINE.

Seats can be secured six days in advance.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

This (Saturday) afternoon, at 2 o'clock, OURS.

Saturday and Sunday evenings, January 18th and 19th, great double bill,

THE GREEN LANES OF ENGLAND and OURS.

Monday, Jan. 20, COMPLIMENTARY BENEFIT TO

MR. FRED LYSTER,

Acting Manager, under the auspices of His Excellency GOV. IRWIN, and leading citizens of San Francisco.

LOYAL TILL DEATH.

THE SCHMIDT QUINTET,
AND
BROTHER BILL AND ME.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

EVERY EVENING AT 8. SATURDAY AT 2 P. M.

CALLENDER'S

GEORGIA MINSTRELS.

GEORGIA MINSTRELS.

THE GREAT ORIGINAL TROUPE OF NEGROES.

6 END MEN. 20 ARTISTS.

SEATS SECURED AT THE BOX OFFICE.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELANGER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY BELANGER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.
JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,

PARTY INVITATIONS

AND VISITING CARDS

Engraved and printed in the latest style.

WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, WHO can give satisfactory references if required, desires room and board in a private family. Location, north of Market Street preferred. Address R. B. D., this office.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & Co.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

ANNUAL MEETING.—The Annual meeting of the stockholders of the Belcher Silver Mining Company will be held at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, in this city, on TUESDAY, the twenty-eighth day of January, 1879, at one o'clock P. M., for the election of a Board of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before the meeting. Transfer books will close on Monday, January 20, 1879. JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary. San Francisco, Cal., January 13, 1879.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, January 15, 1879.—At a meeting of this Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 39) of two dollars per share was declared, payable on MONDAY, January 20, 1879. Transfer books closed until Tuesday, the 21st inst.

1879.

The Four Reviews

.....AND.....

BLACKWOOD.

AUTHORIZED REPRINTS OF

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW, Whig.
THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, Liberal.
THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW, Conservative.
THE BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW, Evangelical.
.....AND.....
BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH REVIEW.

These Reprints are not selections; they give the originals in full, and at about one third the price of the English editions.

No publications can compare with the leading British periodicals above named, reprinted by the Leonard Scott Publishing Company. In respect to fidelity of research, accuracy of statement, and purity of style, they are without any equal. They keep pace with modern thought, discovery, experiment, and achievement, whether in religion, science, literature, or art. The ablest writers fill their pages with most interesting reviews of history, and with an intelligent narration of the great events of the day.

TERMS OF 1879 (INCLUDING POSTAGE):

PAYABLE STRICTLY IN ADVANCE.

For any one Review.....	$ 4 00 per annum.
For any two Reviews.....	7 00
For any three Reviews.....	10 00
For all four Reviews.....	12 00
For Blackwood's Magazine.....	4 00
For Blackwood and one Review.....	7 00
For Blackwood and two Reviews.....	10 00
For Blackwood and three Reviews.....	13 00
For Blackwood and the four Reviews.....	15 00

POSTAGE.

This item of expense, now borne by the publishers, is equivalent to a reduction of twenty per cent, on the cost to subscribers in former years.

CLUBS.

A discount of twenty per cent will be allowed to clubs of four or more persons. Thus: four copies of Blackwood or of one Review will be sent, to one address, for $12.80; four copies of the four Reviews and Blackwood for $48, and so on.

PREMIUMS.

New subscribers (applying early) for the year 1879 may have, without charge, the numbers of the last quarter of 1878 of such periodicals as they may subscribe for.

Or, instead, new subscribers to any two, three, or four of the above periodicals, may have one of the "Four Reviews," for 1878; subscribers to all five may have two of the "Four Reviews," or one set of Blackwood's Magazine for 1878.

Neither premiums to subscribers nor discount to clubs can be allowed, unless the money is remitted direct to the publishers. No premiums given to clubs.

To secure premiums it will be necessary to make early application, as the stock available for that purpose is limited. Reprinted by

THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO.,

41 Barclay Street, N. Y.

GYPTIS.

A Tale of the Founding of Marseilles.

CHAPTER I.

Many years before Christ there dwelt on the southeast coast of what is now called France, in a little village composed of round, low dwellings of wood and clay, with branches of trees for roofs, a tribe of Gauls, called Segobrigians, under the rule of their kindly chief, Nann.

From out one of the low, round dwellings issues forth the chieftain's daughter, Gypsis, the darling of her tribe, followed by her fair-haired maidens. They leave the thick foliage, and Gypsis leads the way to the seashore. Suddenly she stops and cries: "Edith! Thyra! Aldyth! Enid! see! see! three ships from some strange land; and we will have new robes, armlets of precious stones, ear jewels. What fair goddess hath blest us?"

Lifting one snowy hand to shield her face, she watched the ships glide over the peaceful waters; there she stood, surrounded by her pretty maidens, while the sun's rays seemed to drop gold upon her floating, waving hair, and the azure seas to drift a part of their tender blue into her dreamy eyes. As they watched, the clouds overcast the sky; but too much interested in the ships, they did not perceive until a peal of thunder and a vivid flash of lightning startled them; then the drops came thick and fast, and the thunder peals so loud and frequent, that even the strong hearts of the Gallic maidens beat faster, and they turned, hurrying toward their homes. Only Gypsis stands unmoved. Still watching the vessels, she sees them struggle against the waves. Turning to her maidens she says: "Thyra, go to my father. Tell him of the danger; bid him call the men to aid the strangers. Thou, Edith, and thou, Aldyth, hasten to my dwelling and bring furs to shelter us from the storm. My sweet Enid, thou wilt abide with me till they return."

They hasten to do her bidding, and Gypsis and Enid, unimpaired of their drenched garments, hurry to the very waters' edge, to catch sight of the storm-beaten vessel. They strain their eyes to see through mist and spray. "Dost thou see the three, Enid? Oh, why does not my father come! Run to the hill and call him. Nay, but wait; see that dread billow! How they toss and tremble! Ah! they come nearer; they will surely strike the rocks; let us try to warn them."

They raise their silvery voices, but the wild roar of the tempest laughs back to them in mockery. "Enid, harken; that is not the tempest roar. See, one has struck the rocks! Enid, it sinks, it sinks!"

Suddenly above the storm is heard a voice, "Gypsis, Gypsis, thy father calls thee." Gypsis hastens up the shore. Kneeling before the wild but kindly chieftain, she cries: "My father, thou wilt save the strangers. One of their vessels sinks; hasten, my father, or they will perish; bid thy brave fellows put off the boats."

Nann stops an instant to place his rough hand tenderly on Gypsis, his darling, and then gives hasty orders to his men; and soon they are launched in the wild waters bearing succor to the Grecian men. Now the maidens raise a wild chant—a prayer to the gods to still the tempest. Gypsis watches her father's frail boat (they were of wicker work covered with stretched hides) and she trembles for his safety; but they have reached the sinking ships, the drowning crew are saved. The storm subsides.

Euxines steps upon the shore with his chosen followers, and in brief and courtly words he gives acknowledgment and thanks to Nann for his aid to the shipwrecked crew. Gypsis breathes a low sigh of admiration as at a distance among the women she looks on the handsome Greek. He flashed his brown eyes over the crowd that had gathered to see him land, and meeting the steadfast gaze of the young girl, he thought: "By the great Zeus, there are some fair maids even in this barbarous land." But Gypsis' eyes were instantly dropped, and she hastened home, followed by Enid and her maids.

They sat in the fading light around the fire built in the centre of the room, and they talked of the exciting scenes of the day, the strangers that had come among them, and the gaunts and robes that they displayed. And then they talked of the coming marriage feast that was near at hand, during which Gypsis must (as by ancient custom of her tribe for the chieftain's maiden) present a goblet of pure pressed wine to him she chooses to be her mate.

"Thou wilt surely, Gypsis, give the goblet to thy cousin, Chlodwig," said gray-eyed Thyra. But Gypsis did not answer. She was not thinking of the banquet or of the devoted Chlodwig then; she was wondering why the young Greek's eyes softened so when they met hers on the shore.

CHAPTER II.

Nann, with genial hospitality, invited Euxines and his crew to come to his village and rest until after the marriage feast of his fair daughter, and participate in the festivities, at the same time granting them right of free traffic with his subjects. It chanced, two days after, as Euxines walked among the forests of the River Rhodanus, he came upon that broad, clear stream. Throwing himself down under an oak just where the river wound on either hand, the notes of low music arrested his attention. Up the long reach, through the dripping boughs of laurel and elm, a barge, slowly pushing against the current, gayly decked with painted shields, and more gayly filled with sunny-eyed girls, their fair hair mingling with the sunlight through the branches, tuning their joyous songs to lyre and timbrel, came in view. So beautiful was it that he thought he saw a vision of immortals. "Perhaps naiads and wood nymphs are visiting me," was his first thought, but at once he saw Gypsis' smiling eyes.

The merry party do not see him, but as they pass their melodious boat-song falls upon his cultured ear, and he listens with all his soul; it swells widely and clearly, now low and sweet as the last few notes of the meadow lark, trained to the severe yet delicate Grecian airs. He was entranced. The boat changes its course and darts into an arm of the river, and, touching the grassy slope, the maidens step upon the bank and wander away among the trees and flowers, soon returning with arms laden with fragrant blossoms, seating themselves among the vines. The young Greek, reclining on the bank, scarcely dares draw breath for fear of rudely breaking the charm; the boat lies half hid in a bower of flowering vines.

Enid unbids Gypsis' long hair; Thyra crowns her with a wreath; Aldyth winds her garlands round her snowy robes, while Edith fastens way ferns here and there among the folds. Then they sing, with their white bare arms around her, "Gypsis, Gypsis, the beautiful, is queen, is queen. Gypsis, if thou lookest thus on the banquet day Chlodwig will have many to envy him."

"Thou seemest to be very sure that Chlodwig will be my chosen one," said Gypsis.

"Nay, but of whom else could we think?" they chorused, laughingly.

"I wish my father were not so hasty. I should be content always to be his child and have no other love but his and thine, my fair maidens;" and Gypsis blue eyes were overflowing as she looked up to smile on them all. They again take their oars and soon float through the trees out of sight of the eyes of the stranger.

"So," muttered he, "this is what one hears playing eaves-dropper. I would I had never known their barbarous tongue. Yet, by the gods! Aphrodite's very lips could not drop sweeter music than that fair maiden's speech."

Euxines arose and walked slowly toward the village; the forest had lost its charm; he could think of nothing but Gypsis. "She does not love her wild cousin, but she will be compelled to choose him. Ha!" cried he, fiercely, "were I one of those Gallic fellows I would not let such a tender flower wither under the fierce glance of that barbarous Chlodwig. Methinks I see again his envious glance when Nann did me honor at the shore. It were useless for me, a stranger, to hope for her love;" and he strode away moodily.

It was evening of the same day. Down by the beautiful waters of the Iberian Sea sat Enid and Gypsis. "Thou art sad, dear lady," said Enid; "would I could cheer thee."

"Thou must not talk of comforting, Enid; it is nothing, my sweet."

"Nay, but thou hast been sad for many days. I marked them; 'tis since the dreadful storm. Thou wert not so loath to talk of the coming feast as now. I pray thee, tell thy Enid why this change?"

The girls were aroused from their sad reverie by the soft strains of a lyre, and the music fell upon Gypsis' troubled heart like—

—"The sweet south wind
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odor."

Poor child! She understood not the weary restlessness which possessed her; it was so new. The marriage feast and Chlodwig were alike distasteful. She now thought of complaining even to her chieftain father. It was inevitable fate—she must choose that dread cousin. She had till lately, while yet it was only a fear, tried to put the shadow of it away from her sunny heart; but now it was an impending cloud, and with great dread she prayed the gods that it might roll away. It was not that she loved Euxines; she had scarcely thought of him, save to wonder if those stern eyes would soften as readily when again she met his gaze. But as she listened to the music, it seemed as if Hope were pressing his soft hands over the strings of the lyre and whispering of promised pleasures; and while the delicious strains went wandering on, Gypsis reclined on Enid's shoulder and forgot all sorrow, forgot even Chlodwig. She scarcely knew when the strain ceased, so gradually and gently did it glide into Nature's music—the rustling of the forest trees and the murmur of the ever moving sea. At last she awoke from that dream of delight; rising, she exclaimed: "Enid, bid thee to the hill; see who it is that plays—if it be not a god!"

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

CHOW-CHOW.

It was Sainte-Beuve, we believe, who having to fight a duel in a rain persisted in holding an umbrella over his head, protesting that the code of honor did not require him to take the risk of a fit of sickness. He has been outdone, however, by the late Mr. Castrafolles, of Canada. This gentleman, when about to be hanged, the other day, was reminded by the priest that death would come more easily and agreeably if he would take the trouble to remove his collar. "No," said he, "the law has condemned me to be hanged, but I am not going to catch cold if I can help it."

The Saturday Review does not appear to believe in the immortality of most of the books that are published nowadays. "When we are asked," it says, "to assign to a book 'a permanent place in literature,' we are reminded of a young gentleman who had once been a clerk in a Government office, and had afterward taken to a literary life as a reporter of cricket matches for some sporting paper. He one day visited his old office, and addressing his former comrades, said: 'What an easy life you have here, you who write mere minutes that live but for a day, compared with the anxieties of a man like myself, who in his work feels that he is writing for all time.'"

We have heard many persons attempt a description of the sensations given them by an earthquake shock, and have noted how almost universally they unconsciously personify the temblor—speaking of it in the terms commonly employed with regard to a living, sentient being. Probably the conception of it as a great subterranean monster is present, more or less definitely, in every mind, and in the following characteristic sonnet, entitled "Earthquake," Mr. Edgar Fawcett, with true poetic insight, has seized upon that aspect of the matter, and given determinate expression to a vague but universal feeling:

"A giant of awful strength, he dumbly lies
Imprisoned among the solemn depths of earth;
The sinewy grandeur of his captive girth—
His great-thewed breast, colossally-molded thighs,
And arms thick-roped with muscle of mighty size—
Repose in slumber where no dream gives birth
For months, even years, to any grief or mirth;
A slumber of tranquil lips, calm-bid eyes!
Yet sometimes to his spirit a dream will creep
Of the old glad past when clothed in dantless pride
He walked the world, unchained by tyrannous powers;
And then while he tosses restlessly in sleep,
Dark, terrible graves for living shapes yawn wide,
Or a city shrieks among her tottering towers!"

The newest thing in favors for the German is probably as fantastic as anything yet devised, but seems to us to require a rather wider and more accurate knowledge of literature than is possessed by the average dancer. It consists of a knot of ribbon with long ends, upon each of which is printed one verse of "The frog he would a-wooing go." The first line of each couplet is printed on the gentleman's ribbon, the second on the lady's, and the two who can make up the couplet are partners.

"Prince Deukalion"—we have not read it—is pretty generally conceded to be the best of the late Mr. Bayard Taylor's poems, as it is the last. "His sweetest song is the last he sings," as is written of the swan. By the way, there is much of nonsense in that myth of the dying swan, and we are disposed to believe that our learned contributor, "Little Johnny," is about right when he says the song is what kills the swan—though it may be the unusual exertion in its rendition, as the theatrical reporter prefers to say.

LITTLE BELMONT
FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms. The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements. It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds underlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont; water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table, range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted, rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloroforming Furnaces,
Corrosive Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

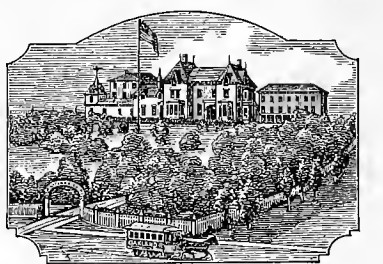

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 237 Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH,
German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—
with
KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age.
The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1863) will commence on MONDAY, January 6th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address
MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

CALIFORNIA MILITARY

ACADEMY.

The next term will commence January 2, 1879.

REV. DAVID McCURE, PH. D., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

THE CALIFORNIA MINING CO., San Francisco, Jan. 7th, 1879. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named Company, held this day, a Dividend (No. 30) of One ($1) Dollar per share was declared, payable on Thursday, the sixteenth day of January, 1879.

C. P. GORDON, Secretary.
Office—Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., January 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 17 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Monday, the 13th day of January, 1879. Transfer books closed on Thursday, January 9, 1879, at 3 o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.
135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental
Hotel.

BEST & BELCHER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 13) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Thursday, the sixth (6th) day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 3) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixth day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on FRIDAY, the twenty-eighth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

THE DEL REY SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Silver City, Lyon County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Trustees, held on the 11th day of December, 1878, an assessment (No. 3) of two (2) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary or Treasurer, at the office of the company, No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. SAM'L A. CHAPIN, Secretary.

Office—No. 7 Montgomery Avenue, Room 24, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

M. E. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.
SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

IZETTA GOODHUE, plaintiff vs. STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to STEPHEN GOODHUE, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which special reference is hereby made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 14th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By J. H. FIDENS, Deputy Clerk.
WOODS & COPPEY, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

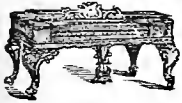

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE
PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.
FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARGOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubbing or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT
223 Sacramento St
SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET,
San Francisco.

THE Automatic SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,
124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pantsfrom $ 4 00
Suitsfrom 15 00
Overcoatsfrom 15 00
Dress Coats ..from 20 00

Genuine 6 X

For Rent, Good, Cheap

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin Pants
from$7 00
White Vestsfrom 3 00
Fancy Vestsfrom 6 00
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

127 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA CO.
OF LONDON.

A Flattering Compliment

—TO—

STEINWAY & SONS.

Academy of Music,
New York, Dec. 28, 1878.
Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Gentlemen—Having used your celebrated Pianos in public and private during the present opera season, we desire to express our unqualified admiration of their sonority, evenness, richness, and astonishing duration of tone, most beautifully blending with and supporting the voice. These matchless qualities for accompanying the voice, together with precision of action and unequalled capacity for remaining in tune for a great length of time, render the Steinway Pianos, above all others, the most desirable instruments for students of vocal music and the musical public generally.

MINNIE HAUKE,
ETHEL GERSTER,
MARIE ROZE,
CL. CAMPOBELLO,
G. LABLACHE,
LUIGI ARDITI,
ITALO CAMPANINI,
A. F. GALASSI,
G. DEL PUENTE,
J. FRAPOLLI,
A. J. FOLI,
F. DE RIALLP,
J. H. MAPLESON.

New York, Dec., 1878.
Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Dear Sirs—Allow me to express to you the entire satisfaction I feel in praising your magnificent Pianos. They are the finest and most superior instruments in the world, and I have therefore taken every opportunity, while in Europe, to extol their sterling qualities. Believe me, dear sir,

Yours, very sincerely,
MINNIE HAUKE,
Royal and Imperial Court Singer.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

WAKELEE'S
AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL
Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.

PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.
Manufactured by

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,
Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 4.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 25, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

A very good man—and as a rule we do not like good men—took us to task last week for not having noticed the “great” temperance movement that is now going on in San Francisco. The fact is we did not know there was any movement in this direction; and yet we ought to have known it, because there is always a great temperance movement on foot, only it never moves; or perhaps it is like a river, it never runs by, and the individual who stands on the bank gets weary of waiting for dry land. It is like Colonel Jack Gamble standing on the curbstone of Broadway waiting for the procession to pass. This gentleman informed us that every night Platt’s Hall is crowded—“thronged,” he expressed it—with a mass of earnest men and women pushing on this great temperance reform, and that the press is too cowardly or too indifferent to give it more than a passing notice. Of course we know that the commercial journals, and all of them, are cowards when a reform touches the till. There is not a daily paper in this city that dares to advocate the cause of temperance, for fear it should lose the advertising patronage of the manufacturers, dealers in, and drinkers of alcoholic stimulants. $600,000,000 worth of liquor is manufactured and drunk annually in the United States—that is, $15 a year to each man, woman, and child. As an interest, it is more powerful than the General Government. In opposition to it churches and societies are but feather weights. There is no political party that has the courage to be a temperance party. The House of Lords and House of Commons, the Queen and Parliament of England dare not array the Government against the licensed victualers. To speak practically of our own affairs, corner groceries, saloons, whisky jobbers, importers, and manufacturers of malt liquors are a power in San Francisco that—when associated—no ambitious politician and no party dare antagonize.

No intelligent person pretends to doubt that intemperance is the greatest evil of the age, that it is the one great sin that underlies nearly all the others. It is the devil’s own pet vice with which he afflicts the world; it is the whip of scorpions with which he lashes the human race. Poverty, crime, and madness would be almost banished from the world if it were not for this devilish drug, that poisons and destroys the human family. It begets idiots in the mother’s womb, and predestines men and women to become maniacs. The curse is universal. The knowledge of making intoxicating drink is the earliest evidence of man’s inventive genius. There are no people so barbarous, nor so ignorant, that they have not some device for distilling from roots, or fruits, or grains. They all know how to fabricate a drink that will make drunk. There is no time, no historic era, in which this knowledge was not abroad. To-day in California we know, and everybody knows, that our prisons and jails, our houses of prostitution, and our hells of crime, our asylums—deaf, dumb, and insane—and our hospitals, are filled with people because of this traffic in alcoholic drink. We who pay taxes know that six-tenths of the burdens of society come from the same source. We know, and the sand-lot agitators know, and their wives and children know, that it is the primal underlying cause of their poverty and destitution. It is apparent to every observer that the greatest part of life’s burdens and miseries, domestic griefs and dissensions, poverty, distress, and crime, are directly traceable to indulgence in drinks that either intoxicate or befuddle the brain. And yet no civilized nation is strong enough to legislate to prevent the evil, and of those who read this article a majority will dissent from the proposition that there ought to be any legislation to even restrain the use of intoxicating beverages. The best men in the community, and the most intelligent, will argue in favor of leaving this thing to regulate itself; will set themselves up in opposition to any prohibitive or restrictive laws upon the subject; while it is an admitted proposition that dissipation kills more men than are destroyed by accident or disease; is more to be dreaded than wars or epidemics, and that its immediate presence in San Francisco is more destructive to life, and more injurious to property, and more prejudicial to the health, comfort, and morals of the people, than all other causes combined.

Yet no one notices it except a sort of goody-goody, half-witted people, who do not drink themselves, and who think they are accomplishing results by sitting down upon the banks of this stream to drain it with a dipper, or to clutch at the hair of some drowning wretch who is floating by, to rescue him. The great bulk of the community have become callous to this condition of things, and look with utter indifference upon it. The great mass of the unthinking mob have evidently adopted the motto of the incident we related of the Nevada gambler—“They don’t care a d—n what happens so long as it does not happen to them.” Of the clergymen, not one in fifteen gives this subject more than a passing thought. They occasionally fling a temperance suggestion into prayer or sermon; just enough to earn the money that puts sherry into their pudding sauce or brandy into their mince pies. The press—that great lever of public opinion, controlled by its one motive, namely, to make money—either takes no position at all or sides with the capital that manufactures and sells ardent spirits. The politician, who would succeed in his ambitious desire to reach a position where it is safe to take things that do not belong to him, does not set himself up in opposition to the corner grocery, where most of the voting is done. The public opinion that comes from an invested capital, the annual production of which is $600,000,000, is, of course, most powerful. To this, add the influence of the owners of ships and railroads that transport it, the owners of buildings where it is jobbed or retailed, of the merchants, clerks, porters, draymen, who handle it—all these classes, independent of the victims who drink, become a colossal power; a great social and political power, which such movements as are now going on at Platt’s Hall do not in the least degree disturb. It is the attack of a single musquito against a whole herd of wild elephants.

Of course, these people mean well, and they accomplish some good, but the good is infinitesimal as compared with the evil they assault. The powder that is administered to the musquito after he is caught and choked will kill, but what is the practical good of the death. We must not be understood as discouraging the attempt that would rescue one individual from the whirlpool of dissipation, or save one friend from the invading fiend of drunkenness, or prevent one boy or girl from taking the devil of intoxicating drink into the mouth to steal away the brains. What we mean to be understood is this: These temperance movements are vain and ineffectual, because they either do not grasp the magnitude of the evil, or do not go the right way to correct it. The evil of intemperance can only be cured by a great political movement. Its results affect social life; it pervades and destroys society. Public opinion may be wrought upon by the orator or the editor, but there will be, and can be, no other mode of correcting the abuse than through the ballot-box. When the evils of intemperance challenge by their magnitude the attention of the tax-payers, when the amount of taxation depreciates the value of lands and houses, when this burden is felt and property-owners begin to realize that they are supporting the criminals, the sick, the paupers, the insane that the liquor manufacturer and vendor are making, and that the liquor dealer is getting rich just in proportion as he makes other business men poor, then they will begin to wake up to the necessity of some legislation upon the question.

We see no practical results coming from this modern style of temperance agitation. When enthusiastic females form a praying circle around the drunken “Happy Jacks” of our water front, we have no doubt it does them a great deal of good, and does the “Happy Jacks” no great harm. Enthusiastic orators, by force of their eloquence, their magic tones, their strong appeals, and their warm sympathies, may enthuse an audience, draw tears from eyes that are weak from weeping gin, may arouse the sensibilities of women and children, and by dint of perseverance and the sweet oil of persuasion may get a long list of enrolled enthusiasts, who pledge themselves to abstain from the sweet consolation of even sweet cider, but it does not last. It is the kind of reformation that, as a rule, only lasts between drunks, and it does not in any appreciable degree diminish that ever-flowing, ever-swelling torrent of dissipation that is destroying society, and bearing in its turbid, swollen flood millions of human beings to the great ocean of despair. It is, of course, highly creditable to these tender-hearted and sympathetic enthusiasts that they shall rescue here and there a drowning soul, and here and there prevent some one from throwing himself into the seething flood. It is probable that the sporadic agitations to which we refer may help to mould public opinion, and in time—but, oh, how long a time!—succeed in diminishing the traffic in, and drinking of, ardent spirits, by moral suasion.

Temperance revivals are like the religious revivals that the wandering mendicant evangelists occasionally stir up in our community. Mountebank revivalists convince some very good people that they make some very bad people love God by fearing the devil, and induce them to put forth earnest endeavors to reach heaven because they are afraid of hell. It demands the aid of God to induce the sinner to hate sin. Nothing less than the Divine Power can work the miracle that makes the toper hate his gin. Sometimes the man of strong mind and earnest resolve, through manly pride and love of wife and children, can cure himself of the disease of drink. If the United States of America ever put away from itself this evil; if the American people ever succeed in driving this fiend from their midst, it will be by the exercise of their highest power. It will not be by prayers, or orations, or personal pledges, or eloquent appeals addressed to or in behalf of the dram drinker, but it will be by the exercise of political power through the ballot-box, in securing such laws as will make drunkenness and dissipation impossible; local option and prohibitory laws; laws punishing the man who manufactures and sells alcoholic drink, as we now punish the man who sells poison without a label, or who imposes deleterious drugs upon the consumer; laws that will make the gin dealer bear the burdens that he imposes upon society; laws that will tax the manufacturer of alcohol for the cost of supporting the paupers and criminals he makes; laws that will wrench, by licenses, from the corner grocery and the fashionable saloon enough money to compensate society for its cost in supporting their victims. Or, what is better, and what we hope in time will be accomplished, a law that will punish by fine and imprisonment, by confiscation of goods, and loss of personal liberty, every man who manufactures, or who retails alcoholic drinks. If alcoholic stimulant is necessary, let the Government manufacture it, and in every community let there be one licensed druggist of unquestionable character to dispense it under the severest rules, and at a cost that would enable only very rich men to indulge in the peculiar diseases that would demand a prescription of gin cocktails, rum punch, whisky skin, or brandy straight.

Such a law, properly enforced in the United States of America, would, in ten years, make it the wealthiest nation in the world. It would add $1,200,000,000 annually to the wealth of our community. It would save other and uncounted millions in dispensing with prisons, asylums, hospitals, and poor houses. It would cheapen bread and meat, multiply the luxuries of life, bring the necessities of food and clothing within the reach of four hours’ daily labor, and would dispense with half the courts and send to the exile of honest labor half the judges and lawyers. It would multiply the pleasures of domestic life and divide the cares, burdens, and anxieties that now oppress every man’s existence. It would steal away half the preachers’ vocation, and half the churches might be turned into school houses. It would be death to the whole tribe of small politicians that now infest our cities, and would, if such a millennium of intelligence could be brought about, give the ARGONAUT a large circulation and a first-class advertising patronage. But it won’t come. That is, it won’t come this year; and while the male readers of the ARGONAUT who peruse this long article will admit that it is true, two-thirds of them will wash it down at Collins’ or the Pantheon, nodding to each other, “Here’s luck.”

A young man in Boston received a bequest of $25,000. He had been poor, and the sudden acquisition of wealth rather turned his head. He began to spend the money in reckless dissipation, in spite of the efforts of his father to restrain him, and kept on until only $11,000 was left. The father begged that this remainder might be given to him for safe-keeping, and the son, being then ill from long drunkenness, and very penitent, readily complied. The father put $10,950 into a pocket in his shirt, and started out to spend the other $50 in a frolic. That night he slept on a bench in a barroom, and in the morning every cent of the money was gone.

It is sad to see so many walk in the dark themselves who carry lanterns for others.

WHO WAS HE?

He looked exactly like the "Senator" of the never-to-be-forgotten "Dodge Club," and it always seemed to me a startling paradox that he should be the mildest man I ever knew. Perhaps it was because I shared the popular prejudice against slayers and purveyors of meat, and was looking for a blood-thirstiness which did not exist. And truly, he wasn't a butcher at all; only the man who drove the butcher's canvas-covered wagon thrice a week to all the back doors in the neighborhood. And because we lived "ten miles from a lemon," we not only accepted patiently his mutinous lamb and tough steaks, but were glad to converse with him on the weather and kindred topics.

The Senator—for so I dubbed him in our family circle, and to this day I don't know his real name—had a soft voice and a vivid German accent, which made his remarks rather pleasant than profitable; but he won my gratitude by sundry bony attentions to my Scotch collie, and my admiration by his imperturbable self-possession, so I was more than willing to believe that his indistinct utterances were replete with wisdom.

For nearly two years our faithful Senator had made his tri-weekly visit, come rain or shine, and we had, in that time, become vaguely attached to him, just as any creatures of routine become attached to the wheels and bolts of their treadmill. He disposed of two or three superfluous dogs for us—that made our bond of union. I always felt a little queer about those dogs, too. Why should a meat-vender be so willing to take useless dog-flesh into his possession? The "Czar" was all right, he was wanted to stand guard; but "Pug," the fat little puppy—do you think?—could it be? But no—perish the dark suspicion! At any rate, I won't believe the Senator had anything to do with the disposal of my canine favorites.

One day Aunt Susan came in with a portentous air. "Our butcher is going away."

We all looked up with the gaping wonder which over-spreads a rustic face at the slightest hint of "news." Without speaking, we said, "More, more."

"He has made a lot of money in Sierra Nevada," this sensation-monger went on. Our interest deepened.

"A lot of money" was delightful. It left room for the wildest fancy. In an instant, the "Senator's" bank account shot up into the millions' column. Besides, we had held a few blanks in the same lottery ourselves, and that seemed to give us a sort of hold on the man who had won a prize. But we were all glad to hear of our solemn friend's success, and were only withheld by modesty from rushing out to congratulate him.

The next week, a young fellow with a face like a plum-pudding, jumped down from the canvas-backed wagon, and Arcadia knew the "Senator" no more. But, in the mean time, the most gorgeous rumors were afloat. He had made fifty thousand, a hundred thousand, five hundred thousand dollars! There was no limit to the speculations, for the Senator had been discreet. The story with its variations made a nine days' wonder, and then something else took its place.

About a month later, I was crossing the court of the Palace Hotel one day, with my friend Mrs. Vivienne, when I caught sight of a familiar face. I did not know the suspiciously new tweed suit, but surely that profile was the Senator's. We passed close by him. I turned to look again, and my surmise became a certainty. At the same moment I fancied that a gleam of recognition came into his eyes, and I bowed hurriedly. One could do no less than bow to a man who had just come into a fortune, even if the man had once served one with rib-roasts. Of course we make a distinction. In Arcadia we speak to everybody we meet (except the tramps), but we leave our Arcadian courtesy behind us when we go into fashionable society. Mrs. Vivienne's curiosity was roused at once. "Who's your lean friend?" she asked, in careless travesty of Beau Brummell's famous question. I think I must have blushed a little, for I was a trifle embarrassed at my own condescension, and weak enough to care what Mrs. Vivienne would think. She opened her pretty eyes very wide. "You may as well make a clean breast of it," she laughed. Whereupon I recovered my self-possession.

"It's a romantic episode," I said gravely. And on the way out to the park I told her the whole story.

"If we meet him again you shall introduce me," she declared when I had finished.

"Cui bono?"

"I shall bring him out in society. We need a sensation. He shall furnish it."

"But you don't know—I don't know anything of the man's antecedents," I expostulated.

"Antecedents!" repeated this singular woman, scornfully, and then she laughed—a little, gurgling laugh. "Why, you dear old fossil, who wants to know anything about a man's antecedents when he is prosperous? Nobody, in polite society. We leave that for sensational newspapers like the Daily Wasel and that kind. We 'nice people' know better than to begin digging up 'antecedents'; in fact, we cover them decently with mould whenever we see them sticking out. In the bosom of our families of course we can talk about our neighbor's grandfather, but nowhere else. You say your butcher was an honest butcher and never made sausages out of tabooed material?"

I stifled my misgivings regarding Pug, and bravely said, "Yes."

"Good. Nobody need know of his former occupation. I shall create a pedigree for him. Objections are useless. Now let us talk of something else." And we did.

I confess that I was more amused than concerned at Mrs. Vivienne's wild freak, for I never expected to see the man again. But fate was against me; for the very next time I called to see my madcap friend she begged me to go with her through some shopping ordeal that must be endured that day. As we stepped into the elevator, behold—the Senator! Mrs. Vivienne pinched my arm maliciously. "Quick—now," she whispered.

Then it suddenly flashed across me that I didn't know his name.

"Ah, how d'ye do?" I murmured, by way of a starter. The Senator bowed unsmilingly, and his lips moved, but I heard so sound therefrom.

"Are you living in the city now?" I said, blandly.

"Ye-es," he answered, with a soft prolongation which gave the word the form of half a dozen affirmations. Another cautionary pinch. We were nearly to the bottom now.

"Ah—Mrs. Vivienne, let me present Mr. Grimm," I stammered, with a happy inspiration drawn from his preternaturally solemn countenance.

As we stumbled out into the gloomy vestibule Mrs. Vivienne took possession of Mr. "Grimm," and before we reached the carriage had asked him to call on her. I must have looked as helpless as I felt, for, as we drove away, my companion laughed till she cried, and then dried her eyes charmingly with her tiny be-scalloped handkerchief. "Now, we shall see what we shall see," she said, triumphantly.

I tried to remonstrate with her—I lay much unction to my soul when I remember that—but my words were all thrown away.

"I am so glad you don't know how much he is worth," she murmured, in the very midst of my harangue; "it gives me such a wide field for my imagination." And then I stopped. What was the use of arguing with a woman like this?

"Well," I said, finally, "the man will never come to see you, but at any rate I wash my hands of the whole affair."

"Not all the perfumes of Arabia could cleanse you from complicity," she said, with a cool inconsistency worthy her sex. "I shall hold you responsible for your friend." And so we parted.

I knew "the king could do no wrong." Brave and fearless as was Mrs. Frank Vivienne, her eccentricities never made her "fast." Born in the purple, she was sure of her position. She did not have to clutch at Mrs. This, or That's skirt-hem to hold herself up, or play at the pretty social game of "follow the leader" to keep in the fairy ring. Her husband was rich and adored her; humoring her whims with a grave enjoyment which included perfect trust of his wife. She had a clever little head, and was an insatiable character-student, but her thirst for new subjects to dissect led her into many an awkward predicament.

She held in cool contempt the surface-show and struggles of the new-born aristocracy, for she was a sturdy little republican herself. And the moths fluttering around her saw only the flickering, wayward flame; they could not know what a steady glow burned at its heart. That there are so few women like her must be my apology for waxing enthusiastic.

Certainly there was nothing very praiseworthy about this last freak, and I was thoroughly out of patience when, two or three weeks after our conversation, I finished reading the following letter:

DEAR T.:—I am a happy woman, for I'm having my own way. Mr. Grimm took dinner with us yesterday, and I carried him off to Mrs. Pennington's party afterward. They are comparatively new people, and I thought it best to see how he would float in a pond before launching him out on the big, frothy ocean. Any friend of mine would be welcome at Mrs. P.'s. In fact, solecisms of manners or morals rather impress than disgust them with the fashionable world. Isn't it delicious? Not that Mr. Grimm ever does anything dreadful. He is surely correct in his department, and altogether quite charming. Such a placid creature couldn't blunder if he tried. I know you hate details, so I won't tell you how I came to have my own way. But one thing I must say: Frank, always the perfection of husbands, has been in this matter more than usually adorable. My interest in my millionaire grows with every hour, like Jack's beanstalk. He is mysterious. I don't try to find out anything about him. I don't want to know. It would destroy all my illusions. I confess that at first I felt a delicacy in mentioning roast beef to him, and I positively shuddered when Frank spoke of taking a stroll through the markets, but Mr. Grimm merely nodded and stroked his beard. "Ye-es, dey is ferry purty, de markets," he said slowly, in the most unembarrassed manner. I don't believe anything could disconcert that man. He's the embodiment of repose. Talk of the refining influence of "birth and culture!" My protégé sweeps away those musty traditions in an hour. I must admit that he doesn't shine in conversation, but—"silence is golden." To-morrow night we go to the Art Reception together. Shades of Raphael and Da Vinci, preserve us! No, I'm not tired of my whim, but I know that you are tired of me; so I baste to sign myself, Yours, contentedly, R. V.

What an anomaly a woman is, I thought as I refolded the dainty, perfumed sheets. When her life is already overcrowded with interest and amusement, she must, forsooth, take in hand a barbarian to tame. However, I thought I had a clue to the enigma, and my next letter from Mrs. Vivienne proved me correct in my conclusions.

I am still enjoying myself immensely (she wrote). Mr. Grimm is now the center of a shining circle of admirers. Mrs. Trellis is angling for him for one of her petite daughters; in fact, the fish are nibbling all along the line. And I have not one conscience pang—not one. These harpies of society who make the air pestilent with their obsequious breath, with their fawning, and flattery, and gossip, are so unpleasant to me that I take an innocent pleasure in seeing them discomfited, as they undoubtedly will be in this case. I shall take care of that. You know that if I should propose a game of "hop-scotch," as a choice evening recreation, they would swear it was the most graceful thing ever invented; and all because my family thread is gilded as far back as my great-grandfather. The aristocracy of republicanism is certainly a very curious one.

But I began to tell you about my friend, Mr. Grimm, and not to lecture on social problems. Return we now to our muttons. I am quite sure that in a previous state of existence our friend was the seneschal of some solemn, mediæval German baron, and assisted at all the funeral and marriage rites of the ancestral castle. He accepts all our attentions with a dignified—what shall I call it?—forbearance, which wins my highest respect. He comes often to see us, but is never intrusive. He sighs much, whether from dyspepsia or unrequited love I have not yet discovered; and he sits and looks at me in a melancholy way for half an hour at a time. Strange to say, it doesn't annoy me; perhaps because I don't regard him as a real personage at all, only a creation of my own idle brain. Yours, R. V.

P. S.—Of all the young ladies in our galaxy of beauty, who do you suppose has most impressed Mr. Grimm? No less than poor little Nora Kelsey. And I think the child is actually flattered by his evident preference. She leads such a dog's life with that old Mogul of an aunt of hers that almost any fate would seem bright beside it. She is a pretty, lovable girl, without stamina enough to break loose from her fetters. But such girls grow desperate sometimes, and to their minds there is only one solution of their difficulties—marriage. I'm afraid—

And so the letter ended. I was "afraid," too, but just then circumstances compelled me to take a trip to the South, and I had no time to interfere even if I had chosen to do so.

I was gone a month. On my return I found some very queer news awaiting me, and also a letter from Mrs. Vivienne, which I give entire:

MY DEAR CHILD:—I am about to confide to you a secret. Guard it religiously. Mr. Grimm has proposed to Nora, and she has accepted him! (What would I not give for that proposal verbatim, but there is no use in wishing for impossibilities.) My mind is at present a mixture of emotions, but I have given the happy pair my benediction and you must do the same. Nora is not strictly "in love," but Herr Grimm is placidly devoted, and I dare say they will be happier than two-thirds of the "romance" couples.

By the way, I must endeavor, before the wedding, to discover his real name. We must have approached it somewhat in sound, else he would not answer to it so readily.

How the Trellis girls will gnash their teeth—metaphorically—when the engagement is announced. Old Mrs. Melrose, the aunt, treats Nora like a princess now; and since Mr. Grimm has been devoted, other men have found out that she is "really a very charming girl, you know." That is so natural, isn't it? I feel so proud to think that I discovered her long ago, but that's only another proof of my superior sagacity. For Nora's sake I must now transform myself into a private detective, and get some statistics of The Fortune. Can you help me? He really seems to be a very good man aside from his Jacques-like melancholy.

I've been sounding him on his memories of the Fatherland, but he is rather reticent. Came from near Stuttgart, he says. That reads well, doesn't it? Pray consult the records of M., and let me know the result. Yours, etc., etc., R. V.

I stood not on the order of going, but went at once into Mrs. Vivienne's presence. Found her looking rather distrain and uncomfortable.

"Mr. Grimm"—I began, glancing around as if I expected to see him emerging from a window curtain or fire screen.

"Has vanished," interrupted Mrs. Vivienne, impatiently; "gone, departed, floated off, nobody knows where. Have you come to tell me that he has returned to his cart and scales?"

I shook my head despondently. How could I tell her the more dreadful truth?

"Did you get my last letter?" she said, abruptly. I just nodded.

"Well, if you will please stop bobbing your head like a toy mandarin, I'll tell you the rest of the story, and then you can deliver the sermon which I know you are dying to preach. Nora and her fiancé had an engagement to go with us to the theatre. We waited until half past eight for them, and then went alone. On my way up to see Nora, early the next morning, I met her coming to me. She had not seen our recreant knight of the cleaver since the appointment had been made two days before. Frack has made inquiries in every direction, but can find no trace of the lost man.

"I am attired in sackcloth and ashes of the deepest penitence, and my only comfort lies in the fact that Nora doesn't seem to feel as badly as she ought. I believe that, in her heart of hearts, she is slightly relieved. But all the same, I'm going to take her to Europe with us. She can never go back to that old woman. We had a scene—really a scene—with her yesterday." And Mrs. Vivienne sighed. "We shall only anticipate our departure by a few weeks, for we had intended to start in March, you know.

"One thing, nobody knows of the engagement, so there won't be any unnecessary fibs to tell. For myself, I'm glad that my adventure ended as it did. I had exhausted my study of the German character, and romantic uncertainty is much better than matter-of-fact reality."

How incorrigible she was.

"But I'm sorry," she went on—"don't dare to look as if you thought I wasn't—and I never will do such a thing again; never, never. If your butcher comes back—"

"But he wasn't my butcher," I gasped; "it's a case of mistaken identity. I found out yesterday that our butcher sailed for Germany two months ago, to see his mother and spend his twenty thousand dollars as becomes an honest man. I might have known." I added severely, "that he would have had more sense than to aspire to social distinction in San Francisco."

"Are you quite sure that he went?" said Mrs. Vivienne, who had looked at first bewildered and then incredulous.

"I have positive proof," I answered bravely; and then I faltered, "I'm very sorry, but you know I'm so stupid about remembering faces that I might easily make such a mistake."

The truth is, I was perfectly aghast at the wide circle of waves my own tiny pebble had made, and while I was aching to scold the whimsical creature before me, I could not do it consistently, for was I not the primary cause of the mischief?

We sat looking at each other for a long time in silence. At last Mrs. Vivienne said sharply: "Well, if he wasn't your butcher, who was he?"

And I can only echo her inquiry. Q. T. SAN FRANCISCO, January 20, 1879.

Help!! Henry Worn, a handsome young ex-San Franciscan, has been chased half over the country by a young woman who wants to marry him, and he is pretty nearly worn out. The female Danite's name is Anna Morris, and she is a woman of pluck, who endeavors to enforce her wishes at the point of the pistol. Seven years ago Worn met Anna in San Francisco; she was nineteen years old, had black eyes and blonde hair, boarded on Sixth Street, and captured Henry's heart. He was in easy circumstances, courted her two years, arranged to get married, lavished about $7,000 on her, and then found out she was false, awfully false. Then he went to New York, Buffalo, Cleveland, Louisville, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Detroit, and Oshkosh, but Anna still pursued him, and hunted him out again and again. Then Henry started a tannery in Chicago, only to find her standing on the steps of the post-office when he went in to get his mail. She smiled sweetly, said she wanted him to marry her; would give him ten days to think about it, and if he didn't come to time she'd have his gore. Then they parted. At three o'clock that afternoon they met again outside the Sherman House. She spoke again. He said he wasn't matrimonially inclined; and then she drew a revolver, and held it up so that he could look down the barrel. He seized her arm, and she dropped the weapon, but picked it up again and made off. Worn says he's had enough of this thing now, and is going to stab her through the corset or have her arrested if she ever turns up again.

Two ladies met on the street and one inquired of the other: "Why, you look very happy this morning. What's happened?" "Oh, I've just been up having my fortune told," was the reply, "and the woman says I'm to marry twice more, have diamonds and a camel's hair shawl, and that I can go to the opera six nights in the week, if I want to." "Dear me, I don't wonder that you are happy. But you won't say anything to your husband?" "Oh, of course not. Poor man! He's good to me, and it might hurt his feelings to know that I am going to marry twice more. I think I'll tell him that I'm likely to die first."

We can hardly restrain our tears on reading in a Kalamazoo paper that the icy hand of the pale horse has been laid on one of the best citizens of that unhappy city.

Some mourn more the shame which sin brings than the sin which brings the shame.

IS HE A REFORMER OR A FRAUD?

The patient and observing countryman who reads the city papers must, of necessity, become a little mystified by the numerous and conflicting accounts which he reads of Denis Kearney; and the question naturally arises in our minds, Is he a reformer or a fraud?

He certainly has attained notoriety; and whether that notoriety is to make him famous or infamous is a mystery of the future. The man who can control a great number of people, and compel them to do as he directs, certainly has some element about him which raises him above the common herd of Irish politicians and pot-house blatherskites. Are we not therefore, of the interior, justified in investigating a man who is destined to cut an important figure in the future politics of the State as the representative of his class, either in the councils of the nation or the cells of the penitentiary.

From his first appearance on the sand-lots he has impressed me as being a stupendous fraud. I have heard him there; I have read his speeches; and if he was possessed of the least genius I would confess it and give him credit, for I like the great native genius that makes great men out of those of humble origin; but Kearney lacks everything that tends to greatness. He has never uttered a sentence by which he proposed to relieve the workmen of California. He has never offered a plan to better the condition of his class. He has never intimated the mode or manner of reducing State, county, or municipal expenses. He has never suggested a measure of reform—political, social, or moral; but has contented himself by attempting to influence the passions of an ignorant rabble, and pander to the prejudice of a foolish, blundering, harmless mob.

What would you think, Mr. Editor, if sickness in your family compelled you to call in the most accessible physician to relieve a dangerous malady, and immediately upon his arrival he would commence to denounce the cause of the disease, and members of your family for some omission which encouraged the complaint? You would be apt to say, "Doctor, can't you give us a remedy—we have already discovered the cause of the complaint; we want relief." And if should answer, that "the slimy imps of hell" of your family who did not apply a blister in time ought to be hung, or that "the hellbound villains" who left the door open and exposed the patient to the inclemency of the weather ought to have their throats cut, you would be apt to boot him out of the house, and send for a doctor who had some decency and could afford you some relief. If there is such great distress among the laboring men, and such mighty corruption in public affairs, we want to first know the fact, and then let some honest and capable man point out the remedy; the people are not satisfied with the blundering twaddle of a foul-mouthed ignoramus. They want a man of decency to lead them out of the wilderness of misfortune and corruption.

We are told that history repeats itself, and that great natural causes in all ages produce like results; but I am becoming decidedly skeptical on this subject. I have read with a great deal of care "Gibbon's Rome," in which may be found many incidents which resemble modern events, a vivid picture is drawn of the literary embellishments of the "Augustan age," and the gradual decline and fall of that mighty empire. The plebeians were oppressed—they were slaves—they were finally liberated and given a voice in the management of their government. Great men sprang from their ranks, but I have failed to discover in the ranks of the plebeian, or the vicissitudes of that mighty nation and festering pools of its governmental corruption, a likeness to this sand-lot monstrosity.

Thiers' history of the French Revolution discloses some monsters in human form. St. Just was a sanguinary fiend, but he was brave; Marat was a wild, unscrupulous enthusiast, but he was intelligent; Robespierre and Danton were cruel, but they were great minds dethroned by the blood and madness of revolution; but in all that great throng of erratic Frenchmen there was no prototype for Denis Kearney. And if the maxim be true, we must admit that in all the upheavals of governments, states, and communities, there has never yet been a popular commotion that penetrated sufficiently the sinks and sewers of society to bring to the surface, with its kindred filth, a being like the sand-lot fraud.

We contribute to future history a matchless fraud, without brains, honesty, courage, or common decency; who whines like a whipped cur when incarcerated for his crimes, and trembles for fear of punishment for his offenses against order and society; who preaches sedition on the sand-lots, and vanishes like a fleeing shadow at the sight of a policeman; who crosses the continent in search of money and notoriety, plethoric with wind and conceit, to be kicked and spurned by his fellow-workmen, and return with the disgusting flip-flap of a bursted bladder to beg his daily subsistence from his deluded followers. It is possible that such upstarts have lived before, but space in history was so superior to their individual worth, that they passed into oblivion, as Kearney will, without even a line to perpetuate their nothingness. Yet his utter worthlessness and degradation gives him followers. If he were more intelligent, and could address himself to the judgment of men, his admiring mob would see no virtue in him. As a leader we must deal with him. Odious as it is, his crowd forms a part of the body politic. Our government is governed by numbers, and a demagogue fresh from the Constitutional Convention, or a tramp from the sand-lots, has as much power in the formation of our institutions as the most intelligent citizen. Senator Thurman said a few days since that wealth and intelligence would govern. I doubt if he intended this remark to apply to the sons of Erin. He was speaking of the negro population of the South, and some say superior to the motley crowd that assembles at the sand-lots.

In the country we are anxious to know what the people of San Francisco will do at the next municipal election. Will they sacrifice everything, as they did at the election for delegates for the Constitutional Convention? Shall it be said of a city of unrivaled wealth and matchless intelligence, that a band of tramps control your affairs? And that the "boss" tramp has been licensed to levy a forced loan upon her wealthiest citizens? Defeat this crowd, and Kearney will return to his dray, his mission will be ended, and he can sit upon the "tail of his cart," and contemplate the uncertain greatness of a foul-mouthed, blatant demagogue.

RED BLUFF, January 20, 1879.

A NATIVE.

A DEER HUNT.

While o'er the camp the stars still shine,
Our mustangs breast the steep incline
To where Dark Cañon takes its rise
Along the flanks of Tamalpais.
There each his stand at break of day,
With gun in hand will guard the way.
Far down the sombre mountain's side
A redwood stands in lonely pride,
And there a comrade waits to see
The signal made the dogs to free.
It comes! And plunging headlong on Go Rover, Sport, and Honest John.
Their noisy rush sounds up the hill;
A moment more, then all is still.
Sharp lined, the light of morning's sun
Creeps down the hillsides one by one.
Below a slope of chenical
A bustling patch of chaparral
Surrounds in part a grassy glade,
By mountain springs all fresh arrayed.
The eye its beauty scarce has seen
When from its midst of vivid green,
As sudden as to magic due,
A lordly buck stands full in view.
His stately head with antlers crowned,
Proud neck, deep chest, and body round,
Clean limbs, smooth coat, and bearing free,
Would thrill a hunter's heart to see.
But bark! A note prolonged and clear,
Though far and faint, falls on the ear.
Again, and louder swells the sound
The cañon's rocky walls resound;
The answering cries reëcho back—
Old Honest John is on the track.
With frightened snort and mighty bound
The swift feet spurn the yielding ground.
Now thickets hide the buck from sight,
But crashing branches mark his flight.
Now to the left his pathway tends—
A shot! A miss! His course he bends
In terror at the dreadful sound—
Bewildered seeks the open ground.
The ready rifle rings once more—
A heavy plunge! The chase is o'er!
SACRAMENTO, Jan. 20, 1879. GEO. CHISHMORE.

The Devil Fishing.

The devil sat by the river's side—
The stream of Time, where you'll always find him—
Casting his line in the rushing tide,
And landing the fish on the bank behind him.

He sat at ease in a cosy nook,
And was filling his basket very fast;
While you might have seen that his deadly hook
Was differently baited for every cast.

He caught 'em as fast as a man could count;
Little or big, it was all the same.
One bait was a cheque for a round amount;
An Assemblyman nabbed it, and out he came.

He took a gem that as Saturn shone;
It sank in the water without a sound,
And caught a woman who long was known
As the best and purest for miles around.

Sometimes he would laugh, and sometimes sing,
For better luck no one could wish;
And he seemed to know, to a dead sure thing,
The bait best suited to every fish.

Quoth Satan: "The fishing is rare and fine!"
And he took a drink, somewhat enthused;
And yet a parson swam round the line
That e'en the most tempting of baits refused.

He tried with his gold and his flashing gems,
Hung fame and fortune upon the line,
Dressing gowns with embroidered hemms,
But still the Dominic made no sign.

A woman's garter went on the hook;
"I have him at last," quoth the devil, brightening;
Then Satan's sides with laughter shook,
And he landed the preacher as quick as lightning.
VIRGINIA CITY, January 22, 1879. SAM DAVIS.

To the Elephant—An Ode.

Grave giant, placid pachyderm,
Tremendous be our every term
What time the timid muse makes mention
Of thine immeasurable distention!
Calm champion of land and sea,
Impervious monstrosity,
The Median king, turned out to grass,
Had gulped his end to see thee pass;
Great Jupiter upon all-four
Had, bellowing, swooned thy bulk before.
Pigmean eye, enormous ear,
What wait they now to see and hear?
Ay, what lone widow's only son
Shall tempt thee next, Revengeful One?
Be our tobacco far from thee,
O mountain with a memory!
Wise mammoth, tell us, we implore,
What brought thee to this Western shore?
At thy last, solemn sprawl of doom,
How shall America make room?
And where's our bard efficient half
To grapple with thine epitaph?

O thou that sleepest perpendicular,
What is thy purpose in particular?
Gray, pagon-pampered ponderosity,
Incomparable in thy callosity,
Beast of the dread, aqueineal pendant,
I fear for that begrimed attendant.
Thy cerebellum yields renown
For simple feat of sitting down.
Grim, ivoryed immensity,
Forego thy "show" propensity;
In awful awkwardness tread on—
To Broddingnagian realms beyond.

Thou capering, circus Chimborazo,
How can unbounded vastness act so?
Rhinceros plus "potamus,"
Colossal, O colossal "euss!"
SACRAMENTO, Jan. 20, 1879. JOHN VANCE CHENEY.

The Scientific American has just discovered a new substance called uranine, a single grain of which will color three hundred gallons of water. This will be glorious news to the makers of circus lemonade.

FEMININE FACTS.

It is just as easy to love a rich girl as a poor one.

How did it leak out that Clara Louise Kellogg likes onions?

An engaged girl may safely be called silence—she gives consent.

Mrs. Babbitt wears $280,000 worth of diamonds. Her husband has the "soap," you know.

Queen Elizabeth had 1,500 dresses at the time of her death. And yet Bessie always dressed ruff.

Tea contains tannic acid, which combines with milk and forms leather; and now we know what makes old maids so tough.

Carrie Cahill challenges any woman to "play her on the banjo for $100 a side." Why does Carrie want to be played on the banjo?

A boarding house mistress, like the rest of us, has her weak and strong points—the weak being her coffee, and her strong the butter.

Milton was asked if he intended to instruct his daughter in the different languages, to which he replied: "No, sir; one tongue is sufficient for a woman."

The average woman is composed of two hundred and forty-three bones, one hundred and sixty-nine muscles, twenty-one old newspapers, and two hundred and ten hair-pins.

"Father," said a wishful lass, about sixteen years of age, "I know something about grammar, but I can not decline matrimony, nor see the reason why myself and Gilbert can not be conjugated?"

"Mariah! Mariah! please let me in," said a man to his wife, who was looking out of the window watching him trying to open the door with a toothpick. "I sh tread on my key and it's all flattened out."

There is nothing in the world half so beautiful, half so intrinsically good as a "nice girl." She is the sweetest flower in the path of life. There are others far more gorgeous, but these we merely admire as we go by.

A Chicago girl had her ears frozen a few days ago. She has begun making contracts with carpenters to build sheds over them in the spring. It must be known that frozen ears drop off when the sun becomes very warm.

Russian ladies are often inveterate smokers of cigarettes, and at railway stations, and other points of transit, scratch their matches on walls or posts like men. They frequently ask men for a light from their cigars, and are asked in return.

Female artists are invading the domain of art in France in formidable numbers. In 1874 there were 286 female exhibitors at the Salon. There were 312 in 1875, 446 in 1876, 648 in 1877, and 762 in 1878.

A preacher in Kentucky the other Sunday, becoming exasperated, paused in his discourse to say: "Ladies, if you will give me your attention I will keep a lookout on that door, and if anything worse than a man enters I will warn you in time to make your escape."

The wife of Captain Richard Burton, the great traveler, is almost as remarkable as himself. She accompanies him in his journeys. They are now living at Trieste, and every day Mrs. Burton swims two hours in the Adriatic Sea and takes broadsword exercise from a German trooper.

An Oil City young lady is fastidious to a fault. She recently discontinued her attendance at church, and gave as a reason for so doing that the minister's pants were too short for him, and her mind was continually diverted from religious thoughts by a feverish longing to have the abbreviated garments lowered a trifle. The particular thing.

Mrs. H. L. Brinkley, who some years since had an extensive newspaper notoriety, and who since the Brinkley trial has been actress and lecturer, has recently written a book entitled, A Woman's Thoughts about Men. The work treats of all sorts of men, and the various subjects are handled without gloves. It deals with sensational topics in a sensational manner.

Girls, if you want to encourage young men, get an album. It's the first thing a bashful young man grabs when he enters a strange house where there are girls. We've seen them look through one until they knew every picture by heart, from page one to General Grant in the back part. It's wonderful what interest a bashful man will take in a girl's grandmother and pug-nosed uncle at the first visit.

A lady named Mary Magui-ah
Had trouble in lighting her fi-ah;
The wood being green,
She used kerosene—
(Pause. Then continue, solemnly.)
She has gone where the fuel is dri-ah.

"Are you the saleswoman of whom I bought this handkerchief yesterday?" asked a purchaser at one of our dry goods stores. "I am the saleslady who served you, madam," responded the reduced Empress in banged hair, long watch-chain and ringed finger, who presided at the counter. "Well," said the customer, "I will take a dozen more, and, as I wish to get them to my wash-lady at once, I will get you to send them to my carriage round the corner. My coach gentleman cannot get to the door just now for the cart of the ash-aristocrat."

The following interesting advertisement is translated from the Paris Figaro:

Mme. BOSQUET, r. Gerando, 3.
15 orp. 18 a 26 a., 30 a 400,000 f.
9 Diles. 17 a 38 a., 40 a 600,000 f.
19 Ves. 25 a 55 a., 30 a 700,000 f.

Which is, being interpreted, "Mme. Bosquet, 3 Rue Gerando, has in stock 16 orphans from 18 to 26 years old, with fortunes of from $6,000 to $80,000; 9 spinsters from 10 to 18, with from $8,000 to $180,000, and 19 widows, 25 from $6,000 to $140,000."

SUBURBAN SAUCE.

Served Direct from the Dish by a Society Ladle.

OAKLAND, January 23, 1879.

MY DEAR SUTTER STREET JUNO:—I have made up my mind to write you a bit of a letter, though I know before it reaches you I shall have seen you fifty times. These Oakland mails are such an abomination. I wonder sometimes if the letters for San Francisco are not detained at the post office here and sent over by the first clerk that can be conveniently spared to visit that metropolis; or, perhaps, like one's waste paper, they are kept until a sufficient quantity has accumulated to make it an object to arrange some method for their disposal. Anyway, the matter needs reform. I know you are laughing now, and thinking that I am a trifle vicious and haven't yet quite recovered my equanimity in not receiving in time the V.'s invitation to meet the handsome literary General; but, Juno, I have one thought about that affair that does, after all, console me a little bit. I'll admit, in the first place, the invitation was in itself most satisfactory. It was to me just a huge sugar-plum. I read and re-read it, dwelling with smacking lips over the covert compliment conveyed in its wording. Say, now, Ju., could you have been insensible to the flattery of being told that a man, the most brilliant in town, was being invited especially to meet you? But, in the midst of my Belshazzar's feast, the handwriting on the wall appeared. Vividly there arose before me the scornful, mocking face of the illustrious military scribe on the introduction of two such inconsequents as Brother Bob and I. Such a literary lion as he surely had a right to expect, as the guest of the evening, creatures of equal size to himself. That being his prerogative, I will not question it. I only cavil at the ill-judgment that could have induced the V.'s to thrust Bob and me forward so, and to feel thankful, after all, for the delay in mail which caused our absence. I have come to the conclusion that the trait most to be admired in woman is unconsciousness. If I only possessed that claim I could have gone there serene and unquestioning. Do you know another place where my heart often fails me? It is in running the gauntlet of men that swarm on the Oakland boats, particularly the 4:30 and 5 o'clock trips. They fairly blanch one's cheek, those stony gazes, before the stairway can be gained. Impertinent? Not exactly. They are launched out on a voyage of discovery and are only curious. In fact, they form a sect by themselves—a body of male Evangelines. I think we will have to coin a new word for them, and call them "Questers." Now, if one can only keep one's wits about her sufficiently to concede them a good square look into the depths of her eyes, remembering, though, to let the whole indignant soul rise up in arms in that single look, making it impressive and decided, why, I assure you they will not trouble you; they will be satisfied, 'pon honor they will; they only need a little dissuasion, these gentlemen. Their questionable occupation is dignified by the glory that naturally accrues to the successful. In looking about at the swarm of young men on the boat one can hardly believe that the war cry of the Oakland young ladies, that there are no gentlemen here, can have any earnestness about it. It seems like the cry of famine in the midst of plenty. Now there is Nelly Manning—you remember her at school—came pouting to me the other day. Said she: "They talk about the financial outlook being such a miserable one; I think the matrimonial for us girls is twice as dreary and heartrending." That's a fact. We all know it. "A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind" and pitiful. I feel sometimes as though I would put myself in the breach and offer a remedy—issue a call something like this:

Spring Campaign. Rally! Rally! Rally! May 1st, by early dawn, the unchosen fair ones of Oakland will take up their line of march to Lusk's Vineyard, then and there to offer up one rib apiece as a willing sacrifice. From this slim donation it is confidently expected that lovely stock-brokers, and head bookkeepers with adequate incomes, will be divinely reared.

N. B.—Recruits from adjoining counties solicited. The management desires to suggest that when the scene of sacrifice is reached a calm and patient spirit must pervade the ranks, thereby giving the heavenly visitants time to make a detour to Virginia City. The necessity for this measure will be seen when it is understood that the "points" gained there will be more reliable than those obtained at a later date in San Francisco; consequently insuring by this means a more solid basis for the "adequate incomes."

There, Juno, don't you think that a fine plan? Oh, what a royal revenge!—ha-ha!—when too late the society gallants will find all the desirable girls gone, and themselves bachelors by necessity and not from choice. But there is a hitch to all this, and it is just here. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating." How will all this go after it is all brought about? To what extent will I be morally culpable, and what position will I hold in the community if the happiness of all concerned is not perfected in this plan? Imagine, if you please, the discomfiture of having one's house besieged like an agency, or a police court, with complaints of this one's husband or that one's wife. The husband, a diviner nature, will be less likely to be the erring one, and you know there is nothing that makes a woman so mad as to have a husband who is always in the right. Then, too, aside from any domestic infelicity they may experience, they will have in business the superior craftiness and worldly wisdom of their own sex to encounter and circumvent. Oh, my poor lambs among the wolves, I perhaps sacrifice ye to benefit my own life! I can think of but one plan that may obviate all difficulty—that it be obligatory for the lady recruits to come around with certificates of shrewdness and amiability, the former to be attested by the State Board of Examiners, and the latter by a member of the family, brother preferred. By the way, Bob says I can whistle for mine. You see in this way congenial and helpful partners can be guaranteed for the men. Of course, in view of the recent disclosures of the fraud in school certificates, this class of testimonial has been brought into great disrepute, but I think by having the original signer for the first qualification indorsed by the Governor, and that of the brother by the brother-in-law, this substantiation being as unprejudiced as any that could possibly be obtained, all objection to my plan can thus be annulled. Nothing, though, can be done until spring opens. Perhaps by that time, Juno, you, too, will be able to join us. I have not much gayety to write you of, Friendly. The last party given was New Year's night—one of the Jackson Street series. I was unable to go; but Bob tells me it was one of the prettiest parties he ever attended, the music being especially fine, Rhind introducing a sleigh-bell accompaniment to some of his numbers. I understand that the new hall on Twelfth Street is soon to be opened with a German. I have importuned Bob to make himself chummy—spending his money freely with the powers that be—as I desire an invitation! But he exhibits a degree of nonchalance on the subject that exasperates me beyond measure; and I don't dare to indulge in one of my usual tantrums that generally brings him around to my way of thinking, on account of this certificate business. I attended a wedding in San Francisco the other evening. One of the loveliest of your girls was the bride. Think of the horrible fatality that could have led her a few days previous near poison oak. There was, if not exactly death, a good deal of suffering conveyed to those who touched her fair cheek that evening. I could not but smile as the guests, one by one, gave her the usual salutation. My ire, too, was especially excited against several young gentlemen, whose rapacity and audacity in dropping into line more than once I had strenuously objected to. There was an air of fraud and unreality in the constant recurrence of the same individuals that reminded me strongly of stage battles. In the one case, it is taking an undue advantage of the public; in this case the unconscious bride was the one imposed upon. But enough of this communication. For a first attempt at writing down my nonsense I think it will do. Forgiving, as you certainly hope to be forgiven, I am your

MAID OF ATHENS (OF THE WEST).

P. S.—Next week, Providence and the weather permitting, I am going to draw you some pen pictures of the masculine fiats on the afternoon boats. M. O. A.

The Elite Directory for San Francisco and Oakland, which has been in process of publication for some months past, is at last completed, and will be ready for delivery to subscribers, through agents or booksellers, on Monday next. It is a handsome book, neatly and cleanly printed on beautifully tinted paper, and gorgeously bound in blue and gold, with edges of gilt. As a society guide and handbook it will prove invaluable to the purchaser. It contains material that will be of every day service, giving as it does the membership of the different fashionable clubs and societies, and calling and address lists, so arranged that changes of residence can readily be made; and having pages for the making out of private invitation, wedding, and calling lists. To condense its numerous points and subjects treated, we append the table of contents:

Noblesse Oblige.	Olympic Club.
San Francisco Society.	Theatre Diagrams—
Reception Days.	California.
Calling and Address List.	Baldwin.
Jewish Address List.	Bush Street.
Oakland Address List.	Standard.
Private Memoranda.	Grand Opera House.
Army Calling and Address List.	Points of Etiquette—
Navy Calling and Address List.	Introductions.
Permanent Guests at Hotels—	Salutations.
Palace.	Calls and Calling.
Grand.	Strangers in the City.
Occidental.	Visiting and Visiting Cards for
Lick.	Ladies. For Gentlemen.
Baldwin.	General Directions, Cards, etc.
Bar Association.	The Kettle-drum.
Art Association.	Parties, Balls, and Germans.
Loring Club.	Dinners and Dining Out.
Berkeley Club.	Breakfast, Luncheons, Supper.
Chit-Chat Club.	Etiquette of Weddings.
Clubs and Club Life.	Opera and Theatre Parties.
Pacific Club.	Theatre Etiquette for Gentlemen.
Union Club.	Ladies' Theatre Invitations.
Bohemian Club.	Miscellaneous Rules.
Occidental Club (Oakland).	Personnel of the Press.
San Francisco Verein.	Church Directory.
Concordia Club.	Public School Directory.
Spanish-American Club.	Shopping Reference.

From this it will be readily seen that the idea is a comprehensive one, and the manner in which it has been carried out can best be determined by individual examination. As a matter of course the book is not perfect, but it is a great improvement on the New York and Brooklyn Elite directories, the "Boston Blue Book," and works of similar description now published, and those who give it an examination will, we think, be satisfied, when the difficulties attending the getting of correct information are considered. The book can be had of A. L. Bancroft & Co., A. Roman & Co., and Billings, Harbottle & Co., and from special canvassers. The diagrams of the different theatres, as a matter of reference, are alone worth the price of the book, and this is but one of its many interesting features.

French Courtship.—Even after the engagement, lovers are never left alone; the lady's mother keeps them company; else, what would people say? Worldly-minded mothers find this à-tête-à-tête of three a great nuisance; it keeps them at home, and they will often complain that the young fledge-lings talk an unconscionable time. There can be nothing else to ensure; it is the discreetest billing and cooing ever heard since birds were birds. In its wildest excesses it never goes beyond a giggle; and if hands do meet occasionally, it is only under cover of a book, which, perhaps, if we come to the strict necessities of the case, one might hold as well as two. The lover is quite reconciled to this formal wooing, being prepared for it; and it will not last long, for an engagement seldom drags on more than a month. It was even thus with our fathers and forefathers, in so far as we can learn anything of the matter. Nothing can exceed his embarrassment when the chances of the marriage-market throw him into a family, English or American (especially American), where he is expected to make real love. It perplexes, irritates, frightens him; and when discreet friends retire and leave him and the other to themselves in awful solitude, he is embarrassed beyond measure. His theory of marriage is, however, not quite so heartless as may be supposed. It is untrue that he bargains only for money and not at all for love. He simply thinks that, the money being secured, the love is sure to come; and in that belief he is not far from right, since the majority of French marriages are happy ones.

The mind of youth can not remain empty; if you do not put into it that which is good, it will gather elsewhere that which is evil.

Though a little cold, as compared with our usual winter weather, the Saturday mornings for the two or three weeks last past have been delightfully bracing, and so many of our society people have taken advantage of the pleasures of the road and the music of the whirling wheels on the park drives. B. and I were out together the other day drinking in the champagne of the atmosphere and the exhilaration of the Cliff House and its surroundings. So clear has the weather been that the Farallones, thirty miles away, stand out distinct against the clear cut horizon line. Another curious feature of this peculiar season and weather has been the extraordinarily low tide, exposing a beautiful beach boulevard, admitting of a drive between the Cliff House and seal rocks—something that is very rarely done. It was such a pretty sight I saw from the sea verandah: the élite of the city below on the beach, in their different styles of vehicles. While I met many familiar faces I encountered many new ones. Two bewitching faces in a coupe, unknown; black horses; riding high, thus taking all possible advantage of the bracing atmosphere. There comes Mr. Livingston and niece, closely followed by Captain Beard and wife; then the four-in-hand of Mr. Finnegan—a stylish turnout. Here rushes a lovely span; how fast they go; hot in their hurry, and behind them the genial and jolly face of Charles Crocker. The equestrians seem to be having a good time, indeed. Miss Sharon looks happy, and Nickle is entertained. Miss Lord rides a pretty horse, but appears a little timid. Here is a single-footed horse we admire—that lovely Kentucky horse that Jimmy Dumphy rides. Among other equestrians we notice Mrs. Castle, Miss Bancroft, Miss Sedgwick, Miss White, Mrs. J. W. Brown, Mr. Banks, Mr. Head, "True Parisian," and our friend Mr. Phenny. Still passing, we see Bob Morrow, Robert Graves and wife (where is our four-in-hand?), Mrs. Hagan and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Low, Mr. C. W. Felton, Mrs. Loomis, Mr. Brown and daughter; Miss Slade, accompanied by Miss Low, in a "Victoria"; Colonel and Mrs. Gray, W. W. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Hooker, Captain and Mrs. Taylor, Captain Maddox and wife, Mrs. Judge Sanderson and friend, Fred Crocker and C. Frolich, Ed. Hall and wife, Will Talbot and friend, Captain Burke, Mr. A. N. Rutherford and wife, and, in this carriage, Miss Patton (Palace Hotel), Miss Hanchett, of San José. We miss Mr. Paxton, with his handsome team, and we are asked to inquire where the Palace Hotel people are with their beach wagon? Has hard times affected it and laid it up for repairs?

The third one of those very enjoyable Assemblies took place at Steinway Hall Tuesday evening, and the beauty and wealth of our city were well represented. These parties are a credit to the committee, and we hope they may be continued. The last was considered superior to previous ones in many respects, the attendance being larger and the toilets more elegant. The evident determination of the committee to make the affair a success was shown in the German being led by Mr. Currier. The most handsome toilets were worn by Mrs. Judge Sanderson, Mrs. M. Castle, Mrs. William Freeborn, Mrs. C. Cole, Mrs. M. Gray, Mrs. A. H. Rutherford, Mrs. D. Yost, and Mrs. Newlands. Among the young ladies present were the Misses Cole, Miss Donahue, Miss Hanchett, Miss Sharon, Miss Sedgwick, Miss Bradley, Miss Irwin, Misses Belden, Miss Chapman, Miss McDougall, Miss Crocker, Miss Durbrow, Miss Wood, Miss Davis. The next Assembly is announced for a February date. Mrs. Gwin gives a German next Friday evening.

The question that now seems to be agitating the minds of our society people is the whereabouts of the "Only Jones." Society misses him, and, indeed, the ladies are quite alarmed lest he may never be heard of again. There are many theories concerning him. It is generally believed he has married, and society has no more attraction for him; or perhaps he has gone off somewhere for his health. If so, we hope he will return with renewed strength, and favor us again as of old. It would be a relief to know nothing very serious has happened to him.

Julian Rix and Jules Tavernier have formed an artistic and business copartnership, and in the old Criminal Court room, at the corner of Montgomery and Jackson Streets, have fitted up a studio in gorgeous and true Bohemian style. The chamber, where erstwhile the criminal answered to the plea, is now hung with the trappings and the paraphernalia of art, and the sight is a goodly one. Sketches in color, in black and white, and etchings, and engravings, adorn the walls, subdued by a color that rests the eye. Easels stand here and there and everywhere. A skylight spreads the sunbeams—admitted only from above—and in the even distribution every sketch and creation of the brush thrusts boldly out its beauties and its faults. Then there is a cosy little fire place, a bit of a carpet shut off from the rest of the atelier by a figured screen, and oh! so many, many things to interest and feast the vision. It is an old world apartment; a duplicate of something we read about in books and seldom see. It is the nucleus too, this studio, of the artists' colony. Williams, and Straus, and Robinson, and Garibaldi, have already removed to the same building, and if there is anything in picturesque and comfortable companionship the rest will speedily follow. Go and see this studio, you who love, or patronize, or appreciate art and artists. You will receive a genuine welcome, be agreeably entertained and very much surprised and delighted.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The Orchestral Matinée of last Wednesday formed the conclusion of the series, which wound up at a most opportune time, as an extra week is thus left for special rehearsal for the concert announced for Wednesday afternoon, February 5th, which is to assume the form of a celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Herold's first appearance in this city as a conductor. It seems as if the bare statement of the fact that such a celebration is to take place ought of itself to be sufficient to remind all lovers of music of the great debt of gratitude that we owe to this gentleman, who has been our pioneer in the good cause, and I could not add a syllable of suggestion that it be made a great and worthy affair without insulting an entire community that ought to consider itself not only under great obligations to Mr. Herold, but delighted as well, to have an opportunity of manifesting its appreciation of the services that during a quarter of a century he has lavished upon the art culture of this city. Those of us who remember the conditions that surrounded that first performance of the Creation under Mr. Herold in the winter of 1853, will, perhaps, more fully appreciate the magnitude of the undertaking than is possible to those later Argonauts who, coming after, found San Francisco already reaping the results of those early labors in the form of an excellent Chorus and Orchestra. But when it is remembered that this early work, that has been so lasting in its influence and so fruitful in many ways, was performed by a youth of barely twenty-three summers, and when, in addition, we consider that this youth has followed up those youthful efforts with all the energy of the best portion of his manhood in an artistic career that has won respect and admiration at home and abroad—I am convinced, I say, that when we recall all these things there will not be lacking in any quarter the feeling that as a mere matter of justice—to ourselves, if not to the recipient of the compliment—this celebration should assume the form of an ovation. I do not know that any programme has yet been decided on, but shall be surprised and disgusted if it does not contain the name of every prominent artist in San Francisco.

They have been doing this week, at Baldwin's Theatre, a new Gavotte for orchestra, by Mr. Fred. Lyster—one of the prettiest things of this kind that I have heard. It is no easy matter to compose the music for an old-fashioned dance so as to make it in perfect keeping with the style of the period to which it belongs and yet pretty in a modern sense; but Mr. Lyster has succeeded admirably in doing both of these things. His composition is both a real Gavotte and very pretty music.

The Schmidt Quintet is out with the announcement of a last series of Soirées—a farewell before their flitting to the East, with its horrid climate, but (prospectively) paying houses—which will be given at New Dashaway Hall, and begin on February 18th. There are to be but four Soirées this time, with particularly fine programmes, and, probably, better performances than ever, since these excellent artists are incessant students, and have but one standpoint (which is really none at all), viz.: constant improvement. I expect that they will have a large subscription and enormous houses. Their music is so thoroughly delightful that I feel as if I should like to do whatever is in my power to make this, their last season, a great success and a pleasant reminiscence for them. But if I am obliged to confess to my limited influence in that direction, there is one thing, at least, that I can do for them: I can criticise them after the concerts.

The feature of the last Orchestral Matinée—which had a very strong programme—was a new composition, a Berceuse, by Mr. H. N. Channey, who, to judge from this specimen of his work, has kept his inspirations all too long (by every note of them, I should say) modestly in the background, and who gave us on this occasion the first proof of his powers as a composer of orchestra music. I am as yet hardly prepared to give an opinion as to the merits of this new work; after only a single hearing of a composition of such profundity it ought certainly not to be expected of me. I can only say of it, that it seemed to please the audience better than either Lachner's Suite or Gade's Overture (my neighbor at the concert suggested that this probably arose from the fact that the airs were familiar—had been heard before; but as the said neighbor is a musician, and an aspiring composer, I naturally attributed his remarks to envy, professional jealousy, etc.), and that at the request of many subscribers it is to be placed on the programme en permanence, and repeated (with an encore) at every concert this season. Mr. Gray has already consulted me as to the advisability of publishing immense editions of it, and seems to be in quite a quandary to find suitable persons to arrange it (from the Score, naturally) for the piano forte, as a solo, duet, for two or four pianos—eight and sixteen hands—a solo for violin, cello, flute, cornet, horn, oboe, clarinette, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, double-bass, or kettle-drums. I have suggested, also, grand chorus and orchestra with obligato organ, anvils, and cannon, but believe the composer will have to be consulted before this can be done. Meantime—until the Score is published—we shall have to content ourselves as best we can; studying it and puzzling over its intricacies during the regular performances, and hoping (praying!) that Mr. Herold may some time be inspired to give it as a concert all by itself, so that we may be enabled to give ourselves up to the full enjoyment of its manifold beauties without being annoyed—or having our attention distracted—by the compositions of Gade, Wagner, or any of those other professional fellows.

One of the most delightful of the many collections of musical compositions that are now being published in book form is a complete set of the Songs for Children, by Reinicke, which has just appeared at Gray's, with an excellent translation of the texts. If children are to be taught to sing at all, it is precisely with such music as this that their taste should be cultivated and led in the right direction, and of all great composers Reinicke is the one who has best understood and ministered to the wants of child-nature. He is the Hans Andersen of music, and his book of songs is no less charming than the fairy tales of the Danish poet.

S. E.

AFTERMATH.

The Chronicle is authority for saying that on the Chinese New Year's Day nearly all the evangelical preachers paid their compliments and presented their addresses to the Chinese Consul, and gives as a specimen—and the best specimen—that of the Reverend Dr. Thomas Guard, Methodist. Now, we do not exactly see why the evangelical divines should pay their compliments especially to the Chinese. They do not do it to the English, or French, or German consuls. If Dr. Guard desires to "grasp a Chinese hand," certainly, we say, let him proceed to grasp it. If Dr. Guard thinks himself and the Chinese Consul "children of the same heavenly father," then Dr. Guard is a wise ecclesiastical child if he knows the fact. If he thinks "they are formed after the same divine image," all right: we can express no opinion as to the family likeness, as we have no personal acquaintance either with the preacher or the Chinaman. If "the God of Nations designed fraternal intercourse between us and China," we shall most irreverently hope that the Divine purpose will be frustrated. When this Methodist divine attempts to convey the idea that "the gentlemen of the sandlot"—as he ironically terms them—do not express an almost universal sentiment upon the subject of Chinese immigration, because "they are foreigners, and not of Protestant culture and creed," he misrepresents intelligent public opinion—or, to use a more elegant expression, he is "inexact." We are tired of all this sentimental bosh about a common fatherhood, and a common brotherhood, and a common right for barbarian hordes to inundate our continent and overwhelm our civilization. We had hoped this thing was played out by demagogues and politicians, and we protest against its being taken up by evangelical preachers. Such expressions are at this especial time peculiarly inappropriate. We are endeavoring to secure political action, we are beginning to impress statesmen with the importance of this Chinese question, and we are impatient that this sort of sentimentality should be used to grease the track and hinder the car of progress in its up grade.

We received on Monday last a complimentary invitation to attend a matinee reading at St. Ignatius' College of a "Passion Play," by Mr. Salmi Morse. The card was marked:

"ADMIT GENTLEMEN ONLY."

This suggested something naughty, and, of course, we determined to go. A play to be placed upon the stage, with orchestra, scenery and drop curtain, of the passion, death, and resurrection of Christ—a play that shall represent to boys eating peanuts in the gallery the birth of an infant god, the death of the innocents, John the Baptist's head dripping from the salver presented by the dancing Salome to the angry Herodias, the Redeemer's last supper, His agony in the garden, His betrayal, His bearing of the cross to Golgotha, the taking down of His pierced and bleeding body from the tree, His resurrection and ascension—all these seem to us to be far too holy things to be produced by mouthing players to the time of fiddle and flageolet. What beer-drinking actor shall take the part of Jesus the Christ, the son of God? What female that walks the modern stage in San Francisco shall personate Mary, the holy mother of God? And yet this play is sanctioned by Archbishop Alemany, and was on Wednesday approved by a double score of Catholic Fathers, and seems to have the sanction of the church. Well, if it has, we, of course, must be perforce content. The church is wiser than we as to what is good for it. Mr. Salmi Morse, the author of this passion play, is an Israelite, and that seems strange. The play, we think, exhibits scholarly attainments on the part of Mr. Salmi Morse. It is not possible to justly criticise a literary work of this character upon hearing it once read—and it was badly read—by Mr. Morse. The poetry, the chants, and the choruses seemed to us to be good, but we reserve to ourselves the privilege of withholding any expression of opinion as to the merits of the composition. As a play it is capable of magnificent scenic effects. Whether it will be put upon the stage in San Francisco, whether it is gotten up for money, or whether it would make money if played, we have no opinion. Whether its playing would be elevating and attended with good results we have no opinion. Passion plays are not new things; they are old. They were sanctioned by the early church. This one may revive the Christian spirit, and increase the popular reverence for divine things; or may bring what we now regard as sacred into contempt. This is, however, for the clergy, and not for the press, to determine.

If any enthusiastic and honest Republican has hoped for any measure of reform to come from within the Republican organization, the ardor of his expectations will be damped by the reflection to the United States Senate of Matt Carpenter and John A. Logan, and of Borie of New Jersey to Congress. Now give us drunken Zach Chandler, then nominate Grant, and the nation will have entered upon its era of final reformation.

Bosqui has just completed a set of chromos from a painting by Thomas Hill, which are a triumph of art for this coast. The subject is a freshly-hooked salmon trout, gasping in a grassy glade, with the shimmer and sheen still on its beautiful, flashing scales. Above the fish, and resting on the bended branches, is the rod and line; and near the reel the gaudy artificial fly that lured the beauty on to the fatal jump. The execution of the work is as near a fac simile of the painting as the lithographer's art can give, and excels, in the opinion of competent judges, the best work of the East and the continent. Another chromo, from a painting by Hill—a brood of recently hatched quail—is now in process of printing.

A plain-spoken woman recently visited a married woman and said to her: "How do you manage to amuse yourself?" "Amuse," said the other, "don't you know that I have my housework to do?" "Yes," was the answer, "I see that you have it to do, but as it is never done I conclude you must have some other way of passing your time."

It is not good for man to be alone, unless he holds both bowlers and the ace.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

How a Camel is Like a Swan.—The Camel of airy Altitude that Lived in a Low Tent.—A Wicked Generation seeketh a Sign.—Missis Dobby's famous red Hea again illumines this Narrative.—The Author's Sister, the Author's Sister's Young Man, and the Author in Council.—The Mouth of the Hippopotamus comes upon the Carpet.—Prowess of the Rhinoceros, etc., etc.

One time a man wich was a travler he come to a lake, and a caml was a standin in the lake up to the camls belly. Then the man he take out his led pencil and rote into his dory book: "This is the land of the swon. The swon is the biggest bird wich swims the deep, long gracefe nex like snakes nex, and not any tail for to speak of."

Bime bi the caml it come out and woked a way, and then the man he wrote a other time: "The swons legs is 4, and its feets is woppers. Swans is jest like camles."

After a wile there was a natif nigger, and he sed had the man see his camle any were. Then the man he wrote again, the man he did: "Thay call em camls, too. How wonderfel is the works of God, so many jest alike!"

Me and Billy we plade caml, and I was the caml, cos Billy he sed, "You be the caml and Ile be the hunch," so Billy he was the hunch. After a wile I sed I was tired most to deth. But Billy he sed: "I gess yude been lots tierder than wot you are if some feller had been a ridin you."

A man wich had a caml in a sho he stood to the dnor of his sho and hollered: "Wock in gents, only 2 bits for to see the grate caml of Madgigasker, wich wocks the dessert like a thing of life, and wich is so high that its hunch is cuverd with eterne sno!"

Then my sisters yung man he sed: "How hi is yure tent?"

Then the sho man he loked at my sisters yung man a wile and he sed: "The arkiteck wich dsined it is absent putn up a idiet sylum for fellers wich sasses the shoman, and his plans is lock up in the ephalents trunk, but I gess mebbly this tent is bout as hi as the platform wich yure father was gittin down off from time he broke his neck."

Then my sisters yung man he was offie mad, and he tuke of his cote and was a goin for to lick the sho man. But the sho man he hollered back in the tent: "Jim, fetch that caml out here and make him pay his 2 bits, cos theres a yung feller wich is a other sho."

But if I was my sisters yung man I wude hit the sho man on the snoot of his nose, yes, in deed, and holler: "Ime the grate fiter of Madgigasker, and my back is got upper than a camls back, lots of eterne sno and some clouds, too, hooray!" Cos Ime brafe like a sojer wen its a fair fite, no strikn back.

One time a man wich cudent read he cum to Mister Jonnice, wich has got the wuden leg, and ast him to paint a sine for a sho. Mr. Jonnice he sed wot was the kind of sho, and the man he sed a caf without any hed. So Mr. Jonnice painted a big sine, and it sed:

THE WONDERFUL HEDLESS CAF.
BEATS ANY THING.
Never See Sech a Site in Yure Life.
4 BITS TO GIT IN.
N. B. The Hed for Sale.

But no boddy wude go in for to see it, and wen the sine was read to the sho man you never see sech a fewrious feller!

Wen the circus was here las time, Billy he went, but I had to sta to home for to mind the baby and I cride, but nex day twas him cride, cos he hurt hissef walkn on his hed, and Sammy Dobby busted hisn throne up a rock for to catch it on his neck. Sammys mother has got a red hed, jest like fire, you never seen sech a redn, and one nite Uncle Ned he was passn her house, and all the peoples was a runnin and hollerin in the street, and Missis Dobby she stood at the windo, and ast Uncle Ned what was up. Uncle Ned he see a brite lite some were, and he hollered to Missis Dobby: "Put out yure hed, cos its a fire!"

Then Missis Dobby she was as mad as you ever see, and she said: "You insultin man, cant I ast a civil question with out I got to be poked fun at for wot I cant hellep?"

My fathers is gray, and my mothers is brown, and Billys is jest the collar of mine, but Missy, thats my sister, she can set down on hern. Her young man he says she is the only woman he ever see wich never had any longer hair fore she had a fever, and it cum out, but I gess her turn is comin, cos wile he was a pullin it, and a rakin his fingers thru it, she was mity red face like she was sick. Hisn is black, and he can wiggle his ears like horses, and make fritefle mowths, and thats the kind of feller for me, but a high potamus mowth is offer than any boddys.

One day him and me and Missy was alone in the parler, and I was a settin on the edg of a chair and he sed: "Johnny, were does it pain you?"

Then I sed wot did he mean, and he sed: "I thot you seemd so uncumfable that mebbly you better go for the dockter, cos if it aint tended to rite away it runs into the collywoddles, wich is fatle."

Then I sed it was only jest cude he tel me how much a high potamus eats to one meal.

Then he loked at me sollem out of his eyes, and hisn is brown, but hern are blue, and after a wile he sed: "Johnny, the stay tisticks is meeger on that pint, but I think it is safe to say that if high potamus eats fokes the feller wich tackles this famly can stand a goodeal of yure sister, but he wil find that jest he losses little tiny bit of you is anuff."

The ri nosy rose he tosses the ephalent on his horn and smiles wicked, but the high potamus is more like Mister Brily, the butcher.

SAN RAFAEL, January 19, 1895.

"Will you not do something for the cause of temperance?" said a vender of teetotal literature. "Now, do you know," was the contemplative reply, "that's what has always puzzled me? Come now, tell me what causes the thing and I'll see what I can do."

IN THE WRONG BOX.

When Eagle Davis died,
I was sitting by his side—
'Twas in Boston, Massachusetts, and he said to me, "Old boy,
This climate—as you see—
Isn't quite the size for me;
Dead 'or livin', take me back, if you can, to Ellanoy."

So I took him by the hand,
But he'd just run out his sand,
And his breath was gone for ever before a word would come;
Then I and other three
Together did agree
In a party for to travel and to funeralize him home.

But Goshen Wheeler said,
As he looked upon the dead,
"Just remark my observation what I say:
That deceased, now glorious,
Was in life a curious cuss,
And something unexpected will happen on the way.

"From the time that he was born
Till he doubled round the Horn
Of Death, all his measurements and pleasures were odd;
And odd his line will be,
As you're registered to see,
Till his walnut case is underneath the gravel and the sod."

It was bitter winter weather
When we all four got together
At the depot, with the coffin in an extra packin' box;
And a friend, with good intent,
A cask of whisky sent,
Just to keep our boats from wrackin', as they say, upon the rocks.

Then a ticket agent he,
Seenin' mournin', says to me:
"Can I get the cards, or help you in your trouble, Mr. Brown?"
So with solemn words I said,
As I pointed to the dead:
"There you'll find, I guess, our pilgrimage and shrine written down."

Then all night beneath the stars
We sat grimly in the cars,
Sometimes sleepin', sometimes drinkin', till the dawn;
And each man went in his turn
To the baggage-crate, to learn
If the box was packin' time with us, and how 'twas gettin' on.

Then all day beneath the sun
Still the train went rushin' on,
While we still kep' as silent as gravestones as we went;
Playin' euchre solemnly,
Which we kinder did agree
With the stakes to build for Davis a decent monument.

'Bout once in every mile
Some mourner took a smile,
But we did no other smilin' as we traveled day or night;
And once in every hour
Some one went into the bower,
And reported the receptacle of Davis was all right.

But when four days were past,
Which we still were flyin' fast,
Goshen Wheeler, very solemn, with expression to us cries:
"Where we are it should be freezin'
And our very breaths a-squeezin',
Whereas the air is hot enough to bake persimmon pies.

"Don't you smell a rich perfume
As of summer flowers in bloom?
'Tis magnolias by yon bumble colored boy.
Now, I never yet did know
That the sweet mag-no-li-o
Grew in winter in the latitude of Northern Ellanoy."

Then said Ebenezer Dotton:
"I behold a field of cotton,
And I wonder how in thunder such a veg'table got here.
I don't know how we're fixed,
But the climate's gettin' mixed,
And it's spilin' very rapidly with warmth, as I fear."

Spoke Mr. Aaron Bland:
"I perceive on yonder land
That sugar-cane is bloomin', correctly, all in rows,
And not to make allusions
To Republican delusions,
But the niggers air a-gettin' all around as thick as crows."

Still we sat there mighty glum
Till along a feller come
And I says, says I, "Conductor, now tell us what it means—Just inform us where we be."
"Wall, now, gentlemen," said he,
"I reckon we air comin' to the spot called New Orleans."

So we rushed all in a row,
When we got to the depot,
To the baggage-crate, a-wonderin' at these transformation scenes;
And we found out unexpected
That the box had been directed
Not unto Ellanoy, but to a man in New Orleans!

Without carin' if I'd catch it,
I straightway took a hatchet,
And busted off the cover without openin' my mouth;
And I found a grand planer,
Which we'd followed for our banner
All the way from Massachusetts unto the sunny South.

Then I said, "I rather guess
I can see into this mess,
And explain the startlin' error which has given you such shocks.
When that Boston fellow be Asked the route I'd take of me,
I pinte'd, inadvertent, unto another box."

Now Eagle Davis lies
Beneath the Northern skies,
Where the snow is on the pine tree, while we are with the palm;
But I reckon if his spirit
Should ever come to hear it,
He'll be perfectly contented with the story in this psalm.

C. G. LELAND, in Hood's Comic Annual for 1879.

"Hurrah for the beautiful snow," he cried—
"How brilliant, sparkling, and clear!"
But he soon changed his tune, for a wicked gossoon
Plugged some in the hole of his ear.

Mr. Halliker sent his boy to the grocery with a quarter, to buy twenty cents' worth of cheese, and the boy came back without a nickel of change and the smell of gumdrops on his breath. The skate-strap was produced and explanations demanded. "Father," exclaimed the noble boy, "don't whip me. If you don't want your funds forcibly abstracted, trust the combination to a boy."

THET OERA-LINDA-BOK.

A Remarkable Literary Forgery.

Drusus, the Roman general, found in the year 13 B. C. a tribe of Germans, who were termed by the Romans Frisii, and by themselves Fresen, dwelling on the northwest coast of Germany between the mouth of the Rhine and of the Ems, together with the Batavi and the Chauci, and not far removed from their more northern brethren the Angles, Jutes, and Saxons. Similar to the last named tribes in language, laws, and customs, the principal point of contrast between them and their neighbors may perhaps be summed up in the words of Emmius in Præf. ad rer. Fris. Hist.: "The Frisians alone of all the ancient Germanic branches have from the Christian era, and the time of the first Cæsars, retained their primitive abode and name without a change to the present time;" for they did not accompany the other members of the common Gothic stock to the British Isles and elsewhere. Their language has been equally enduring, though now spoken by but a few persons living in certain islands in the German Ocean and in the provinces of East and West Friesland, embraced at present respectively in Holland and Hanover.

The only monuments of their oldest national literature are comprised in their law books. Each district had its laws written in its own dialect, and those laws are interesting not only to linguists, but also to the students of jurisprudence, for their enactments as well as those of the other ancient German tribes are extremely peculiar. The spirit of the hardy Gothic race was such that its members could not brook the idea of imprisonment; all crimes were, therefore, punished by fine or the ordeal. It may then be conjectured that this body of laws of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries is looked upon as a monument of inestimable worth, and that the discovery of any other old Frisian texts would be warmly and eagerly welcomed. Much pleasure was indeed experienced by the learned world at large when in 1872 a work, entitled Thet Oera-Linda-Bok, purporting to be written in more ancient Frisian than any theretofore known, was published in Holland, accompanied by a Dutch translation by the learned Dr. Ottema. This remarkable book has for preface an injunction, dated 1256, from Hiddo, surnamed Oera Linda, to his son to preserve the document with the greatest care, because of its containing the entire history of the Frisian people. Another letter follows immediately upon it, bearing date 803, signed by Liko, surnamed Over de Linda, containing a similar exhortation, adding that it must not fall into the hands of the priests, "the greatest enemies to the rights and liberties of the people."

The book consists of two parts—the first written by Adela, "Burchfam," or Borough Lady of the Frisians, and is termed The Book of Adelia's Followers; and by a labored chronological reckoning seems to have been written about 558 B. C. The second book, by Appolonia, is assigned to 530 B. C.

The contents of Oera-Linda-Bok are in general simply amazing. They set chronology, history, mythology, and almost conjecture, at defiance. Neptune is represented to have been a Friesland Viking whose name was Teunis, and he was familiarly called by his followers "Neef Teunis" i. e. "Cousin Teunis." Minerva, otherwise termed Nyhellenia, was originally a Burgt-Maagd, or Borough Lady, at the town of Walhallagara, or Middleburg, in Walcheren, and went to Athens 1600 years B. C. And a third mythological character named Minno—a Friesland sea king—was Minos, the law-giver of Crete, "who imparted to the Cretans an asebaboek"—code of laws. The history of the Frisian race therein set out at length is equally bewildering. Friso, the presumptive ancestor of the race, fifteen and a half centuries before our era, headed a Frisian colony which he led to India, where they settled in the Punjab, and were known as Geertmen, so called after their priestess, Geert. These men, according to Dr. Ottema, were known to Strabo as Germanes in India, differing entirely from the Brachmanes in manners, language, and religion. It is mentioned, moreover, as a striking fact corroborative of their migration thither, that in the summer the sun at mid-day was straight above their heads. They, therefore, must have lived in the tropics. In this phenomenal hejra, or hegira, of a hardy tribe from the bleak and barren wastes of northern Germany to the heated jungles of the tropical south, the incident most worthy of note is perhaps the fact that the Frisian mariners sailed through the strait which in those times still ran into the Red Sea. A general and minute account of the wanderings of these bold sailors throughout the Mediterranean, and in almost every direction in the then known world, is given with great diffuseness, and cannot be epitomized within reasonable space.

A system of theology is also laid down. The religion is extremely simple, and purely monotheistic. Wer-alda (pronounced Ooralda—Dutch Over-oude, the Over-oid; that is, the infinitely old) is the sole eternal, infinite, and almighty being. Lyda, Finda, and Frya are the three daughters of the earth, and the mothers respectively of the black, yellow, and white races. As such Frya is the mother of the Friesland-ers, and is looked upon and revered as the representative with them on earth of Wer-alda, and the worship consists in the maintenance of an ever-burning lamp by priestesses—vestal virgins. There are moral, general, and maritime laws laid down, which, however, bear little or no resemblance to any to be found in the codices in the old or classic tongue.

It may well be supposed that this "wonderbook," as denominated by some in Holland, and "het monsttrum" by others, would not be allowed to pass for authentic unchallenged. The Dutch Academy of Sciences would have nothing to do with it, but the Friesland Society, delighted and bewildered with this image of the antiquity and grandeur of their race, received it with distinguished hospitality and effusion.

In the introduction to his edition of the book Dr. Ottema gave a labored and ingenious vindication of the genuineness of the document. He and Dr. Reitsma asserted that the text was older and purer Frisian than that contained in the ancient laws; Professor Vittinga saw in it an indication of the writer's intimate acquaintance with the old Frisian tongue; and Mr. De Haan Hettema, the Frisian scholar par excellence, and the compiler of the standard Old Frisian lexicon, an admirable work of its kind, asserted in the Leeuwaarden Courant, in May, 1871, that the language of the Oera-Linda-Bok was older and more regular than that of the ancient laws above referred to. But in spite of this there were many who felt convinced that the manuscript was an imposture and a forgery; and yet it seemed impossible to assign it to any definite modern period, or to conceive of a motive for the perpetration of such a monstrous hoax. It was further urged that there were but two or three men living, and they scholars of the highest reputation and character, capable of writing in the dead or classic language of the Frisians.

The account of its appearance, and of how it reached its present status, is as follows: In 1867 Cornelis Over de Linden, Chief Superintendent of the Royal Dockyard at the Helder, gave to Messrs. Jansen, Winkler, and Verwijs the manuscripts of the Oera-Linda-Bok for translation, which he said had been inherited and preserved in his family from time immemorial. It was written in characters which were a peculiar kind of uncials or capitals, and a language that he did not understand, and he desired to know its import. Dr. Verwijs recognized the manuscript as ancient Frisian, and made a copy for the benefit of the Friedland Society before referred to, and was of the opinion that it was of great importance, provided that it was not invented for some deceptive object, which he feared. (Ottema, pref. to O. L. B., p. 1, Lond. Ed.) On the publication of the text in 1872 the whole learned world was set at variance regarding it, some believing it a forgery, and others, especially the Frisians, considering it genuine. In 1876 an edition appeared in London with English version of the text. The paper of the manuscript is of large quarto size, made of cotton, and very thick, without water mark or maker's mark, made upon a frame or wire web, with not very broad perpendicular lines. Dr. Ottema argued that the paper came from Spain, whose inhabitants learned the manufacture of cotton paper from the Arabs, to whom it became known by the conquest of Samarcand, about the year 704.

One of the most pronounced disbelievers in this book was J. Beckering Vinckers, of Kampen, in Holland, who gave strong reasons for considering it a modern production, and in 1877 published a pamphlet entitled Wie heeft het Oera-Linda-Bok Geschreven? (who wrote the Oera-Linda-Bok?), completely demolishing the work, showing conclusively that—astonishing as it may seem—it was written by Over de Linden himself, the owner of the manuscript, and that it is, in spite of the learned doctors aforesaid, a hodge-podge, a mengelmoois of ancient Frisian, new Frisian, and modern Dutch. Errare humanum est. And it is a positive fact, that if a competent linguist will now examine a single page of this trouvaille he will find it an amazing farrago of technical, as well as of general construction.

C. Over de Linden was born in 1810 and died in 1873. He had been promoted from the position of ship carpenter to that of dock superintendent; he had been a sea-faring man, and had traveled much. His appearance was that of a man of integrity and honor. It was well known that he was convinced, like his father before him, that he was a man out of the usual—perhaps of noble origin as well. His own words were: "Ik ben een rare," and he was indisputably a remarkable and extraordinary man. He was self-educated, and he educated himself liberally, too, but notwithstanding his varied acquirements he never could attain a thoroughly grammatical style in writing his mother-tongue. He hid from his children his knowledge of other languages, and always said he knew no Frisian. The text of the Oera-Linda-Bok contains precisely the same errors in grammar that characterize his known writings in his native Dutch. After his death loose papers of his were found, and among them some small fragments of the same kind of Frisian as appears in the Oera-Linda-Bok, and these are conclusively proven to have been written before and not after the appearance of the printed text of the Bok, as his children assert.

After his death an auction of his books was held on the public square at the Helder, and among them was a whole library of works on Frisian history, language, and antiquities, mythology, etc., with plenty of grammars and dictionaries. In this list are to be found works in French, English, German, Anglo-Saxon, Old Frisian, Old Norse, Swedish, and Danish—a wonderful library for one employed in the royal marine service of the Kingdom of Holland.

Among his books were found a French and Dutch copy of Volney's ruins, and the extravagant and fantastical views which Volney therein gave to the world regarding the symbolical character of all religions, and which have brought his name into such notoriety throughout the globe, form the basis and groundwork, not only to the Oera-Linda-Bok, but also of the fragmentary writings left by this man. The ideas are the same, the modes of treatment, and the characteristics of thought are identical. They are the products of the same weird and fantastic brain that drew its inspiration from that eccentric thinker, Volney.

And, further, the manuscript of the Oera-Linda-Bok was not, as he asserted, handed down in his family. It has been proved that none of his relatives ever heard of it, and his accounts of how it came into his possession were conflicting and irreconcilable. He worked, too, very much in secret, and fabricated a familie-wapen, or coat of arms, with a Frisian word thereon. He was a man of immense patience and ingenuity, as the great number of ship models left by him attest. The writing of the manuscript uncials must have been the tiresome and patient work of years. He brought the paper for the manuscript from the east on one of his voyages; it was not Arabian, but Chinese paper. Thus did this singular man, as the Hollanders say, "take the learned world by the nose and lead it round the yard."

Gerrit Jansen and the son of Cornelis came to the relief of the reputation of Over de Linden, asserting that the work was above the capacity of the man, etc. This evidence is very weak and entirely inconclusive, and does not materially affect the positions taken by Vinckers. Dr. Ottema was most grievously deceived in the matter, and the last days of that venerable scholar will be embittered by the wrong he has suffered.

One can hardly say which is calculated to give the greatest surprise, the immense and unwearied industry, the research and study, or the unaccountable and incoherent way that this remarkable man chose to speak to the world for the glorification of himself, his presumptive race, and his family. In this, so to speak, inarticulate way his great but misdirected spirit found utterance. When we think of the genius of the man we can but wish that the world had otherwise heard from the superintendent of the royal dockyard at the Helder.

C. SAN FRANCISCO, January 21, 1879.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S LAST VISIT.—II.

After shaking the dust of the Pajaro Valley from off our feet, and this was no small undertaking in its literal sense, we journeyed to Sacramento.

The weather was broiling, but the iced drinks that Mr. Taylor consumed at every stopping place would have cooled the bowels of a salamander.

He had long since given up the prospect of returning home with a two-thousand-dollar harvest in his pocket, and humorously alluded to the astonishment with which his telegram home for more funds would be received.

"I told my wife," he said, "and Anne Thackeray, the author's daughter, who is our guest, that I would bring them back lots of double eagles fresh from the San Francisco Mint, but, alas! I see now they will have to send me the greenbacks wherewith to purchase those beautiful disks. California has grown too old for me, or I for California."

In Sacramento we were fortunate enough to drop upon a financially embarrassed church. Mr. Taylor's services were at once engaged for one night at a hundred dollars.

This was a stroke of luck, and Taylor prayed that in our future journeyings every town might contain one or more poverty-stricken institutions.

At the close of the Sacramento lecture, as the night was too hot to sleep, we sat on the hotel balcony, talking and imbibing cold punches, until the freshness of the morning hours succeeded the disagreeable sultriness.

"My Faust," he said, "is weighing heavily upon my mind. I don't much mind what the English and American critics say, for, indeed, I am pretty sure they will receive it with favor, but I confess I look forward with some apprehension to the verdict of my German friends. It is the most earnest work of my life. Do you know poetry has been my ambition? I mean that I would rather write a great poem, one that all should acknowledge great, than win the highest place in pure literature. I have my favorite poems, and recite them every night as good Christians do their prayers. But my gem of gems is 'Josephine,' by Præd. I remember the first time I read it to my wife. She became an immediate convert to its beauty. What! you have never seen it?" and in a sonorous voice, and with admirable pathos, he recited the husband's confession to his wife of the liaison of his wild days:

"We did not meet in courtly hall
Where wealth and beauty throng,
Where luxury holds festival,
And wit awakes the song;
We met, where darker spirits meet,
In the home of sin and shame,
Where Satan shows his cloven feet,
But hides his titled name.
And she knew she could not be, love,
What once she might have been,
But she was kind to me, love,
My pretty Josephine."

"I honor the fellow's pluck," said Mr. Taylor, emphatically. "How many men would dare to mention the Josephine of their ante-conjugal days to the wife. And I am sure she must have forgiven him. What true woman could have withstood the appeal in the last verse:

"Alas! your lips are rosier,
Your eyes of softer blue;
And I have never felt for her,
As now I feel for you.
Our love was like the light snow-flake
That melts before you pass,
Or the bubbles in the wine that break
Before you lip the glass.
You've seen these eyelids wet, love,
Which she has never seen,
But bid me not forget, love,
My poor Josephine."

"The last time I was in London I was introduced to Swinburne. I never saw such a peculiar individual in my life. I thought he had St. Vitus's dance. He never sat in the same position a moment, and his features and limbs kept up a sort of twitching—enough to make a nervous person lose his senses. But, notwithstanding that he is so disagreeable personally, he is England's great lyric bard." Thus Taylor rattled on until the cool breeze promised us a pleasant night's, or rather morning's, rest.

At Stockton the house was good, but Mr. Taylor was tired of the business; and, although he was advertised to lecture in Marysville, he decided to return to San Francisco. One of his pet theories was the Law of Compensation. He bought four tickets in the Mercantile Library Lottery, and assured me that he felt perfectly confident of winning a prize. "For," he said, "that is where the Law of Compensation will most assuredly come in. My lectures have been a financial failure; granted. I buy for a paltry twenty dollars four lottery tickets; go calmly and confidently back to my wizard, and lo! wake up one morning the possessor of thousands, and a more earnest believer than ever in the Law of Compensation."

Afterward, writing from his home in Kennett Square, in reply to a letter from me where I mentioned that some parties had taken steps to stop the lottery and that our investments and hopes were ruined, he says:

"Do you really mean that the lottery is to be prevented? Then what shall we all do? Here I have four tickets, selected under the most propitious planetary aspects, and one of them would have been certain to draw a grand prize. Send me a telegram when the number turns up! Engage a special train; order out the marines to protect the gold! This is the last feather that breaks the camel's back. No lottery! Then where is my 'compensation' to come from? The theory is false after all."

In San Francisco Mr. Taylor delivered his last lecture for the benefit of a church. On that evening he gave a farewell dinner to a few of his friends. Among the guests was one who shall be nameless, but whose attentions to the bottle resulted in muddling him to such an extent that before dinner was over he wept on Taylor's waistcoat, and declared his intention of traveling as far as Omaha to see Taylor properly home. When Taylor retired to his room he invited this friend to go along and refresh himself by a nap on the lounge. He did so, but unfortunately when the grave and pious deacon who was to escort Taylor to the church arrived our friend was wide awake. He would go to the lecture. Taylor took him aside and whispered: "If you only keep straight now, we shall have a glorious supper when this business is over." He did remain tolerably quiet, and we left him in the vestry, where he promised to sit until the lecture was concluded.

Mr. Taylor was fairly landed in St. Petersburg, and was describing the personnel of the Czar, when a deep and strangled snore behind him gave him a considerable start. He looked around, half expecting to see the author of the snort, and then the truth flashed across him that our friend had fallen asleep on the lounge in the vestry, between which and the reading desk was only a thin partition. To those seated in the front pews the effect of those snorts, coming in at the pauses of the lecture, was indescribably ludicrous. It cost Taylor no slight effort to keep his countenance, but he struggled along manfully until, when about half way through, our friend in the vestry ceased. But he was only preparing for a new surprise. He was awake, and was trying to find his way out of the vestry, as we could tell by his boots, which creaked admirably. Creak, creak, he came along some stairway, opened a door leading into the gallery, and poked out his head. About half the audience caught sight of him before he closed the door. Down again we heard him go, then up another stairway, and out another door on the opposite side. This time he was expected, and some four hundred upturned faces greeted him. He banged this door hastily, descended, his boots creaking horribly, entered another labyrinth, and turned up in a few minutes in the organ loft. Everybody was ready for him now, and I candidly believe that if some one were to offer pools as to the chances of the next door he'd appear at, there would be no lack of purchasers. All interest in the lecture was gone. Our friend with the creaking boots monopolized the entire attention of the audience.

On the following morning Mr. Taylor left for the East. He would return, he said, in two or three months with his wife and daughter, and Miss Thackeray, and would show them the Yosemite, the Big Trees, and other California wonders; but he never returned.

Bayard Taylor was essentially the young man's friend: with those who labored in his own profession he had the keenest sympathy. Remembering his early struggles, he was full of advice and encouragement for all who had embraced literature as a profession. He had an immense circle of correspondents, nearly all of whom, he told me, were young people. In a letter to him I said that a friend of his in whom he was much interested had declared to me his purpose of loafing for several years, and waiting for something to turn up. Taylor writes, beginning with a recital of his own troubles:

"When I came home from California I found that the astonishing promise of my vineyard had been ruined by three weeks of rain during the blossoming period. Since then seven weeks of intense heat without rain have withered and spoiled peaches, melons, corn, and almost everything else. I only need boils to be a very good representative of Job. However, I don't lose my courage. I have taken to hard work, and in a few months, D. V., will have retrieved all this misfortune. And here let me beg of you to tell—not to talk of loafing for years to come. What business has a fellow of twenty-two, full of unused energies, developing tastes, and latent capacities, to loaf? You never can get something for nothing in this world. In the fairy tales the prince gets the beauty or the treasure only after incredible daring. There is such a thing as intellectual bottom, and the men who have, or acquire it, are they who succeed."

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

A Favor to the Press.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—The celerity with which Sharpe and McDaniel were hanged at Mauch Chunk the other day, while the messenger with the Governor's telegraphic reprieve was thundering at the door of the jail, recalls a circumstance in my own experience. Something over a year ago (I won't be too particular about dates, places, and names) it was announced that an execution was about to take place at a certain county seat in Nevada. In pursuance of my duties as a news-gatherer I wrote to an enterprising journalist of said county seat inquiring if I could depend upon him for a telegraphic report of the execution in time for the second edition of the Daily. He replied as follows:

"Yours of the 5th instant just received. You can depend upon me for a very full report of the execution of Sam. I am now writing up his history, visiting him in jail daily for that purpose. The Sheriff is my brother-in-law, and I can arrange it with him to have the execution take place in time to send the report for the second edition of the. Truly yours, etc."

My correspondent was as good as his word. Sam—was swung off at five minutes before twelve, and a full account of the execution appeared that day in the second edition of the Daily. Was not that little arrangement with his "brother-in-law, the Sheriff," a rather unique specimen of journalistic enterprise? NEWS-GATHERER.

The latest game is called the "Bouquet." Each player in turn supposes herself or himself a bouquet, consisting of three flowers. Then having determined on the flowers, each names them aloud, and the leader writes them down privately, and adds the names of three persons to each list. He then asks each player to what use the flowers named were to be put. The player tells him, and then he adds them to the papers after the names. Par example:

Leader—Theresa, choose your flowers.

Theresa—Marigold, Bachelor's Button, and Sassafras.

Leader—I have made an editorial note of all of them.

What will you do with the Marigold?

Theresa—Chuck it out the window.

Leader—And the Bachelor's Button?

Theresa—Crush it in my poetical palm.

Leader—And the Sassafras?

Theresa—Wear it in my raven hair.

Leader—Good. Now, then, Miss Theresa, know that you have chucked Longfellow out of the window, crushed Colonel Jackson in your poetical palm, and worn Hector Stuart in your raven hair. Next.

This time a gentleman, and so the game goes on.

An Irish gentleman of a mechanical turn took off his gas-meter to repair it himself, and put it on again upside down. At the end of the quarter it was proved with arithmetical correctness that the gas company owed him $8.50.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Gold Locks and Silver Locks.

Pupil and master together,
The wise man and the child,
Merrily talking and laughing
Under the lamp-light mild.

Pupil and master together,
A fair sight to behold,
With his thronging locks of silver,
And her tresses of ruddy gold.

Well, little girl, did you practice
On the violin to-day?
What is the air I gave you?
Have you forgotten, pray?"

And he sings a few notes, and pauses,
Half frowning, to see her stand
Perplexed, with her white brows knitted,
And her chin upon her hand.

Far off in the street, of a sudden
Comes the sound of a wandering band,
And the blare of brass rings faintly,
Too distant to understand.

"Hark," says the master, smiling,
Bending his head to hear,
"In what key are they playing?
Can you tell me that, my dear?"

"Is it D minor? Try it!"
To the piano and try!"
She strikes it, the sweet sound answers
Her touch, so light and shy.

And swift as steel to magnet,
The far tones and the near Unite and blend together
Smoothly upon the ear.

I thought, if one had the power,
What a beautiful thing 'twould be,
Hearing life's manifold music,
To strike in one's self the key;

Whether joyful or sorry, to answer,
As wind-harps answer the air,
And solve by simple submission
Its riddles of trouble and care.

But the little maid knew nothing
Of thoughts so grave and wise,
As she stole again to her teacher,
And lifted her merry eyes.

And neither dreamed what a picture
They made, the young and the old—
With his thronging locks of silver
And her tresses of ruddy gold.

CELIA THAXTER, in St. Nicholas.

Last Days.

The long brown beach lies sleeping in the sun,
The hot white noon leans idly to the bay,
Cloud upon cloud, above my head,
Opens the blossom of the perfect day.

There is a color like a living soul
Upon the half-revealed but half-veiled sky;
Glad to sad eyes, reclines the flushed, full tide,
Celestial body that shall never die.

My prayers look out like orphans through their tears;
My heart cries out, O life! O life! for thee.
But One across the water draweth nigh,
Too kind, and so too dumb, to answer me.
ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, in Sunday Afternoon.

Bayard Taylor.

How much the land had loved him it scarce knew,
Till Honor, always tardy in her aim,
Among the nation's foremost set his name;
Then lo! before this honor its full due

Had reaped, while yet the ocean breezes blew
Its prophecy, a second honor came,
Kindling in poets' souls a warmer flame;
From voice to voice, from heart to heart it flew,

His last and noblest poem. "Ah! th' year,"
We said, "hath crowned him with a double crown.
The gods he sings so well have held him dear."
Lo! while we spoke he laid his laurels down.

The gods another costlier gift had brought,
They held him dearer even than we thought.
H. H., in Independent.

After the Concert.

My better self, my Stradivarius! we
Have done great things to-night; have helped to bear
On outstretched wings the stream of melody
Up to heaven's portals—it might enter there.

I wonder, loved one, was it thou or I
Who poured our souls forth on the music's strain?
Thou art not living—yet I hear thee sigh,
And sing, and sob, like gods more than us men.

Since he, Cremona's master, worked and wrought
With more than human skill, he surely breath'd
Into his sweet creation speech and thought,
Best of the forest with man's best unwrought.

The master breathed upon thee with the love
That centres in a soul; and lo! I awoke
Thy sweet life-song, attuned in heav'n above,
And, soaring, thus upon the silence broke.

But no! description's vain—we can not tell
The songster's sweetness, nor the sough of wind,
The spring-tide wonder, nor the year's sad knell;
Yet all this joy and sadness here we find.

Yet more! for in its midst, grief of a heart
That knows this life blends with the joy of those Who know but spirit-life; and thus impart
Heav'n's bliss into the strain that richer grows.

And yet, sweet violin! without me thou wert mute,
And unresponsive in thy velvet nest would lie;
All silent as a long-forgotten lute,
Thus thou without me—thus without thee I.

H. J. O., in Good Words.

"The worst that follows
Things that seemed jerked out of the common rut
Of Nature is the hot religious fool,
Who, seeing war in heaven, for heaven's credit
Makes it on earth."
ALFRED I.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, {
FRED. M. SOMERS, {

Editors.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1879.

Pursuing our idea of last week, why should there not be organized a political party based upon the material interests of the country? Government is ordained among men to protect life and guard personal rights. Next to life, property is most sacred. A political organization, having for its principal object the protection of the accumulations of industry and the preservation of property, would naturally embrace all intelligent classes, and contain within its numbers every individual who had not abandoned all interest in life and deliberately planned for himself a career of idleness, vagabondage, and crime. We can conceive of no proposition looking to good government and the welfare of the people that would not come naturally within the scope and purpose of such an organization. There are very few social, moral, or political questions, the consideration of which would not properly come within the objects of a party formed for the protection of property. Such a party would embrace the intelligent and the respectable. It would certainly embrace the industrious and the provident. It would be in natural alliance with every honorable, ambitious, hopeful citizen, who looks forward to the accumulation of wealth as a provision for old age, and it would be composed of all citizens who have, or who expect to have, something.

We can, of course, understand that the demagogue writer, speaker, or politician, who desires to obtain the applause and earn the good will of the propertyless masses, can so mistake the proposition embraced in the idea of a party with property qualification to its members as to make it seem undemocratic. Here is afforded an opportunity to prate of class distinctions, of caste, and political favors depending upon money, to array labor against capital, and to declaim of the oppressions exercised by the one and the burdens borne by the other—all of which, in a government like ours where all are politically equal, and in a country like ours where the avenues of opportunity are alike open to all, is pure, unadulterated nonsense. We can not blind our eyes to the dangers that are growing up in our midst, nor longer hesitate to admit that republican government is not the perfect thing which the enthusiasm of our fathers has represented it to be. We can not ignore the lessons that are daily taught us by the acts of a large and dangerous minority of our electors, nor deny to ourselves the admission that the future of our political and social outlook is far from hopeful. It is in our great cities that this danger is most threatening. It is over our municipal governments that the cloud hangs heaviest and most menacingly.

We do not hesitate to express the conviction that the universal exercise of the elective principle is an error from which we are likely to reap a harvest of ills. It was a mistake to arm the ignorant, the criminal, and the profligate idler with the right to vote. Coupling this mistake with that other and even greater one that invited immigration from abroad without limitation or restriction, and we may accept as probable the fact of a serious conflict before these political privileges shall be brought within the circumference of proper limitation. It is a task difficult of accomplishment to disfranchise any class of citizens. We may expect, when that effort is made, profound resistance; but it must be made, sooner or later, even if attempted at the expense of serious conflicts. There is a natural antagonism between the class that by the exercise of its brain and muscle, by industry, providence, and economy, accumulates property, and that idle, ignorant, vicious, improvident, worthless class that lives by crime. The man of letters, the man of genius, the man with the faculty of business, the man who inherits wealth, or the one who acquires it by his superior powers, is the subject of an unreasoning hatred and jealousy on the part of God's unfortunate vagabonds who have acquired nothing, inherited nothing, who possess nothing, and whose only hope of a bettered condition is to destroy a government that protects property, and to repeal laws that guarantee the private ownership of property. Our form of republican government is an invitation to this class to unite for the purpose of accomplishing their criminal desires by political organization. It gives rule to the majority. The sword and purse are to be controlled by the expression of numbers at the ballot-box. When those who have nothing outnumber those who have something, practical agrarianism follows as a matter of course.

If to-day, in the kingdom of Great Britain, there was unrestricted freedom at the ballot-box, and every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years could exercise an equal privilege of choosing rulers and making laws, how long would it be before royalty, titled families, hereditary legislators, privileged classes, laws of primogeniture and entail, and all laws that recognized property in lands, would be leveled down by a communism bearing arms and exercising political power? And while it is well that we have no kingly dynasty, no titled nobility, no born law makers, no privileged classes, and no laws that hand down great landed estates from father to son, it is not well that we have a system of government that leaves its power at the will of the mob; that presents all its governmental offices as prizes to the throwers of political dice; that makes its civil administration and its military control subservient to ignorant majorities, and allows numbers, without reference to intelligence, morals, or property, to be the arbiters of its destiny.

In treating this subject broadly, and with reference to the possibilities of the future, we are not considering this offensive pustule of our sand-lot as anything more than an indication of temporary derangement. Our troubles are not coming from revolting gladiators, but from political corruption. Our officials, tempted by the spoils of office, are becoming corrupt and extravagant. Relying upon the mass of the unthinking and the ignorant, they are, by effective organization of their own kind, and by the indifference of the non-political classes, gaining an entrenched position, where they may plunder through the pretense of government, and steal under the guise of taxation. It is not from the labor class that danger threatens; it is not the workingman, the industrious citizen, nor mechanic who menaces the peace of our social system or the permanence of our form of government. The industrious man who toils is the ally of the one who by toil has accumulated. He has ambitious hopes of the future—if not for himself, he has for the children he leaves behind him. These men and the men of property—the man of muscle and the man of mind, the sons of labor and the men of culture—are the natural members of the political party we suggest.

Such an organization in protecting property would protect labor; in opening up the emoluments and honors of office present them as prizes for the contest of all honest men; in defending the accumulations of industrious toil keep alive the hopes of labor, make it profitable, advance its wages, reduce taxation, bring the salaries of officials down to the level of workmen's wages. Such a party would not fear to regulate licenses for selling liquor, and would not fear to discriminate between the men who ask a license to keep a wood and coal yard or drive a furniture wagon, and the worthless vagabond who sells beer and gin. It would not hesitate to declare that a police officer should be reduced in his compensation to a price corresponding with that of the mechanic or laborer who performs more and harder work for less pay. It would not hesitate to cut down our common-school system to a sensible regulation for the instruction of poor children in the rudimentary elements of an English education, and would say to those who desired to give to their children a liberal education under the tuition of pedagogues from Berlin and Boston to pay for it. It would be brave enough to compel the Board of Education, and the Board of Supervisors, and the Street Department to stop stealing. It would give to a county clerk, assessor, tax-collector, auditor, recorder, and the whole tribe of officials, a salary commensurate with the amounts paid by banking and commercial houses for clerks and accountants, more than their equals in ability. It would give to judges a compensation according to their learning and talent, and would not reward a second-rate attorney by a judicial position simply because he had not the ability to live by his profession. It would give to the Mayor of San Francisco $250 a month, and the Governor of the State a similar amount, and if, under the rule, Mr. Bryant or Mr. Irving would refuse to accept the honor, would relegate them back to employments in which they earned less money and worked harder.

With a party composed of tax-payers, whose leading idea would be to pay less taxes, we could secure an honest and an economical administration. We could stop stealing, and this would invite capital to our city, would increase the value of real property, would make an increased demand for labor, would advance wages, would silence that empty-headed ass of the sand-lot from braying his cowardly assault upon a dead mule, violating the sanctity of an honored grave by viciously attacking virtues he has not the intelligence to comprehend nor the honesty to attempt to imitate.

Such a party, bringing together—by the attractions of a common interest—all nationalities and all sects of religious belief, would have the courage to meet the question of sectarianism in our schools, and answer the conundrum propounded by the Reverend Father Gleason, namely: Whether in our common school system there is not something seriously defective, and which calls for immediate reform? Such an organization would have the courage to say to the Reverend Father Gleason, and through him to all the Catholic clergy, that when Government undertook—as a matter of charity—to educate the poor children of our own and foreign birth in the rudiments of an English education, it did not agree to provide for them either the luxuries of a liberal education, nor to furnish them with the theological education deemed essential—by priests—to their souls' salvation. It would have the courage to say to this gentleman—of priestly robes and of foreign birth—that he betrays a profound ignorance of the scope and intent of our fundamental law when he declares that "a non-secular education is at war with the spirit of our Constitution;" that he makes an inconsiderate declaration, savoring of bigotry, when he charges "that our common schools are, in their nature and tendencies, infidel, godless, pagan, and as such highly injurious to the commonwealth, and subversive of order and civil society." It would say to this most respectable Catholic clergyman that it was no more the duty of our government to teach religion in our common schools than to teach it in our naval and military academies, and that all parents who entertain his opinions are at liberty to withdraw their children from the public schools and turn them over to convent, church, and parochial schools, if they deem it for their best interests. If Catholics—as he says—"have an aversion" for such a system of education, which he pleases to style "godless," and if it is of more importance to teach "the history of the Catholic Church" than to teach the principles that underlie a free republic—freedom of conscience, freedom of thought, and freedom of utterance—then such Catholics have made a grave mistake in seeking an asylum in a land that places these grand ideas paramount to the dogmas of any religious faith, and regards the teachings of the fathers of the Republic as of more importance than the writings of the ghostly fathers of the church.

In such a party—if the Reverend Father Gleason should join it—he might be brought in contact with broad-minded, liberal, scholarly gentlemen, who plead guilty to a want of that blind, unquestioning confidence in the dogmas of the Catholic faith which this ungenerous priest styles "infidelity," and brands as "the meanest and most contemptible of all sects." He might, perhaps, in association with some of the more enlightened of those persons whom he styles "godless, pagan, and infidel," find virtues that now, in his deep-seated and bigoted prejudice, he deems inconsistent with any other than what he pleases to term Christian people. This reverend gentlemen will also pardon us if we have but little respect for opinions which he announces "his willingness to retract most promptly and unhesitatingly if they should not meet the approval of his ecclesiastical superiors," and prefer the organization of a party composed of real-estate owners and men of property, rather than of bigoted churchmen who think religion in our schools the only basis of free government. To membership of the latter party we would be ineligible; to one, the members of which could think for themselves and act for themselves, independent of ecclesiastical control or priestly interference, we would be eligible.

Such a party as we have described might (but we fear it would not) say to the wealthy men, the millionaires of this city, who have so long controlled our politics, corrupted our legislatures, and debauched our whole official life, that when wealth ceases to be conservative it has destroyed its only safeguard. It might (but most likely it would not) say to our money kings, beware of the race of lobbyists and parasites you maintain, lest, when you no longer give, they turn upon you as did the dogs of Acteon and rend you—scattering your vast accumulations and pulling down that wealth they have aided you to amass. It might say to these gentlemen, who, under the excuse of the necessity for self-defense, insist that none but their creatures shall hold office or make laws, that that which protects the poor man's homestead, the widow's mite, would be sufficient to secure the rich man's estate as well, and that which is insufficient for the protection of the one will, sooner or later, prove to be insufficient to protect the other. It might say to them, when you place your followers in office, so that they may do your work and secure you in what you claim to be your rights, your less wealthy fellow-citizens find themselves in the power of your appointments, and that their rights are taken from them in order to increase yours. It might ask them this pertinent question, if wealth is to be dishonest, what is to be expected of poverty?

And finally, such a party might say to these great social and financial powers, we have tried you as rulers of the land and find you wanting in that patriotism and public spirit essential to the government of a free people. You are blind to all save the gratification of your avarice. You are unable to perceive that your course has brought our community to a condition where capital is terribly alarmed, and industry almost completely paralyzed; that in consequence of it an ignorant and vulgar Irish adventurer and vagabond has been able to make a hero of himself in the eyes of a plurality of the voting population of the city, when you might be, and if fit for the trust would be, the supreme power. In a word, that so-called Kearneyism would be a moral impossibility had you discharged the functions of true conservatism resting upon you, and that the miserable blasphemer who now taints God's atmosphere every Sabbath day in the presence of four or five thousand dissatisfied men would not be able to gather together a score of those who now listen to him.

PRATTLE.

thousands in our midst who would be kept alive by industry; (2) for the sake of common humanity; and (3) for God's sake." The consideration last mentioned is the one which particularly commends itself to the petitioner who wants the contract.

From the Alta's one hundred and thirty-third letter on French Wines I extract this brilliant bit of bosh: "A nation of all nations, thrown together as we have been, needs a protective tariff, not only to protect home industry while developing, but to insure proper American pride in American products." This is not the first time the language of the heart has been heard in political economy; the great and good Horace Greeley once advocated a protective tariff on the ground that the mere contemplation of so noble a policy tended to elevate the sentiments and subdue the passions—practically the same argument made by the Hindoo devotee in perpetual session by the wayside, piously studying his navel.

The writer of the letters mentioned (the Honorable Commissioner of the dispatches—the Charley Wetmore of local Bohemian circles) is now on his way home from the Paris Exposition. I confidently expect him to exhibit his "proper American pride in American products" by at once renouncing and forever eschewing the garments made by European manufacturers and tailors ("our despoilers," as he patriotically terms them), and arraying himself in American "protected" goods, forty per cent. higher in price and sixty per cent. worse in quality. Surely no true son of Columbia ("the gem of the ocean") will hesitate to tear from his limbs the livery of foreign—and mostly monarchical—oppressors, and drape himself in the regalia of Freedom, to the cost of which all his countrymen have been compelled by law to contribute something. But they do say that Charley is bringing back a dozen complete suits of foreign-made clothing.

"I do not deem it necessary," writes this Honorable Commissioner, "to apologize for being an American." It certainly is not; he belongs to a class of Americans for whom the necessary apologies are made by Americans of another class—as in feudal times, by an equitable assignment of license to ignorance and responsibility to power, the offenses of the poor were expiated by the baron upon whose estate he lived.

If Mr. Wetmore should be offended by the tone of these remarks, which it is confessed are more contemptuous than controversial (one can not argue against every folly, and I draw the line at protective tariffs), I beg to remind him of another just and fair provision of mediæval law. If struck by a knight, the hind could claim the right of redress, and was permitted to cuff his assailant's shadow projected on a wall. It shall never be said that I refused to the least of God's creatures the satisfaction to which his intellectual standing justly entitled him.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher parades his "extreme gratification" that his words are read and his influence felt over the greater part of the globe.

Beecher, your words survive their parent acts—
"Nest hiding," "ragged edge," and "bottom facts"
Prove how you prospered in your noble aim
To vulgarize the lexicon of shame.

Your influence, withal, has gathered head—
To east and west its dikes encroaching spread;
There'll be, on all God's foot-stool, when they meet,
No clean spot left for God to set His feet.

If, as Mr. Creed Haymond and his fellow-attorneys hold, Judge Fawcett, by accepting a seat in the Constitutional Convention, abdicated his right to pass the sentence of death upon his neighbors, his acceptance of the office of Delegate is to be earnestly regretted. We have but one State Constitution that needs amending, and Judge Fawcett has a large number of neighbors who need hanging.

The proposition to put San Francisco under its own control alarms nobody but the people of San Francisco. We are all shrilly protesting that we are incapable of managing our affairs without assistance from country members of the Legislature, who have, indeed, saved us from ourselves about as often as they have sold us out. The practice has been that when the San Francisco delegation in the Legislature has brought forward a measure to plunder us, the country members have defeated it unless they had themselves some measure in hand for which the votes of our delegation were required. But whenever they could make an advantageous trade they have uniformly delivered us over, bound hand and foot, to our immediate representatives. It is entirely true that no American city is fit to govern itself, or has ever done so without the most disastrous consequences; but perhaps the intelligent thieves and sovereign ignoramus could suggest a remedy for all that. There is certainly a growing belief among them that education and honor have at present an undue and injurious preponderance in municipal affairs.

When rascals and beggars to law-making fall,
And persons without instruction,
The law-making function is nothing at all
But a process of reproduction.
For laws that ass, pauper, and criminal pass
Make criminals, paupers, and all kinds of ass.

One can hardly help congratulating Pennsylvania on her new Governor, who says in his inaugural address that she will insist on the enforcement of equal rights in every State "as long as her mountain peaks point to heaven and her rivers roll to the sea." From this ominous reference to the threatening direction of her mountain peaks it may be inferred that the principal State in which Pennsylvania is determined to enforce equal rights is the Celestial State—where, certainly, Pennsylvanians are at a marked disadvantage, as compared with the rest of mankind. Hitherto they have not even been accorded the right of entry.

That kind of cheap-and-nasty rhetoric in an official address may be very good poetry—barring metre and rhyme; it certainly is not very good sense. I fear it must be confessed that the quality which most conspicuously distinguishes the American statesman from the statesman of another nationality is his knack at gorgeous gabble. His speeches are like the dear old familiar army letter of the Rebellion Period, which consisted chiefly of an envelope starrily and stripily emblazoned all over with patriotic emblems faultily drawn and crazily miscolored.

The career of our compatriotic statesman is in some respects interesting. He enters public life with the formidable intellectual equipment of a common-school education, and beginning at once to bombard the impregnable defenses of common sense, keeps it up pretty much all the time, unaware that he is doing all the fighting himself, and is finally kicked into political obscurity by the recoil of his gun. And then from the heap of the slain he lifts up his death-rattle, declaring that while the mountain peaks are sharp and the rivers are flat, and the note of the American eagle is each in turn, the intelligent masses of this great and glorious country shall soar in the bright profundity of sovereign equality and free rights. I fall ill of the American statesman, and may the devil's jackasses pasture down his hair.

An owner was wanted the other day at the police office for "two grindstones taken from a Chinaman."

Two grindstones from a single thief!
The tale outruns my slow belief;
Relate no more within earshot of me
These wild romances of lithotomy.

By the way, is it generally known how Captain Lees obtained his promotion to the head of the Detective Police? Officer Smith had captured a Chinaman with a considerable quantity of tobacco on his person. The Chinaman was locked up and the Chief advertised for an owner for the tobacco. No one appeared. The entire force then went on a still hunt among the cigar factories, but no claimant could be anywhere found, and things were looking pretty dark at headquarters; the public had lost faith in the efficiency of its protectors, and a bill was already elaborating in the brain of a well-known member of the Legislature for a reorganization of the force with himself at the head of it. At this alarming "juncture" of affairs Officer Lees, then a simple roundsman, suggested that perhaps the Chinaman was himself the owner. It was the most daring and ingenious "theory" ever propounded; and to the amazement of all it turned out to be correct. From that hour Captain Lees shot up like a rocket until he became Chief Detective and ex officio part owner in the Chronicle. In the meantime the Chinaman had been sent to the State Prison, where it is the greatest misfortune of his life to have died.

The Bulletin heads a leading article: "Municipal Robbery Made Easy."

Is that so, Deacon? Bless me, if it's true,
Newspaper schemes have seen the last of you.

An Eastern journal advises the Republican party to nominate Mr. Washburne instead of General Grant, because the former has the faculty (I should call it a property) of winning men's hearts, while the latter is repellent. The writer requires a column and a half to explain the difference between the two aspirants, but it seems capable of terser statement:

Washburne draws all men's hearts as with a magnet,
But Grant to get them has to use a drag-net.

It is related that at St. Louis, the other day, a Jewish congregation invited a Baptist one to hold religious service in their synagogue. The Christians accepted the courtesy as gravely as it was tendered, performing their usual simple rites to the manifest satisfaction, and probable edification, of the Chosen People, who attended in considerable quantity.

Most of the secular journals of the country have, on the occasion," their homilies suitably infused with the spirit of universal good will and strongly colored with confidence in a near millennium. None have had the self-denial—why should they have?—to abstain from reference to the prophecy of the lion and the lamb lying down together, though in no case has it been made to clearly appear which faith is the lion and which the lamb.

Far be it from me to deride or discourage anything tending to make the devotees of two religions hate one another less ardently than is their immemorial habit; it is only that I am of a less hopeful and enthusiastic disposition than some of my literary brethren, who, as a rule, believe in nothing with so facile, touching, and steadfast a faith as in the immediate triumph of a religion which they have never done anything to advance, except to keep well away from it themselves. In all the instances of lions and lambs lying down together that have fallen under my observation, I have discovered reason to suspect fraud; and it has commonly occurred in the end that if the lion did not slyly tuck away the lamb, the lamb has stood up and openly devoured the lion. It is to be wished things would have the goodness to take a turn for the better in this respect, but the dawn of a better era, which somebody or other is always hailing, is unfaillingly succeeded by a blow that makes us all see stars again.

When lion and lamb have together lain down
Beholders cry out, all in chorus:
"The lamb doesn't shrink nor the lion frown—
A miracle's working before us!"

But 'tis patent why Hot-head his wrath holds in,
And Faint-heart her terror and loathing;
For the one's but an ass in a lion's skin,
The other a wolf in sheep's clothing.

A captain of militia was presented with a sword and its belongings last week, in the presence of a brilliant concourse of similar warriors and warrioresses. I am sorry I have not room in these columns for the whole of the presentation speech, but it expired as follows: "Accept them with our best wishes for your future comfort (comfort is good) and happiness, and in the hope that your sword may never be tarnished or stained save in defending the right, and that after so doing it may be sheathed only in victory." The following spirited couplets are inscribed on the blade:

Unsheathe me not in gastronomic strife—
Pray split your chicken with a carving-knife.
Preserve me virgin for the better killing
Of traitors—Heaven and the traitors willing.
Don't tarnish me in any vulgar brawl—
Nay, better still, don't tarnish me at all.
When Kearney and his myrmidons raise Nick,
Campaign with Mr. Coleman and a stick.
But should some foreign armament attack us,
Resign with John McComb and Major Backus.

The author of the following limpid and lucid lines is Mr. William D. Pollock—not the Pollok who wrote "The Course of Time," but the Pollock who, in the course of time will, I hope, stop writing:

There poverty surrounds the fruitful earth—
Man's paradise, if he desire—
Yet Envy scrawls the record of a birth—
The seething hell of Discontentment's fire.

I neither fully comprehend nor at all deprecate the criminal sentiment of this profane farrago, but, as one of Mr. Pollock's patients, I demand to know how, in an alterniternal quatrain, he has dared to follow an iambic pentameter with an identimetric tetrapody.

"These old poets," said Lepidus, as Horace was in discussion at a Pompeian dinner given by Glaucus, "all fell into the mistake of copying sculpture instead of painting. Simplicity and repose—that was their notion; but we moderns have fire, and passion, and energy. We never sleep; we imitate the colors of painting, its life, and its action. Immortal Fulvius!"

You, too, my Pollock—you have not (Like Horace, Virgil, and that lot)
The cold simplicity of art
That freezes the impulsive heart.
You burn and throb in wild turmoil—
All heat and color, like a boil.

Passion? God knows you've that throughout,
And God knows what it's all about.
Thy Lepidus, the Morning Call,
"Immortal Pollock!" now doth bawl;
To-morrow Lepidus will sigh:
"Who was the Pollock man?—and why?"

They have been having a nice little placer gold excitement down in Los Angeles all to themselves; they dig it out of the streets. It has always been known that the City of the Angels was paved with gold, but it was not supposed that the angels would tear up the pavement.

An aphorism-fiend writes me that love is like a quicksand; if it gets above your middle you'll never get out. I don't know what he means, but a man is a fool to want to get out.

"It is true I am sick, and I have no property," my poor friend Brown remarked, the other day, "but I have something here"—laying his hand on his heart with a tranquil smile—"something that health could not give nor money buy." "Ah! yes, you mean—" "A cancer."

CONFIDENTIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PHOENIX CLUB, SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 14, 1879.

MY DEAR UNCLE:—I am not in the least surprised at the view you are inclined to take of the two letters I have already addressed to you. You are pleased to call my advice impertinent. It may or may not be so. I do not blame you. I used to think exactly the same of much of your advice when I was a boy; but as I have since had reason to see the mistake I made, I am not without hope that you may see yours yet before you visit Beecherland. Let me be plain. The fact is, my dear uncle, that I have reached maturity of judgment in so far as I permit my own opinions to have some weight with me. I have passed the condition of mind in which I believed that gray hairs must always be venerable, and a man was necessarily wise because he had worn his teeth out. When a man gets to that stage his wisdom teeth have gone too; and I have met with too many examples of judgments distorted and depraved, instead of improved and matured by experience—of minds enfeebled and muddled, instead of made clear and strong by development, to respect old men because they are old. Experience has never done anybody any good. It may have had a slight effect while yet it was fresh; but it does not take long to forget the most bitter blow. Does experience ever really cure a stock speculator? There may be one or two cases in which men of strong will have taken a sudden resolution and not sworn off, but simply left off. But in most of those few cases, we will find some stronger impulse than can arise from mere adversity—the love of a woman, be it sweetheart, sister, or mother; the effect upon reputation or position; or some other influence than the mere loss of money or threatened ruin. There is not a man on the street to-day who will honestly in his heart admit that he is a fool for having speculated in stocks, though he hang round Pauper Alley, and his wife and children are starving in a garret somewhere. His experience does not teach him that by honest and legitimate work is the safest and best way to make money. It only teaches him that the chance he lost went to somebody else, by luck, and, as sure as the heavens are above him, his turn will come. If you argue the point with him, his answer is simply that if he had bought instead of sold, or sold instead of bought, he would have made money. Is there any branch of our economy, social, political, or commercial, in which a man learns anything lasting by experience? Circumstances and conditions invariably change, and the experience of one case never meets another. But this is much too like a lecture to be either useful or interesting. I know, in any case, it will not be agreeable.

I did not inform you of the curious discovery I made touching a flirtation between you and a pretty member of the ballet profession some time ago. Your wonderful faculty for keeping such things secret exists in your own imagination only, my dear uncle. In my course of study of human life, it has been my good fortune to have paid severely for a knowledge of human nature before the footlights. If that experience has been dearly bought, at least it has left for me a considerable enjoyment in watching the adventures of others who plunge into the delightful dissipation of making love to stage girls. I know the entire course of sensations from the "impulse affectionate" to the "cold shake." And it is only now, after a few years have elapsed, that I am recovering from the mortification of having been a laughing stock to everybody behind the scenes of several theatres. It is some consolation to know that my follies are forgotten in the engrossing interest attaching to fresh aspirants for conquest in the same direction. It is a most extraordinary feature of male human nature, that a man will spend more time and money to win the passing affections of a ballet girl, than he will bestow in securing the undying love of a pure and virtuous woman. Men will neglect their wives and families to hang round the tinted tights of a painted and padded figure, whose animation extends only to an empty form; whose education has been so neglected that she dare not attempt a word of two syllables; whose tastes do not rise beyond an oyster stew and a liaison; and who have so little respect for themselves and their "friends," that they delight their companions with a full and complete account of the flirtation the morning after. And the older the men are, the worse they become. I do not say that women have not ambition to be loved by a favorite actor. We have had cases of that kind. But I am compelled to admit that though there are many handsome men on the stage, few of them bear the daylight on their faces or figures, and "Romeo," and "Hamlet," and "Claude Melnotte," have not much poetry about them when they drop into a restaurant to have a chop and a cup of coffee about noon. But a man may give an actress a dress, a seal-skin jacket, or a hat, and make her look something on the street. When women rise to independence, it will be open to them to give their favorite actor a suit of clothes, and a pair of boots, and dress him up to suit their taste. Then the state of things may be changed. I knew this fair, fairy damsel who enslaved your affections. She was pretty, I admit. She was modest in her way—it was but a small way. I knew her, and I had means of unraveling little secrets about her which, pardon me, I do not mean to tell. Suffice it, I knew of your affection for her, and when I heard that you had sold out Sierra Nevada suddenly, I looked for the ring, which she showed me in due season, I took her home one evening from the theatre, and on the corner I saw a figure standing which I recognized. You did not know me. I have a coat and hat of whose existence you are entirely ignorant. What was my astonishment—it was my first information of your escapade—when she said: "Do you see that old fool on the corner?" I blushed. Luckily there was no one near, and the lamps, you know, are only meant to throw the shadow deeper on the intervening puddles; so she did not see my blushes. I faintly answered, "Yes." "That old fool haunts me like my shadow." I almost fainted. To hear my uncle, who ought to be venerable, called an old fool, and that in the face of his nephew. I let her talk. She told me all, and now I knew where your sudden necessity for a loan of five hundred dollars arose. Let me tell you, my dear uncle, I will not encourage you in your miserable amours by lending you any more money. I saw various gifts, and it may please you to know that you were No. 1 on her list, and that her affections were centered on a member of the company, who drew the ten by head mark and number. I did not think when I wrote you before on something of the same subject that I should find you so willful, so impervious to anything like good advice. But you are getting quite unbearable. Not you only, but many old men like you hang round the girls of the ballet, and surely if you old men do it, young men may justify themselves by your example. You will tell me, of course, that if I maintain these opinions, I should not know so much about it. Between the follies of youth and the criminal weaknesses of age there is a vast difference. And, whereas, in the past there was every allowance made for the capability of old men to guide themselves, and age was permitted in consequence to do what youth was not supposed to imitate, the advance of education has been so rapid that to-day the youth of the world are sharp enough to see that vice is no more permissible in old than in young men. People talk of the degradation, of the immorality, of the stage and its surroundings. My dear uncle, it is to you and your companions in vice that much, if not all, of the immorality of the stage is due. Stage girls perform a very agreeable and pleasing function in society. They give to our boyish minds the ideals of grace and beauty which never fade in after years. They please the eye, and, if viewed—not through an opera glass, but as what they are supposed to be—they heighten the taste. Most of them go on the stage because there are so few occupations open to women. They have no desire to seek more than the small wages they receive. But you and your companions offer to their purity a temptation they can not withstand, and so, the ballet not being in any case conducive to modesty, they fall. What do you leave them? Nothing worth living for save the excitement of the stage and the dissipation in which they hope to end their lives before their charms shall have departed, and left them wrecked and helpless at the mercy of an unforgiving memory. It might be interesting to inquire how far society is responsible for the stigma attaching to ballet girls. By what right is it denied to women to display their figures on the stage when that privilege makes men envious? Who says that a woman's modesty must go when she appears in tights for wages before the public? Society decides it so. And what is society? Society is a class of women who are above the necessity of work for a living; who, being able to remain at home and receive one another, decide that all occupations are low save that their husbands, brothers, and fathers are engaged in; who do not object to show their feet, busts, and even their limbs, if a fashionable masquerade ball gives them an opportunity, but to whom the mere question of remuneration in coin makes the difference between morality and immorality. Society will sanction exhibition on the street of a bust stuffed to an abnormal extent with cotton or other accommodating material. Society will admire a figure fitted tight with patent adjustable charms, adapted to hide anything that is ungraceful, and adorned with a column of hair at sixteen dollars a pound by weight. Society will accept the homage paid to a shape that is entirely unnatural and ingeniously false. But when the ballet girl appears on the stage, society thinks it degrading, even if the charms be natural and the beauty genuine. If we will admit the possibility of the ballet girls being virtuous, and honest, and good, we will have done something to help them to be so. If we will accept the fact that ballet girls are as much necessities as shop girls, or school ma'ams—and in view of the late disclosures there may be many ballet girls who will compare favorably with those whose mission it is to teach our children—we will have given them some encouragement to resist temptation. If we have a community among whom principle is being gradually trampled under foot; if our youth are all too familiar with vices of the worst kind; if the rising generation are being brought up to believe that the possession of money is the sole happiness, and no means necessary to that end is to be avoided on moral grounds; if there is no goal to look forward to but to be rich, and to spend your riches in sensual enjoyments; if honor and honesty go for nothing, the fault lies with you and your fellow old men, whose example should be the guide to us. If you old men gamble and grow rich, and openly indulge in vulgar vices; if you allow the boys and girls at home to see how coldly you treat your wives; if you leave the young to seek companions and haunts which are calculated to destroy their higher impulses and ambitions, you can not wonder if they grow up to be disagreeable in character, vicious in taste, ignorant in mind—in fact, utterly unworthy and dangerous members of society. Leaving you to ponder over what I have written, I am

Your affectionate nephew, WALKER, JUNIOR.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, January 26, 1879.

Artichoke Soup.
Fried Skates.
Broiled Teal Ducks. Potato Croquettes.
Stewed Celery. Green Peas.
Baked Beefsteak. Tomato Sauce.
Vegetable Salad.
Blanc Manger. Whipped Cream, and Quince Jelly.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, and Grapes.

TO BAKE BEEFSTEAK.—Take a large sirloin steak; bone it and spread it with a rich dressing made of bread crumbs, onion, thyme, parsley, and a trifle of garlic (very finely minced); make it into a roll, and secure with needle and thread. After it is nearly cooked, have some stewed tomatoes and strain them into the gravy, with a small piece of butter added.

We hope none of our readers spoiled their Christmas pudding, as through some inadvertency of the printers the half pound of suet was left out of the ingredients.

MODERN AMERICAN POETRY.

The publishers of the Boston No Name Series have carried the plan of anonymous productions into the realm of poetry, in their recent issue entitled "The Masque of the Poets." It was a deft device, doubtless, that of some seventy poems, more or less, to be worn by their authors as a disguise, seeing, that if it be frequently difficult to detect the writer of a prose composition by his trick of style, it must be infinitely more so to assign a particular sponsorship to rhymes. In the present case, certainly, the riddle seems destined to prove an insoluble one—so much so, that however discriminating the reader, it may fairly be assumed he will be quite unable to distinguish the many masqueraders severally from one another in the remarkable similarity of garb they all here curiously wear. The entire collection, on this account, would indeed rather suggest the supposition that they were produced by a single pen—that, too, of one possessing no markedly original or distinctive traits to give it individuality.

Some fifty poets are declared to have been contributors to the volume alluded to, and, with the exception of about a half-dozen names, all of them Americans. To the critical reader of poetry it strikingly suggests a reminder that nothing is more pitifully observable than the monotony of both subject-matter and strain in the rhythmical effusions now superabundantly appearing in the columns of the various magazines of the United States. These productions all have in common a family likeness so strong that they may be said to have been created in accordance with a certain mental conventionalism, which seems to have become tacitly a criterion of the period in that department of literature. Nearly all the writers of poetry, whatever their sex, are now chancing on the same harp-string—of the weakly ideal, the flopping emotional, the diffusive in the sylvan tinsel of flower-beds, mountains and streams, and a reaction against artistic restraints of language and metaphor, giving their effusions the similarity of peas in a pod. Evidently, they adapt their productions to the demands of the magazines after popular models presented for their imitation and emulation. Hence it is that they, one and all, perpetually repeat one another and themselves with a sameness and weakness immensely tedious to those who seek for freshness of manner, finish of touch, as well as a purport in keeping with the progress of the age, in this loftiest department of the pen. The few instances of non-conformity with the existing favorite style—namely, those who write up to some conscientious standard of art, and with the effort to awaken reflection in the ideal realm of legitimate poetry by suggesting its highest themes in the symbolism of verbal metre—meet with little favor at the hands either of critics or magazine editors; and such can only hope to receive recognition from the small class there may be of intellectual and independent minds capable of properly appreciating them. Happily for them, however, this class is all the time growing in numbers and influence. Meanwhile, the magazine poetry, with its utter freedom from relationship to art in methods and purpose, carries the day, and its assiduous authors reap their reward of acceptance in the false taste generally prevalent.

The following stanza is taken, almost at random, from "The Masque of the Poets," where it opens a poem entitled "A Bunch of Wild Flowers."

"Oh, take this perfumed, dewy offering,
Not fairer than thyself, though wondrous bright,
Fanned by the woodland zephyr's balmy wing;
At nature's kindly call, in sweet delight
Of their own beauty, these wild flowers spring!
On what brown, breezy woodland of green height,
In what cool, sylvan glen, or bosky dell,
Thou askedst, have I plucked them. I will tell."

This specimen is, both as to meaning and manner, so completely a repetition, as it were, of the numerous magazine poems published in this country from month to month, that, for all the probabilities of its style, it might quite as readily have been done by any one of their different authors as by any other. Unless—if there be some possible internal favoring of evidence in its nearly inexhaustible continuation of the vein of hopeless rhodomontade through nineteen further stanzas—it might, perhaps, not unreasonably be accredited to the prolific dead-level muse of that rising genius of insipid verbosity, Mr. Edgar Fawcett.

As exceptions, a few poems of undoubted merit and beauty might be selected from "The Masque of the Poets." Yet these also manage to keep the secret of their author's incognito. The single poem in the volume wherein the writer's hand may be recognized with full certainty is "The Marshes of Glynn," which is evidently the production of Sidney Lanier—judging from its melody, and the lack of restraint by which it escapes being withal a genuine work of art.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 20, 1879.

Z.

Mr. Vedder, the American artist, explains in a note from Rome to a Paris newspaper, that the publishers of L'Art got permission from him to fac simile and photograph two of his pictures, and then proceeded to prove by the same that he was no artist at all, and that all the merits discoverable in the reproductions was due to the skill of their own engravers. Whereupon Mr. Vedder observes: "I take no exception to the low estimate of my artistic ability on the part of the critic (it would be impossible for me to agree with the critic), but I do protest against this species of trap into which I have inadvertently been drawn, and wish to bring it to the notice of my brothers in art for their future benefit. Whether editor and critic were alone actuated by a sincere regard for the interests of art is not the question. I protest against the methods they have employed."

Deeper and deeper goes the peculiar philosophy of the obituary verse. Here is the latest vegetable:

"Under this sod
And under these trees
Lies the body
Of Samuel Pees.

"He's not in this hole,
But only his pod;
He shelled out his soul
And went up to God."

Men usually follow their wishes till suffering compels them to follow their judgment.

INTAGLIOS.

A Carcanet.

Not what the chemists say they be
Are pearls—they never grew;
They come not from the hollow sea,
They come from heaven in dew!

Down in the Indian sea it slips,
Through green and briny whirls,
Where great shells catch it in their lips
And kiss it into pearls!

"If dew can be so beauteous made,
Oh, why not tears, my girl?
Why not your tears? Be not afraid—
I do but kiss a pearl!" R. H. STODDARD.

Fifteen.

Last Hallowe'en she was just fifteen,
And slim and rosy, with big black 'en,
And all admired each budding charm
At the nightly dances at the farm.

On the earth that day the white snow lay:
All but the father within did stay,
And round the fire-place each one stands,
At the flame warming reddened hands.

By the window was a looking-glass,
Nearer a finger-cage, and the girl would pass,
To smile at her image mirrored there,
Thinking that no one was aware.

But granny spied the trick and cried,
Scoldingly half and half in pride,
"You'd have us think you're watching the snow—
Well, you're not bad-looking as girls now go."

The girl blushed red, and tossed her head,
And, pointing, to the old woman said:
"Is it only now you tell me so?
Some one else told me months ago."

M. MILLIEN.

In the Street.

Upon my road I nightly used to meet
This painted girl at the corner of the street
Offering herself, a ware, to whom would buy.

There was a deep and sheltered doorway nigh,
Where, shivering and weeping from the cold,
Crouched a young girl that penny nose-gays sold.
And the soiled woman I saw hover round
Until the little one was sleeping sound;
Then only gave she alms, with tear-drops hot—
Thou wilt forgive her, Father; wilt Thou not?

FRANCOIS COFFEE.

Palatine Hill.

A wolf-like stream without a sound
Steals by, and hides beneath the shore,
Its awful secrets evermore
Within its sullen bosom bound.

And this was Rome, that shrieked for room
To stretch her limbs! A hill of caves
For half-wild beasts and hairy slaves;
And gypsies tent within her tombs!

Two lone palms on the Palatine,
Two rows of cypress black and tall,
With white roots set in Caesar's Hall—
A garden, convent, and sweet shrine.

Tall cedars on a broken wall,
That look away toward Lebanon,
And seem to mourn for grandeur gone;
A wolf, an owl—and that is all!

JOAQUIN MILLER.

Ye Poet Hys Epitaph.

Thynke not of mee,
that I am in ye graue, and this foole's hande that graspt a scribblyng quille hath fallen to duste beneath ye rotted tissue of a shroude.
Catch thou ye daie! go laughynge thro' ye lande, whyles ye sunne shines for thee; recke not of cloude nor storm; ne deeme ye worm that gnaws me must Reuell one daie in thee!

Not for mine eye
ye paynted imagery of a poet's brain, drawn in thy daie by some lord of songe;
Not for mine ear ye harmonys to break
in unborn yeares from Musicke's conynge trayne;
Albeit if aught of mine hath liued to wake a chauce response thy reueries among,
Contente mine ashes lye.

J. W. GREEN.

Only Me.

A little figure glided through the hall;
"Is that you, Pet?"—the words came tenderly;
A sob—suppressed to let the answer fall—
"It isn't Pet, mamma; it's only me."

The quivering baby-lips!—they had not meant
To utter any word could plant a sting,
But to that mother's heart a strange pang went;
She heard, and stood like a convicted thing.

One instant, and a happy little face
Thrilled 'neath unwonted kisses rained above;
And, from that moment, Only Me had place
And part with Pet in tender mother love.

CAROLINE A. MASON.

Night on the Farm.

'Tis dewfall on the lonely farm,
The flocks are gathered in the fold,
The dusky air is soft and balmy,
The daisies bide their hearts of gold.

Slow, drowsy, swinging bells are heard
In pastures dewy, dark, and dim,
And in the door-yard trees a bird
Trills sleepily his evening hymn.

The dark, blue deeps are full of stars;
One lone lamp in the hillside glooms;
A mile away, is red as Mars;
The night is sweet with faint perfumes.

ANNA BOYNTON AVERILL.

Peach Blossoms.

Pain, Doubt, and Death are over!
Who thinks, to-day, of toil?

The fields are certain of clover,
The gardens of wine and oil.
What though the sap of the North
Drowsily peereth forth

In the orchards, and still delays?
The peach and the poet know
Under the chill the glow,
And the token of golden days.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

Love's Farewell.

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part—
Nay, I have done, you get no more of me;
And I am glad, yea, glad with all my heart,
That thus so clearly I myself can free.

Shake hands forever, cancel all our vows,
And when we meet at any time again,
Be it not seen in either of our brows
That we one jot of former love retain.

Now at the last gasp of love's latest breath,
When his pulse failing, passion speechless lies,
When faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
And innocence is closing up his eyes—
Now, if thou wouldst, when all have given him over,
From death to life thou might'st him yet recover.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

*A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting
Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address
of nearly Six Thousand Society People.*

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

The ELITE DIRECTORY is a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

JUST PUBLISHED, AND FOR SALE BY THE PRINCIPAL
BOOKSELLERS, AND SPECIAL CANVASSERS.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.
SAN FRANCISCO SOCIETY.
RECEPTION DAYS.
CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
JEWISH ADDRESS LIST.
OAKLAND ADDRESS LIST.
PRIVATE MEMORANDA.
ARMY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
NAVY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
PERMANENT GUESTS AT HOTELS—
Palace.
Grand.
Occidental.
Lick.
Baldwin.
BAR ASSOCIATION.
ART ASSOCIATION.
LORING CLUB.
BERKELEY CLUB.
CHIT-CHAT CLUB.
CLUBS AND CLUB LIFE.
PACIFIC CLUB.
UNION CLUB.
BOHEMIAN CLUB.
OCCIDENTAL CLUB (Oakland).
SAN FRANCISCO VEREIN.
CONCORDIA.
SPANISH-AMERICAN CLUB.

OLYMPIC.
THEATRE DIAGRAMS—
California.
Baldwin.
Bush Street.
Standard.
Grand Opera House.
POINTS OF ETIQUETTE—
Introductions.
Salutations.
Calls and Calling.
Strangers in the City.
Visiting and Visiting Cards for Ladies.
For Gentlemen.
General Directions, Cards, Calling.
The Kettle-drum.
Parties, Balls, and Germans.
Dinners and Dining Out.
Breakfast, Luncheons, and Supper.
Etiquette of Weddings.
Opera and Theatre Parties.
Theatre Etiquette for Gentlemen.
Ladies' Theatre Invitations.
Miscellaneous Rules.
PERSONNEL OF THE PRESS.
CHURCH DIRECTORY.
PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
BUSINESS NOTICES.

NEW

BOOKS

Hereditary Genius. An Inquiry into its Laws and Consequences. By Francis Galton, F.R.S., etc. New edition. 12mo. $2 00
A Face Illumined. By E. P. Roe. 12mo. 1 50
Cupid and the Sphinx. By Harford Fleming. 12mo. 1 25
Swedenborg and Channing. Showing the many and remarkable agreements in the beliefs and teachings of these writers. By R. F. Barrett. 12mo. 1 00
Pretty Little Countess Zina. A Russian Story. Translated from the French by Mary Neal Sherwood. 12mo. Cloth, $1 25; paper. 75
Tales from the German of Paul Heyse. (Collection of Foreign Authors.) Paper. 60
My Guardian. By Ada Cambridge. 12mo. Paper. 60
Health Primers. No. 1. Exercise and Training. No. 2. Alcohol, its Use and Abuse. (Cloth, each.) 50
William Guller Bryant. Life, Character, and Writings. A Commemorative Address. By George William Curtis. Cloth. 75
The Philosophy of Existence. The Reality and Romance of Histories. By E. G. Kelley, M. D. 5 00
Life and Faith. Sonnets. By George McKnight. 12mo. Cloth. 2 00
Poems of House and Home. By John James Patt. 12mo. Cloth. 1 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.

ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

THOMAS H. HOLT,

NOTARY PUBLIC, No. 326½ Montgomery Street. Residence, 1803 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST; REMOVED TO 737 MARKET STREET, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST, removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANGUAGES, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English, German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods. Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

RARE ENGRAVINGS

MODERN FRENCH ETCHINGS.

A CHOICE COLLECTION OF THE best Proof Engravings and Etchings always on hand. Rare Engravings procured. All interested in Art are welcome to inspect collection either as visitors or purchasers. W. K. VICKERY, 22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street. MARK SHELTON.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Wilcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento, J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

BE SURE AND SEE A COPY

When a new play is written by a home author its doom is generally forecast.

There is a lurking local pride which hopes that it may succeed.
There is a gloom of prophecy which foretells that it will not.
This latter is born of experience.

It rarely judges amiss, for what one of our home plays has lived?
It was with both these flutterings of the heart that the friends of the author went to see Loyal till Death.

There was a well-dressed crowd on the stage; there was a well-dressed crowd in front; there was high anticipation everywhere.

When the broad, red satin lambrequins swung up in festoons,

"There was silence, as of death,
And the boldest held his breath
For a time."

Naturally this sort of thing can not go on long.
Opinions began to be expressed.

It began to be evident that the characters were well distributed. Mr. Jennings was a "Marquis" of the ancien regime; Mr. Herne, as "St. Simon," was his old friend.

All old Frenchman have old friends.

They are like women for chums.

Miss Rose Wood, as "Blanche," was the young wife of an old man.

This is not an uncommon case in any country—where the old men are rich.

Miss Corcoran, as "Amélie," is a gentle, ingenuous, yielding young creature, excepting in the matter of her love.

There, she is adamant.

They all are at her age.

It is astonishing the amount of obstinacy—spunk, they call it themselves—these girls can conjure up when they and their parents do not agree upon the choice of a husband.

"Amélie" is betrothed to "Maurice, who is the nephew of the old "Marquis," and who is beloved by la Marquise; "Amélie" is also beloved by "Eugene," another nephew.

Given, a very nice family complication.

Every one wants what he can not have, and no one has exactly what he wants.

This is the touch of nature which makes the world akin.

The family party could not be complete without that delightful old person who is eventually to develop into the mother-in-law.

In this instance she is the one faint spice of comedy which relieves the gloom.

As it chanced, the part fell particularly in Mrs. Farren's line.

Those much trilled r's, those airs and graces of the olden time, sat not less ill than the voluminous tournure of her brocade.

Mrs. Farren was the success of the evening.

As for the play, it moved smoothly and successfully, but slowly, through two acts.

The unhappy "Blanche" declares her love to "Maurice" on that most inauspicious occasion, his betrothal fête.

It was not well done.

"Blanche" is one of those darlings of the novelists—an icy cold, icy calm statue.

This is all very well in a book; but a woman can not go through life like a Spitzberg stalactite.

Ernst Legouvé says every emotion is a jewel.

In the drama each of these jewels requires a setting.

One can not know that a fair-seeming mountain is a volcano unless, according to the geographies, "it spits forth fire and lava."

One can not know that a heroine is seething and boiling with fire and fury when she simply moans, "I love you."

Moans, alas! she whined.

The confession to her husband was much more prettily done.

It is a lesson for young wives who find their affections cantering away in the wrong direction.

But confession does not become a luxury, as Grace Roseberry says, when the confessor is ridiculous.

The quick dramatic instinct of the gallery boy is infallible.

When Jennings was pathetic the gallery boy tittered.

The latter is more fatal than the guffaw.

Is it impossible that a comedian should be pathetic?

Not necessarily, for I once saw Bishop, with all nature against him, move an audience, not quite to tears, but to a consciousness of the tear gland.

He is a great man; he has never repeated himself.

Jennings is not a low comedian, and, therefore, has no right to be ridiculous in the wrong place.

As a matter of retribution, perhaps, he was murdered ten minutes after.

With this episode ended all the originality of the play.

An old man murdered at dead of night—slain in a moment of anger by his nephew.

The inopportune entrance at midnight of the innocent man—another nephew who had been discarded.

The alarmed household find him with the dead man.

He is accused of the murder.

He is cast into prison.

His sweetheart comes to visit him there.

(Did they call them sweethearts in 1780?)

She is to wed another that she may save her lover.

He escapes his prison, etc., etc.

It is not six weeks since we saw Conscience on the same stage.

It is not many months since, in another play, we heard James O'Neill fretting behind the bars, which he burst in a moment of frenzy. He does the same in Loyal till Death.

He attempts to brain the keeper with that deadly domestic weapon—a footstool.

The turnkey averts the tragedy by delivering up his coat and hat to "Maurice," who escapes in disguise, but reappears in his gold-laced, arsenic green velvet coat, and point-device from top to toe.

Thenceforth, incidents crowd thick and fast upon each other.

The play is taken from the main characters and passed over to the subordinates.

"Therese," a Breton peasant girl, and the victim of "Eugene," the villain, becomes the hinge of action.

"Eugene," who insists upon calling the family name "Du Sheen," after murdering his uncle, throwing "Therese" over an abyss, and going through a great amount of duplicity and chicanery, is exiled from France.

The lovers fall into each other's arms as the curtain descends, and all ends well.

The play had what the lobbyists call a good send-off.

It was liberally advertised.

It was produced on an exceptional occasion.

The scenery was superb, particularly the salon in the first act.

Even the little prize-package abyss, with a Rixian sunset in the background, looked very tragic, though not very big.

The costumes were beyond cavil.

One forgot the stoic impassability of Miss Corcoran's face while the others are playing in contemplating her pink moiré.

Miss Wood's dress was pretty, but not so characteristic.

Mrs. Farren was a triumph of ancient art.

As for Olive Miss West, she was in such deep and deadly earnest, so fresh from the training mistress, so really talented perhaps—in a way—that nothing of her costume lingers in the memory excepting a new brand of hosiery.

John T. Raymond likes something striking.

His first dress (that must be a wrong phrase as applied to a gentleman's make-up. Costume?—no; toilette?—no; his first rig) is evidently made of bed ticking.

What is his idea? He looks no more like a life insurance man than he does like an undertaker.

He is simply Brother Jonathan, minus the straps, transferred from Nast's cartoons, umbrella and all.

But then Raymond is no more an actor than he is a life insurance agent.

He is simply a funny fellow.

But, per contra, he is exquisitely funny, and therefore we like to go to see him.

He has a ready wit, which he uses ad libitum.

Any play will do for Raymond. He will write or talk his own part in.

What earthly connection has he with the play of Risks?

At every entrance he may have dropped from the clouds.

Perhaps that is the origin of the life insurance agent.

Natural history does not provide for the origin of the species in any other way.

Risks just escapes being an idyl—an American idyl.

The thread of the story has absolutely nothing to do with Raymond, whom, by the way, no one ever thinks of as "Pemberton Pembroke."

There is something really poetic in the play, crude as it is, until it is broken in upon by this awful life insurance business.

To say truth, it really looks as if some enterprising firm engaged in this line had hit upon a new mode of advertising.

For the unexpected insurance money in the last act is singularly a propos.

It puts it into one's head, at the last moment, that life insurance is really a good thing.

A clever dodge.

Raymond has rather a genius for falling upon new plays.

I believe it was he who first introduced Pygmalion and Galatea, Led Astray, Colonel Sellers, of course, and one or two others.

It does not matter a farthing what the play is; he fits himself into it somewhere.

In this way he is an impressario, quite as much as he is an actor.

Hence we are to have My Son.

How beautifully Risks was mounted!

The picnic ground was really sylvan.

As for the ball-room, it was a welcome change from that much-used arch.

It did not look like the stage ball at all. We caught but glimpses of the dancers whirling past the windows, and they seemed to be enjoying themselves much more heartily than when upon their stage behavior.

I saw the wraith of Kate Dennis' once famous beauty peering through the lace curtains for a moment, and it was startling.

But it turned out to be only one of her pretty daughters, in white satin.

It is not often that women have so complete a mirror of their youth before them.

The humble home of the Newtons was more like the interior of an old country cottage than an American farm-house, an illusion heightened by the English maid-of-all-work.

She was caparisoned like the slavey of the English lodging house.

Her accent was something atrociously bad.

In point of fact, Miss Long has nothing to recommend her for the stage but a pair of handsome eyes.

There are actresses who have not so much.

BETSY B.

Monday, February 2d, the Weathersby's Froliques appear at the Bush Street Theatre in their opera travesties and dramatic extravaganzas.

N. C. Goodwin is with the troupe, which is said to be of a degree of excellence that will capture those who are interested in a pot-pourri of fun and mimicry.

Lecocq, the author of La Fille de Madame Angot, is drawing crowds to the Théâtre de la Renaissance with his new operetta of La Camargo.

Hundreds are nightly turned away from the doors.

The Amusement World says: "Barney Macauley's days are numbered, which is to say that the inimitable Uncle Dan will leave New York shortly.

His season has doubtless been a satisfactory one, but an offer of $20,000 from the Pacific side of this great and glorious country is deemed enough to warrant him in exchanging the balmy breezes of California for the severe atmosphere of New York.

There are several reasons why Mlle. Litta is not to marry John Underner, of Cleveland, the principal one being that he has one wife already.

ASSORTED BONBONS.

Comprehensive classification for unmarried men.—One lady to another:

"Where is Mr. Debroun's wife?"

"Oh, he hasn't got any wife; he's a fool."

Watchmaker.—"Excuse me, sir; to get that watch fixed will cost as much as a new one."

Customer.—"Well, you fix it, and I'll give you double what I gave for it."

Watchmaker.—"What did you give for it?"

Customer.—"A swat over the head."

"Two of a kind again," sarcastically remarks a young hopeful whose mother has presented him with twins for the fifth time.

Then he sees a club in the old man's hand, and he hasn't the heart to stay in.

Paris Figure: "Politicians are an inferior and despised race. In England, Russia (?), and America they are looked upon as the lowest class of society. In Philadelphia they are not even saluted."

"Do you allow your salesmen to lie?" asks an infuriated customer of a pious Boston merchant.

"Certainly not, sir. If you can prove to me that one of my young men willfully misrepresents any article of merchandise to you he forfeits his place at once."

The customer explains his dissatisfaction, and points out the salesman.

"Did you tell this gentleman these paper collars would wash, Mr. Quinn?" said the merchant, in a severe tone, to the anxious salesman.

"Yes, sir," readily answered the offender; "but I did not tell him how they would look after washing."

He was hired over again at an increased salary.

And old gentleman of eighty-four, and his bride, aged eighty-two, enter a railway car and take a seat by the stove. A youth occupying the seat behind swears he overheard the following:

Old gentleman to bride—"Who's a little lamb?"

Bride—"Bofe of us."

The French beat the world for coolness.

Monsieur Deboffe, of Calais, amuses himself by chopping his mistress into exactly fifteen pieces.

He is arrested and brought to the remains. He turns to the juge d'instruction. "Yes, I confess killing her," he says. "That, to the best of my belief, is the woman; but I find her a good deal changed since I first met her."

A young and rich Southern lady, with her three children, boards one of the Mississippi steamboats which have the dangerous habit of racing when a couple of them are careering up and down the river.

"Captain, I will make the trip with you on one condition—give me your word of honor that you will not race."

"Madam, I pledge my word."

They start. After half an hour another steamer begins to overhaul the first. The lady rushes frantically to the captain.

"Captain, d'ye see? d'ye see?"

"Yes, madam."

"And will you endure it? Will you allow her to give you the go-by? No, impossible! You will at least try?"

"Heavens! madam," replies the captain, coldly, "I don't race; but if I did I have no more wood to pile on and show her our heels, unless—"

"Quick! quick! What is it?"

"Unless I burn one of your children."

"Very well, captain," she cries, straining her corset over the railing and looking wildly at the advancing steamer; "hurry up. Burn the biggest!"

EPITAPH.

Being in doubt, the woman here that lies,
Whether there a hereafter is or no,
And what it may be like, her Paradise
Took out while here below.

"Sir," said, impressively, a young gentleman who was monopolizing the fire-place—"sir, I was born the son of a poor but honest miner, and before I was twenty I was the son of a bonanza king."

The Marquis, to restore his family to something like its ancient state, espouses and brings home to his old château a wife, a rich wife, a very rich wife, but as to looks—

They attended church on the first Sunday after their arrival, and the worthy priest of the parish deems it is duty to address some sentences of eulogy and welcome to the newly-wedded pair.

"Yes, Monsieur la Marquis," exclaims the excellent old man, "I say it without fear of contradiction, your new spouse must be one of the holiest and best of women. She must have a beautiful soul, a beautiful soul, for if she did not why should you have married her?"

"Why does Mr. Skinfint, the possessor of so many millions, always travel third class?"

"Because there is no fourth class."

A convict sentenced to death is aroused from his sleep at 4 A. M. and informed that he is to be decapitated in five minutes.

The executioner asks him if he will have something to keep up his courage—some brandy.

"Gimme a quart of brandy, quick!" gasps the condemned man.

"Come, now, I say," says the public func., "anything in reason, you know, but if you drink a quart of brandy you'll be drunk."

"Never mind; it won't have time to go to my head."

A Corsican lawyer is conducting the defense of a murderer on the mainland. Having with care arrayed the facts of the case, he begins his argument:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: It has been fully set forth by the witnesses you have heard that the act of my client was one of private and personal revenge, long premeditated, and prepared for through laborious years."

"We contend nothing else," says the Attorney-General.

"Thank you," says the learned counsel, with warm gratitude, and sits down, to give the Judge a chance to direct the jury to acquit without leaving the box.

The learned Judge promptly sentences the prisoner to death.

PRIZE CULTURE.

Q.—What was Lucifer's lawsuit, and in what particular did it resemble the Vanderbilt case?

A.—Lucifer's lawsuit was a book written by an Italian monk, Giacomo Palladina, of Teranto, A. D. 1382. The demons, for whom Belial is counsel, plead against Christ, who retains Moses. The case is argued with much vigor and spirit, though Belial makes a far better lawyer than Moses. The case is finally left unfinished, which is precisely what has happened to the Vanderbilt case.

Q.—Who was it said that if a certain beautiful woman's nose had been shorter the history of the world would have been changed? And who was the woman?

A.—Pascal said that if Cleopatra's nose had been shorter the whole history of the world would have been changed.

Q.—What do you think the most remarkable instance in history of great events flowing from a trifling cause?

A.—This is also to be found in Pascal's Pensées. He considers the death of Cromwell, which was brought about by stone in the bladder, as being the greatest instance in history of great events flowing from a small cause.

Q.—Who invented milk punch?

A.—In Solomon's Songs, v., 1, it is to be found the following text: "I have drunk my wine with my milk."

Q.—When did the first rebellion occur?

A.—In heaven, when Lucifer rebelled.

Q.—Who wrote the lines:

"Rattle his bones over the stones,
He's only a pauper whom nobody owns?"

A.—T. Noel.

Q.—State any point of resemblance between Achilles and the author of the well-known lines:

"Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out."

A.—Achilles was killed by being struck on his heel—as we all know—and Sir John Suckling is said to have been killed by a revengeful servant, who fixed a knife-blade in his boot, so that it would run into him when he put it on.

Q.—Do you believe in the story of William Tell? State your reasons either way, and briefly.

A.—The story of William Tell and the apple is very doubtful. It appears in the writings of no historians of the age, but is found in those who wrote not less than a century and a half later; whereas the same story is to be met with in the folk-lore of almost every country, and in a particularly distinct form among Northern nations.

Q.—What is the origin of the phrase, "getting into a scrape?"

A.—It is an expression used in Scotland, where, in the game of Golf, a rabbit's burrow is called a scrape, and the player whose ball gets into one is in no pleasant predicament.

Q.—Has it ever been settled who wrote "Rock Me to Sleep, Mother?" If so, who did write it?

A.—Florence Percy wrote "Rock Me to Sleep, Mother," and she would not have done so if she had foreseen the extent to which it has been sung and murdered.

Q.—Who first used the phrase "a toad-eater," and what was the origin of it?

A.—The Spaniards called the few Moors who remained as servants in the land of Arragon mitadilla (my factotum), because they were so handy and willing. This phrase became our well known "toad-eater."

Q.—Who wrote the lines:

"Here's a cup to the dead already;
Hurrah for the next who dies?"

A.—Eli Perkins said he did; but he is such a liar that the public credits them to Sergeant Bates.

Q.—When do we first hear of the pibroch, which is now resounding from Halifax to Ottawa, in the history of North America?

A.—In Wolfe's assault upon Quebec a regiment of Highlanders was ordered to charge, but without the pibroch, as no noise was desired. They were unable to do so, however, wit out their favorite music, and broke. When this was told to Wolfe he said: "Let them play, in God's name!" which, being done, the Highlanders carried all before them.

Q.—The Marchioness of Lorne asked me to ask, since the loss of the Princess Alice, the origin of the expression, "Who set the river on fire?"

A.—"He will never set the river on fire" is properly "He will never set the Thames on fire." The temse was a corn sieve which was worked in former times over the receiver of the sifted flour. A hard working, active man would not infrequently ply the temse so quickly as to set fire to the wooden hoop at the bottom, but a lazy fellow would never set the temse on fire.

Questions in Brief.

1.—Where was Moses when the light went out?

2.—Why do the summer roses fade?

3.—Who stole Stewart's body?

4.—Who invented buckwheat cakes?

5.—And why?

6.—Who was the author of the quotation:

"Shake not thy gory locks at me—
Thou canst not say I done it!"

7.—How much did the man who struck B. Pater-son strike him for?

8.—Who first wore a chest-protector? And what was there peculiar about his great-grandmother?

9.—What is the origin of the custom of licking a postage-stamp?

10.—Why are five-cent shins charged at the rate of five cents apiece? And in what respect does this compare with the battle of Agincourt?

11.—Why is it advisable to wash one's self, and who first used water for this peculiar purpose?

12.—Little Bo-Peep, she lost her sheep, and didn't know where to find them. How is this fact connected with the well-known fable of Bryan O'Lynn?

13.—Has the Marquis of Lorne a strawberry-mark in the small of his back? And if not, why not?

14.—The Princess Louise bought a tin teapot the other day, in Ottawa, for 25 cents. She did, indeed. Supposing she did, what then?

15.—Are there any authentic cases, in history or traditional mythology, of baked snowballs?

16.—If Dick's father were Tom's son, what relation was Dionysius the Pig-Sticker to Eli Perkins?

17.—What is the origin of doing in Turkey as Turks do? And how many thousand idiots regard the use of the phrase as intensely humorous?

18.—Who killed Cock-Robin? What grounds are there for believing that the Sparrow lied? And was the Sparrow married?

19.—What peculiar animal supplies the place of the bed-bug in Kamtschatka?

20.—Who was the original Great American Pie-Biter of Hornellsville, and were his duties performed in a perfunctory manner, or did he bite the plate?

21.—How do you construe "Kipsiphomat eph-laneigan kutsileusthain?" And is kutsileusthain in the acrostic perfect or is it web-footed?

22.—What was "the light of other days," and why did it light out?

23.—In how many years from now is it probable that the news of the Mexican war will reach Philadelphia?

24.—Who was Dion Bouicault, and what was he king of?

25.—If you saw a man chasing a jack-rabbit with a pink rosette on his left ear, and the jack-rabbit ran up to a third-rate carpenter who had lost five wives by a small-pox, the last one having been regarded by some physicians as merely a case of virulent varioloid; and the carpenter afterward joined the greenback party and took to drink, thereby causing a depreciation in the breadstuffs market equivalent to the cosine of a—b+c=d, and inducing the aunt of the Governor of Winnebago to elope with a giraffe from a circus which had previously gone into bankruptcy by means of fraudulent affidavits procured from a moon-eyed leper in the Jews' quarter of Bagdad, it being an off-year for watermelons and rather inclined to the horizontal, with Italian fluting along the edges, would you consider that man insane?

A Kiss in the Dark.

Which I wish to remark,
That a pleasure in vain
Is a kiss in the dark
When it leaveth a stain:
And a maid who strikes quickly her colors
When pressed, I shall never maintain.

It was a "surprise,"
When the fair ladies went
To kill time, while it flies,
With their beaux, who were bent
On having a social reunion.
At the cost of—well, more than assent.

Just here let me say
To the ladies below,
Who in polka display
Their fantastic light toe,
That their husbands, upstairs, also poked—
Yes, ladies, you well may cry "Owe!"

If the husbands but knew
How their wives flirt below,
They would be to them—glue;
For they'd stick to them so
That the popinjays all would look elsewhere,
Nor want for a tip of the toe.

In the waltz I embraced
A fair maid with soft eyes.
Oh, the size of her waist
Made me waste many sighs;
And I likened her cheeks to red roses,
And whispered, "Sweet love never dyes."

Then together we strayed
In the light of the moon,
Where I kissed that sweet maid;
She pretended to swoon,
But her faint was a feint, so I kissed her
Again, for I relished the boon.

Back again on the floor,
With my sweet at I danced,
While the people there wore
Merry smiles, as they glanced
At my partner, so stayed—in her manner—
And at me, so completely entranced.

When my love turned around
I was shocked at the sight;
Where the roses were found,
One had met with a blight;
While a cheek was still blooming and rosy,
The other was fearfully white.

From my good-looking lass,
Filled with fright, I straight flew
To a bad looking-glass,
Where I gazed; then I knew
That my nose, which was formerly turn-up,
Was radish—bright crimson in hue.

Which is why I remark,
That a pleasure in vain
Is a kiss in the dark
When it leaveth a stain;
And a maiden who runs when you kiss her
Is fast—which I eye maintain.
H. C. Dodge, in Puck.

It was the proprietor of an American lunch counter who said: "I care not who makes the laws of the country, if I may make its sandwiches." And he finished hammering out the bottom of one, welded the upper crust down to it, brazed the edges, tempered it, and laid it in the sun, and filled out a blank burial permit while he waited for the next customer.

The average man will sit passive in a barber's chair and unmurmuringly submit to having his countenance veneered with soap suds and thumped with a wad of hog-bristles; but if his wife should accidentally spatter him with a dish-cloth all the recording angels in the land couldn't do justice to his remarks.

Of all sad words by pen or tongue,
The saddest is, "I've lost a lung."

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The average small boy's ambition is to be a trapper, a pirate, or a song-and-dance man. "When I wath a little boy," lisped a very stupid society man to a young lady, "all my idea in life was thentered on being a clown." "Well there is at least one case of gratified ambition," was the sharp reply.

Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
That never to himself hath said,
"This is eighteen and seventy-eight,"
When he a letter had to date?
If such there be, go, mark him well,
That man is lying sure as 2 and 2 make 4.

Who was it that alluded to Joaquin Miller as the "poet lariat?" On that must ang his hopes of fame.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The new cook book, "How to Get a Good Dinner," should be in the hands of every tramp.

Painting on porcelain. MISS RYDER, 26½ Kearny Street.

A NEW DEPARTURE.

Within the last few months the changes of location in the piano trade have been marked. The most prominent is the removal of the Hazelton Bros. Piano Agency to the elegant and extensive ware-rooms, 647 Market Street, Nucleus Block. These rooms have a frontage of nearly forty feet on Market, and run through to Stevenson Street, a distance of one hundred and seventy feet, making the largest piano room in the city. The Hazelton pianos have always been considered among the best, but since their triumph over all competitors at the Great International Exhibition at Philadelphia they have rapidly grown in popular favor. At the Centennial they received the highest award for elastic touch, singing quality, delicacy and power of tone, and excellence of workmanship. As evidence of the great durability of these celebrated instruments we were recently shown a piano which had been rented nearly ten years, and which had earned over eight hundred dollars, and yet showed but little wear. Mr. Eaton has also in stock a large assortment of the J. P. Hale Pianos, celebrated for power and brilliancy of tone, durability, and moderate price. Any of these pianos will be sold at cash prices on the easiest instalments, and old instruments taken as first payments. This is the only strictly piano house on the coast, as Mr. Eaton has facilities possessed by no other firm. The public will find it to their advantage to patronize him.

What can give more satisfaction to a stern "parent" and his better half than to contemplate the lovely features of their amiable offspring as photographed by Mr. Boyd's Lightning Process, at the Yocsonite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Validity of the Mutual Life Insurance Company's New Policies Affirmed.

This question has been passed upon by some of the most eminent lawyers of the day, among them being Messrs. Dwight Foster and P. W. Chandler of Boston, Leonard Scott of Chicago, and others, whose opinions are summed up as follows:

First—That the course of action in reducing the premiums is clearly within the power of the Company.

Second—That the contract of insurance to the new member is, beyond question, valid and binding.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CALABASAS LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND
Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.

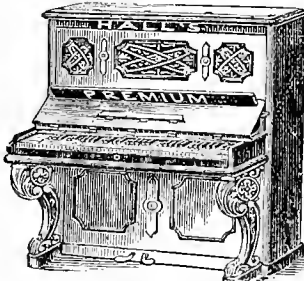

For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus, or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange, San Francisco.

YELLOW JACKET SILVER MINing Company.—Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada. Principal place of business, Main St., Gold Hill, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of said Company, held on the fifteenth day of January, A. D. 1879, an assessment (No. 31) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon each and every share of the capital stock of said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of Company, Main Street, Gold Hill Nevada, or to James Newlands, Transfer Secretary, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, shall be deemed delinquent, and will be duly advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.
Office—Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

LEE D. CRAIG,
Notary Public and Commissioner of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties.
No. 610 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY
SAN FRANCISCO.
Successor to F. V. Scudder.

BILLINGS,
HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,
PARTY INVITATIONS
AND VISITING CARDS

Engraved and printed in the latest style.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Monday, January 27th, and every evening. Wednesday and Saturday Matinees.

LAST WEEK
LAST WEEK

CALLENDER'S FAMOUS
CALLENDER'S FAMOUS

GEORGIA A great Farewell Bill. MINSTRELS
GEORGIA — New Songs and Specialties MINSTRELS
GEORGIA MINSTRELS

An uproarious burlesque of the Four Hamtowns and of the Six Banjoes, besides new acts and sketches.

Last Performance Sunday, February 2d.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, January 25, and every evening until further notice, will be acted the original drama, in three acts,

LOYAL TILL DEATH.

In act fifth, incidental to the play, will be danced THE GAVOTTE, by eight young ladies, costumed a la Watteau.

Sunday evening, January 26th, Benefit of MR. SAM.
WETHERILL.

UNDER THE GASLIGHT.

In active preparation, the last London eccentricity,

HE WOULD AND HE WOULD NOT

STANDARD THEATRE.
Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

Tenth week of the Farewell engagement of

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

MATINEE SATURDAY AT 2 O'CLOCK.

LAST HORRORS MATINEE

To-day at 2 P. M.

Monday, January 27, the jolliest of all the charming musical extravaganzas,

EVANGELINE.

Produced on a scale of magnificence never yet equaled in this city.

Seats at box office one week in advance. Also, by telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at box office rates.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

SECOND WEEK AND IMMENSE SUCCESS OF

JOHN T. RAYMOND,

Who will appear on Monday, January 27, 1879, as

COL. SELLERS,

In Mark Twain's American Comedy, supported by a powerful cast.

ONLY COL. SELLERS MATINEE SATURDAY.

Monday evening, February 3, first time in this city of the latest Boston and New York success,

MY SON.

Mr. Raymond in his great character, "Herr Wiegand."

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3 and 4, SHERMAN'S BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of 14, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 77.)

NEW STORE

McDONALD & WILLIAMS

MERCHANT TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worsteds, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Ouatines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, a full line of all the materials to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose to offer to the public at the following low prices:

- Pants, from $5
- Suits, from 20
- Overcoats, from 15
- Usters, from 15
- Dress Coats, from 20
- White Vests, from 3
- Silk and Wool Vests, from 6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

Samples and Self-measurement Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

CHICKERING

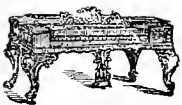

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, WHO can give satisfactory references if required, desires room and board in a private family. Location, north of Market Street preferred. Address R. B. D., this office.

THE Automatic SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,
124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO. FURNITURE

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

- Pants, - - - $4
- Suits, - - - 15
- Overcoats, - 15
- Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6X See large sign at the tailor

TO ORDER:

- Black Doeskin
- Pants, - - - $7
- White Vests, fm 3
- Fancy Vests, - - 6
- Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.,
12 Post Street San Francisco.

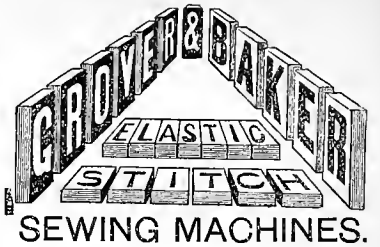

CHAS. N. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 7, 2, and 3.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To
the trade and at retail.
J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

WAKELEE'S AUREOLINE

PRODUCES THE BEAUTIFUL
Golden Hair so much admired. Superior to the imported article by reason of its freshness and the care used in its production.

PRICE, LARGE BOTTLES, $2.

Manufactured by

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
DRUGGISTS,
Corner Montgomery and Bush Streets, San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap. Wherever tested on their merits, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind, and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARGOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 5.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 1, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Thursday, the 23d of the month just past, being the birthday of an intimate friend, I was invited to a dinner given to celebrate the occasion. The repast was excellent in every particular, and the company sat until after ten o'clock. When the cloth was removed we continued at table with our host, discussing various topics, and occasionally sipping at some specially fine old Pedro Ximenes sherry, of the vintage of 1842. When we rose to go home, which we did at midnight, the sherry bottle was empty, and some other bottles besides. I remember, though rather vaguely, that, while tasting the wine, we discussed local and State politics, and particularly the so-called "workingmen's movement" in California. My friend, according to my recollection, did not wholly agree with me as to what I claimed would be the inevitable result of the election in September, namely: the utter defeat of the whole thing, and the triumph of the Republican ticket. He insisted that such a result was by no means a foregone conclusion. He asserted, as his opinion, that there was enough general distrust and dissatisfaction with politics in this State to afford capital for at least one victory for Kearney; and that, let the old parties conduct themselves with ever so much discretion, still this would prove to be an off year with them both, and the workingmen would carry the day. I remember that this conversation was still going on in a desultory way as the brandy and sherry bottles ran low; and when it came time to depart my friend took the positive stand, that it made no difference what happened, Kearney would carry the State and in five years would be "Dictator!" And when I rose to grope my way to my carriage, I had still ringing in my ears the last words of our host, "Kearney Dictator!" I am not able at this moment to remember just how, or at what time, I reached my bed, or precisely in what manner I managed to undress or get into it. I am convinced, however, that to some extent at least I did both, for on the morning of the 24th, which was the very next day, I awoke in my own bed, with my boots still securely upon my feet, and my best overcoat buttoned about me as a temporary substitute for a nightgown. I give these details only in order to show the accuracy of my memory; for what I have to relate is the very singular dream that I had on the night of the 23d, after leaving my friend's house; a dream which I have no doubt, if not absolutely produced, was certainly greatly influenced, by the conversation I had with my friend over the sherry, and especially by his final remark about Kearney being Dictator. My dream was so vivid that it seemed more like a vision than a dream, yet, in this matter-of-fact age, I must treat it as a dream. I dreamed that matters turned out just as my friend had predicted, and in my mind I saw it all. The two old parties held primary elections just a week apart. Colonel James Gannon managed them both. They were conducted under the Porter Primary Election Law, Registrar Kaplan and the Election Commissioner attending personally at the polls, to see that every voter was duly sworn, and that there was no tampering with the ballot-boxes. The primary elections of the Republican and Democratic parties being, as I said before, only one week apart, the same management was sufficient for both; the same headquarters, the same organization, paid for out of the same fund; the same printed tickets for both elections, and the same patriots distributed them, on the respective election days, for both Democratic and Republican primaries; and, lastly, the same voters cast their ballots at both elections. It was altogether in the usual, customary way; was very economical, very quiet, and the result very decisive. I dreamed that I voted on both days, and each time for men sound to the core upon all the great measures of reform demanded by the people. In my dream the Republican Convention was held first in order of time at Sacramento, and was acknowledged to be the most harmonious party assemblage ever held in that city. Not a ripple of discord disturbed its placid surface. It was called to order by Mr. Abell, and Marcus D. Boruck was duly elected Secretary. After the organization was perfected, a Committee on Platform and Resolutions was appointed, composed mainly of the party leaders; which committee at once proceeded to the apartments of Mr. Stow, for consultation and stationery. In fifteen minutes they had agreed upon the principles to be enunciated during the approaching canvass, and reported them back to the Convention in due form. The report was read at the desk by Mr. Boruck, in his best manner. I can almost repeat its exact words. The platform began as usual, by "pointing with pride" to the glorious career of the time-honored and historic party of freedom and human rights [cheers]. It reminded the people of the State that the party had suppressed a gigantic rebellion, had freed four million slaves, and given all of them the ballot, and many of them offices [more cheers]; had resumed specie payment, redeemed the human race, and saved the nation. Having said so much as to its acts in the past, the platform proceeded in the customary form to declare the unalterable purpose of the Republican party to regulate, control, and, if necessary, abolish all corporations and monopolies [cries of Oh! Oh! and Good!]; to reduce the rates for water and gas [cheers and laughter], so that every family could have all it wanted; this, with the old and time-honored plank providing for retrenchment and reform [cheers and uproarious laughter], and in favor of Grant and a third term [tremendous and continuous cheering], ended the report of the committee. Just as the chair was on the point of putting the question to the Convention upon the adoption of the report, Mr. Stow arose in his place, and called the attention of the body to the omission of the customary denunciation of all subsidies to railroad and other corporations, and, making a ringing speech against the principles of subsidies in general, and against railroads in particular, moved that the report be amended in this particular. The Convention was enthusiastic, and the motion was carried amid a storm of applause. The platform was then adopted as the principles of the party, and the Convention proceeded to ballot for candidates. As usual in such cases, all candidates of doubtful integrity, or who were unsound upon the vital questions of the day, were defeated. Care was taken by the managers of the Convention that only enemies of corporations were nominated. All in the least suspected of a leaning toward those institutions were incontinently and without any ceremony knocked on the head. It is enough to say that everybody at the Convention, as well as all connected with politics throughout the State, agreed, with the utmost unanimity, that there was a certain ring about the platform that had never been equaled in any previous party platform. And as for the candidates, it was universally admitted that, putting aside their intense and bigoted hostility to all corporations and monopolies—which many thought they carried to extremes—it was the best and soundest lot of men ever nominated for public office on this coast. The Convention then adjourned, with three cheers for the ticket. One week after—which time passed in my dream with the rapidity of thought—the Democratic Convention was held. Like the Republican, it was characterized by the most perfect good feeling, and was otherwise a model Democratic Convention. It was presided over by Colonel E. J. Lewis of Tehama, and Colonel Ryan of San Francisco was the Secretary. The platform was everything that could be desired by the most uncompromising and life-long Constitutional Democrat. It began by a declaration "that the Convention pointed with lofty pride to the career in the past of the grand old party of Jefferson and Jackson." [Here the entire Convention rose to its feet en masse and cheered for more than five minutes.] It reiterated and renewed the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of "'98 and '9," as the cardinal faith of the national Democracy. [More cheering.] It avowed its undying hostility to all corporations and monopolies, and pledged its candidates to a reduction of freights and fares on the railroads [cheers and cat-calls], as well as the rates for water and gas. [A voice: "Bully for you!"] and laughter.] It declared the Democratic party to be the friend of the poor man [more cheers]; and after putting in a plank upon retrenchment and reform, and another for hard money, with some other common-places, proceeded to nominate its ticket. The ticket was of that character that always had in the past satisfied the average Democratic voter, and, there was every reason to presume, would poll the full party vote. In my dream the election seemed to drift down and take place as rapidly as events in a dream can occur. The election was held, and the result announced. To my terror, both Democratic and Republican tickets were swept out of sight, and Kearney carried the day by overwhelming majorities. This appalling event seemed to come upon me like a thunder-clap from a cloudless sky. I was unprepared for such a result, even in a dream. I can now see that it broke in upon the current of my dream, for subsequent events did not seem to follow each other with regularity, as they had before. This shock to my faculties evidently broke in upon and disturbed my vision, if I may so call it, or at least my recollection of it, and a period apparently of several years seemed to elapse before I could comprehend what was going on around me. The first distinct recollection I have in my dream was after the Kearney Government had been in the plenitude of its power for some time. The principles of the new movement were thoroughly engrafted in the law, and Kearney's title to the dictatorship was established beyond question. From that point onward all comes back to me as I write as plain and as vivid as the occurrences in one of our most public streets at noonday. I seemed in my dream to accompany Dictator Kearney wherever he went—just how, whether by walking or riding, I can not quite explain; but I saw all that took place, and have an impression of it far more powerful than we usually get in dreams, and altogether like a waking event. I thought Dictator Kearney had moved the capital of the State from Sacramento to this city, and had installed his government temporarily in the Nevada Bank, until the City Hall could be completed—a thing somewhat delayed by a recent decree fixing the duration of daily labor at one hour each day, so that citizens could devote the other twenty-three to sleep, recreation, and intellectual culture. I somehow found out that all property in the State had been divided equally among the free citizens—a term confined exclusively to the original Kearneyites—giving to each individual, according to the estimates for the fiscal year at the time of my dream, the sum of seven dollars and a fraction over nine cents in money or personal property, and a tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres in extent; and a decree had been promulgated making it a crime, punishable with death by a hempen rope, to possess any estate (real or personal) beyond that amount. This distribution of property had been confined, however, strictly to those citizens who had been favorable to the Kearney movement and voted that ticket. All others were under disability as to holding any property whatever. Nor was the one hour a day system of labor allowed to extend to these malignants. All persons who had opposed the movement originally were themselves respectively compelled to work whatever number of hours he or she had before the new Constitution claimed to be the just limit of a day's labor. Among other important changes that had been brought about, under the new order of things, was the disposition of the railroads and the gas and water works. These had all been taken possession of by Dictator Kearney, and held by him in the nature of crown property—he operating them, and taking the earnings for his own private use. He had also taken possession of all the fine residences on Nob Hill, occupying that of Governor Stanford as his palace, and allowing his Cabinet officers to live (while in office) in the others. The former mansion of Charles Crocker was occupied by Robert Ferral, the Minister of Public Justice; while Clitus Barbour, the Lord Chancellor, lived in the Hopkins mansion; and the Colton residence was now the residence of General McComb, the Secretary of War. The other fine houses in the city had been portioned out to various Cabinet Ministers. I dreamed that I attended at one of Dictator Kearney's official levees, and saw him receive the reports from heads of departments, as to the administration for the preceding month. I will relate what occurred, for my memory was powerfully impressed with it: Dictator Kearney sat upon a raised platform at the back end of the main room, which in Flood & O'Brien's time, before the distribution of property, was occupied as a bank. His appearance did not seem in my dream to be much changed from his old sand-lot make-up, except that he had on a clean paper collar. On his right hand, but standing lower down, was placed the Secretary of War and Commander of the Army, Field-Marshal McComb, dressed in the uniform of a marshal of the French Empire under Napoleon I. I learned in my dream—just how I do not quite recollect—that this gentleman, though formerly belonging to the malignant class, had, in consequence of his military renown and experience in the art of war, been pardoned and his disabilities removed. In front of the Dictator was his Council of State, seated at proper intervals at a long table. This Council consisted of the various heads of departments and the judges of the courts. The Dictator opened the audience by announcing that he would now hear the reports. At this the Minister of Finance, Henry George, arose and addressed the Dictator. He wished and obtained consent to submit his annual report, and proceeded to do so. "It was with deep regret," so he said, "that he found pelled to report at the end of this, his second year of office, that there was absolutely no money in the treasury whatever. It was empty as a poor box, and likely to continue so. The causes that had brought about this depleted condition of the public strong-box were numerous and complicated. He would at this time only attempt to point out the most apparent. He would commence by reiterating what he had said more than once before, that the only proper subject of taxation was land; that if taxes could not be raised upon land, it was better not to raise them at all. He then reminded the Dictator of the decree making it a capital offense for a citizen to own more than 160 acres of land, or $7.09 of personality. Now [continued the great financier] when it is remembered that the distribution of property has given to every man, woman, and child in the State $7.09 in coin, and 160 acres of land, leaving a vast amount of acreage still unappropriated, mark the result upon taxation. Unless citizens pay up voluntarily, which as yet they do not seem disposed to do, we have no mode of enforcing the collection of taxes. We can not sell lands for delinquent taxes. The purchaser would be hanged the next day for holding more than the laws permit—a treatment which our citizens strongly object to. The Sheriff would come to him with a deed in one hand and a hemp rope in the other, and the consequence is purchasers at tax sales do not come forward. That is how we stand on taxes; and while I feel the utmost confidence in the soundness of my theories on taxation, I would like the judgment of the Court on the best way of getting the taxes into the Treasury." Minister of Finance George having finished, the Minister of Police, Wm. T. Coleman, rose with his report, smiling and happy. Mr. Coleman had the honor and pleasure to report that within the week just past the last Chinaman on the coast had been, through the instrumentalities of chief detective in the Chinese Department, F. A. Bee, dragged from his hiding-place in a kitchen somewhere about North Beach, and hanged to a hook over the cooking-range where he had been at work, and that at last the Chinese question was settled. The Chinaman was "gone." At this juncture Dictator Kearney ordered Colonel Bee to come forward and receive the thanks of the Workmen's party, and a reward of five trade dollars out of the public treasury, which Mr. George was ordered to pay forthwith. Colonel Bee advanced to the foot of the throne, and, prostrating himself, implored Kearney for the sake of mercy to forbear and not doom him to certain death, as this order would accomplish if unrevoked. The Colonel confessed that he already had in his pocket a sum which, if added to the five dollars, would bring his possessions within the prohibited amount and lead to his inevitable destruction. Upon this statement the order for the five trade dollars was graciously revoked, and the Colonel thankfully retired. Minister Coleman then proceeded with his report. He stated that the late decree abolishing the public prisons on the ground of the competition of the inmates with free labor, and substituting the more economical and expeditious penalty of death by hanging, he had to report the following proceedings under the new law: The number of arrests of free citizens during the months embraced in the report upon charges of working over one hour a day had been 2,873; the number of convictions was 1,129, mostly females, all of whom had been executed except 72, who were in the custody of the executioner only awaiting the completion of a sufficient number of coffins for their interment. The report stated positively that these criminals would be disposed of within a few days. The number of persons arrested for practicing medicine without a certificate from Dr. O'Donnell, the Honorable Minister of Public Health, was 84, of whom 61 had been convicted and hanged, and among whom, he was happy to state, were several notorious and hardened offenders, including Drs. Sawyer, Bowie, Laine, and Keeney, and it was confidently hoped by the end of another month this crime would be substantially eradicated. The number of priests and ministers tried and executed for various offenses within the month was 11, including Archbishop Alemany and Bishop Kip, and that it was apparent that the reformed religion as taught by the Workmen's party would soon have the field to itself. Minister Coleman was most happy to be able to report that the prosecution and punishment of lawyers under the late law to suppress dangerous callings had been carried on with marked activity and success for the month just past, and there was reason to hope that, before the close of the year, that useless and vicious nest of conspirators against the new system would be broken up and destroyed. The number of arrests for this offense within the time embraced in the report was 187. Of these 90 had been tried before Judge Ferral, resulting in the conviction and prompt execution of 46, showing over fifty per cent. of convictions—the best evidence of the zeal with which that branch of the public service is discharged. Early in the month a joint indictment had been found against Citizens S. M. Wilson, Hall McAllister, J. P. Hoge, and Delos Lake, charging them with the crime of being lawyers. The report sets forth that separate trials had been demanded by the accused and accorded, resulting in the conviction of the three first named criminals, who were promptly executed. But, continued the report, in the case of the prisoner Lake the prosecution, although using the most strenuous efforts and calling a cloud of witnesses, was unable to prove the crime to the satisfaction of the jury, which, after hearing the argument of the prosecuting attorney and the charge of the court, brought in a verdict of acquittal without leaving their seats. A large number of malignants been executed for concealing property and refusing to distribute under the decrees of State, and the number would be greatly increased but for the difficulty of obtaining a sufficient supply of ropes and coffins. The executions of this class of criminals within the month was found to have numbered 1,344. The report took pleasure in noting the trial and execution of A. M. Winn, for a very aggravated case of holding and teaching the monstrous doctrine that a day's work should consist of eight hours. It was the intention of the Department of Justice to put down and root out this species of offense, still too common, at all hazards. The police were in close pursuit of Colonel Swadley for the same offense, and hoped to be able to make a final disposition of his case by the next monthly report. At this moment I thought in my dream that the sound of buzzs and the clanging music of a brass band in the street was heard, and the proceedings were interrupted by an immense procession filing into the room through the door of the corner of Pine and Montgomery

Streets, who finally took their stand in double ranks along the sides of the building. I soon discovered by the flags and mottoes that this was a procession of workmen, headed by William Wellock, and that they were agitating for a reduction in the hours—or rather minutes—of labor. The agitators held flags, which they waved in the air. The mottoes were various, and I can remember only a few of them. They were such as these: "Thirty minutes a fair day's work." "If the laboring man must devote one whole hour of each day to work, when is he to learn Greek?" "Less time for toil and more for intellectual improvement." "All work and no contemplation makes Jack a dull boy." "None but tyrants will compel citizens to devote one-twenty-fourth part of their time to labor, and none but slaves will submit to it." When order was restored, Wellock addressed the Dictator in a speech an hour long, setting forth the necessity of reducing the minutes of labor, so that more time could be devoted to mental culture, with much sound argument and apt illustration in support of his proposition. Among other things he gave an instance especially in point. It was the case of a shoemaker on Powell Street, who had made a serious miscalculation in the heliocentric parallax of a star of the seventeenth magnitude in Canis Minor, which error he would not have made but for his being rusty in his differential calculi consequent upon the present very excessive duration of the minutes of labor. There was also a blacksmith near the Mission Dolores who was unable, for the same reason, to keep up in oriental literature and Sanscrit poetry with the other members of a learned society to which he belonged. Mr. Wellock declared that unless the hours of labor were reduced from sixty to thirty minutes a day, he feared that the intellectual capabilities of the workmen would not be fully developed. At the close of Mr. Wellock's oration the Dictator promised that the grievances of the people should be inquired into and redressed. The procession then retired, and Kearney adjourned the further hearing of reports till the next meeting, at the same time politely inviting the entire cabinet to a banquet at the Dictator's palace, corner of Powell and California streets, formerly occupied by Governor Stanford. At this the meeting rose, and we all moved out to the street, where Kearney's state carriage stood awaiting him. It was a splendid affair, drawn by six white horses, each ridden by a postilion in powdered hair and knee breeches; and, when we observed closely, as we did, we made the discovery that the postilions were State Senators and Assemblymen who had represented the city in the California Legislature. Tim McCarthy, being the handsomest, rode one of the leaders. Peter Dean had a seat on the off wheeler. General McComb, in command of the escorting detachment of troops, mounted his steed as Kearney and I entered the carriage, and, escorted by a regiment of cavalry, we proceeded up Pine Street to Kearney's palace. On observing the footmen seated on the box, we found that both they and those who stood up and held on by the steps behind were high State officials. Judges Field and Sawyer, with top boots, drab coats, and neat cockades on the sides of their hats, looked exceedingly stylish. When we arrived at the palace and alighted, we found all the servants, in elegant livery, drawn up in double ranks by the entrance, to do honor to the Dictator. As I passed in I recognized among the servants in plush many familiar faces—those I had known in other days. The table-waiters had evidently been selected among the members of the Pacific Club, while the kitchen and wine service seemed to mainly come from the old Stock Board. I noticed Howard Coit standing in an attitude of respect, holding a silver corkscrew in his hand, showing him to be in the responsible place of butler; while the white linen cap worn by Peter Donahue signified that he was now the Dictator's cook. Milton S. Latham, with a silver-plated carving-knife and fork thrust securely in the belt of his clean apron, was proof, at a glance, that Kearney had the judgment and good taste to create the special office of carver, and did not want to have his meat hashed up by incompetent hands. But, not to go into further details, it is enough to say that we entered the palace, and that as soon as the guests began to arrive I took a place near a window and watched them drive up. The equipages were generally in good taste, though occasionally I observed a disposition to gaudy show. The first to arrive was Secretary of War McComb. He drove four bays to an open barouche. His coachman proved to be General McDowell, U. S. A., while holding to the straps I observed ex-Governor Irwin and Honorable Eugene Casserly in the Secretary's yellow and blue livery. Minister of Justice Ferral's turnout was specially dashing—six grays, driven by Judge Crockett, with Dwinelle and Wheeler on the platform behind, in knee breeches and powdered wigs. Minister of Police Coleman was also brought up in good shape; four handsome piebalds handled by ex-Mayor Coon, with Reverend Thomas Guard, in the neat style of a tiger, seated behind on the footman's box. Mr. Beerstecher's four chestnuts were handsomely driven by Mr. Haggin, who brought them up to the door at a slapping gallop, checking them so suddenly as almost to throw Louis McLane and William Alvord, the two portly footmen, over the top of the coach. Clitus Barbour's turnout was not inferior to the best; his carriage was an imperial drag, drawn by six dapple grays, and driven by D. O. Mills, while J. C. Flood and ex-Governor Low, in red jackets, white wigs, knee breeches, and orange stockings, sat peacefully and with carefully folded arms on a raised footman's box, well back of the body of the vehicle. The First Minister of General Elections, William B. Higgins, drove up in elegant style behind six dashing roans, handled by M. M. Estee, with Congressman Davis, in yellow plush, holding on to the straps behind. James Gannon, the Minister of Primary Elections and Chief of the Department of Rough Politics—a portfolio recently created for the present incumbent—came up sober, with four bay Hambletonian colts, driven by Jim Shafter, with General John F. Miller on the box, his arms folded across his breast. About this time the carriages began to drive up in such crowds, and there was so much confusion, that I could not easily distinguish the inmates. I ceased to take notes; and soon after the band began to play, showing that the Dictator had arrived, and we were told to enter the banquet hall. The dinner was magnificent. It makes my mouth water even now to think of it, though only a dream. The guests were the leaders of the new society, and consisted of the Dictator's cabinet officers, and a large number of the supporters of the administration—either original Kearneyites, or converts who had joined since the new order of things was established. But it is impossible to give a detailed account of the banquet. It is enough to say that it passed off splendidly, and all were delighted with the affair. Speeches were made by Kearney, Judge Hager, Professor McGowan, Stephen Gage, as well as by the various heads of departments—notably Colonel Gannon, Minister of Primaries and Rough Politics—and did not break up till three o'clock in the morning. The following day, I thought in my dream that I paid a visit to the "High Court of Justice," presided over by Honorable Robert Ferral, having learned that some interesting cases would be brought on for trial. We did not arrive in Court until a half an hour after it had been opened. Already several cases had been called and disposed of. When I came in a trial was about closing, three prisoners having just been found guilty of stealing water from the reservoir at Laguna Honda, and Minister of Justice Ferral was putting on the black cap to impose the sentence of the Court as I took the seat kindly offered to me by Judge W. T. Wallace, the Deputy Bailiff of the Court. It was a solemn moment. "Bailiff," said the Minister of Justice to Judge Wallace, "cause the prisoners to stand up." The order was obeyed, and the trembling wretches arose to receive the death sentence, the penalty of their crimes. "Charles Webb Howard, William F. Babcock, and Francis Newlands," said the Court in a solemn voice, "you have been jointly indicted for one of the highest and most heinous crimes known to the law, that of feloniously stealing water from a private reservoir. You have been tried by a jury of your countrymen, all workmen, and have been found guilty. With that verdict, after carefully hearing the testimony, the Court is satisfied. What have you to say why the sentence of the law should not be imposed upon you?" "Please the court," said the dejected and trembling Newlands, "we had no counsel at the trial." "Prisoner!" interrupted the Minister of Justice, with severity, "this claim of counsel but adds to the atrocity of your offense; you must know that the just penalty of death has been long since inflicted upon all known lawyers in this State. If any remain they preserve their worthless lives by careful concealment. In your own case, prisoner Newlands, for the Court knows you, when you were tried for that offense you only escaped punishment by proving an alibi. If there are any of that vile profession left they will be wise to keep away from this tribunal of justice." At this, forgetting myself for a moment, I sprang to my feet and offered to serve as counsel to defend these prisoners. "Bailiff!" roared the Minister of Justice, "is this man a lawyer? If so, lead him to instant execution." But Judge Wallace, to whom I had once done a service, saved my life. Bowing with his most urbane and courtly air and smile: "No, your honor, he practiced law once, that is all." "Ah!" said the Minister, unbending his brows and relaxing into a gracious smile, which quite set me at ease, "that is quite another thing. The Court did that once itself." Then turning to the terror-stricken prisoners he continued: "The plea is insufficient to stay the course of the law. Have you anything further to allege?" "May it please the Court," said the prisoner Babcock, "we only took one drink from the reservoir, and we were very thirsty." "Silence!" roared the Minister of Justice, "the law knows no distinction between grand and petty larceny. It awards the same punishment to all crimes. It is as bad to steal a drop of water as it is a million gallons. The water is the private property of Dictator Kearney. But that makes no difference; property must be protected, no matter who it belongs to. Bailiff, remove all these prisoners for execution, and as this is a most aggravated case, let them be hanged forthwith! Call the next case." The next case was the trial of Charles E.—alias Philosopher—Pickett, indicted jointly with Leland Stanford, and Charles Crocker, and Marcus D. Boruck, for riotous proceedings at an anti-railroad meeting, held at the sand-lots, on Market Street. There were several other parties under indictment for participation in the same meeting, but the prisoners Pickett, Stanford, Crocker, and Boruck, being the most active and turbulent in their conduct, were held as "ring-leaders," and tried first. A jury having been called and sworn, Robert Robinson prosecuted on the part of Kearney; and after putting in evidence the decree confiscating all the railroads in the State, and reserving them as the private property of the Dictator, he called as the chief witness for the prosecution Mr. Stephen Gage. This witness, after being sworn, went on to testify that on Sunday last he observed the prisoners, and other suspicious characters, hanging about the sand-lots, and feeling sure that they intended some mischief, waited to see what they would do. That soon afterward he saw the prisoners at the bar, acting apparently, however, in subordination to the prisoner Pickett, mount a temporary platform of redwood boards, while the other members of the band gathered about them, as if to listen to what was said. That the prisoner Pickett called the meeting to order, nominated himself as chairman, and declared the motion carried, and then sat down on a box. But the witness when asked stated that no vote was taken on the motion, so far as he could observe. He testified further, that the prisoner Pickett then introduced the prisoner Stanford to the meeting, who proceeded to harangue the crowd. On being questioned by the Court as to the substance of the prisoner Stanford's remarks, the witness declared himself unable to repeat his exact language; but he was willing to swear that he heard the prisoner Stanford declare that freights and fares were both too high; that the railroads as conducted were an odious and oppressive monopoly, and that they ought to be regulated in the interest of the people. On being interrogated as to any expressions of hostility or dislike to the person of Dictator Kearney or his government on the part of the prisoner Stanford, witness, though pressed upon this point, declared that from where he stood, which was at a considerable distance from the stand, he heard nothing of that kind; but he could, upon his conscience, swear positively that the prisoner when speaking did look exceedingly vicious and ugly. At this the Court declared that it had no doubt of this fact, and told the witness to stand aside as the case was fully proved. He then asked the prisoners if they had any testimony to offer in their behalf. The prisoner Stanford stated that being out of employment, with a family to support, he tried to get down to Bakersfield, where he had heard that hands were wanted to work in the harvest field, but that on going to the railroad station he was told that the fare to that point was $2, which was more money than he possessed. He stated further that the only witness he would offer would be upon that point, and that with the Court's leave he would offer testimony to show that the fare to Bakersfield by the railroad was $2. The Court promptly ruled that the testimony was irrelevant and immaterial, and could not be heard; that it could make no difference to the prisoner what the fare by the railroad to Bakersfield was, or anywhere else; that the railroads were private property, and that nothing was better settled in law than that every man had the right to do as he pleased with his own; that if Dictator Kearney, as the owner of the road, chose to charge $100, or $1,000, as the fare to Bakersfield, it was his right to do so; that the prisoner had the right of either going to Bakersfield on foot or in an ox-cart, at his pleasure, but he had no right to encourage riot and sedition because the owners of the railroad did not choose to put the fare down to such price as might suit his opinion or necessities. The Court then charged the jury. He carefully reviewed the law touching railroads, and showed that throughout their entire history they had been held to be sacred, and that to criticize them or their management, though not always punishable as now with death, yet had been from the first held to be a very serious offense. The Minister of Justice also instructed the jury that this class of sedition, if not checked now, at its very commencement, would in time lead to the most serious consequences, and recommended them, in the interest of public tranquility, to make an example in this case. The jury found all the prisoners guilty without leaving their seats. On being asked by the Judge what they had to say in extenuation of judgment, the prisoner Stanford pleaded that he was poor and only wanted to get to Bakersfield to work, and that the rates to that place were, in fact, excessive. The Court answered the prisoner severely, saying, "that he ought, as a political economist, to know that railroad fares, like gas and water rates, if only let alone would, like all other matters of commerce, sooner or later regulate themselves. That if the public is dissatisfied with the rates charged, the best way is always to carefully avoid saying anything about it, and just to wait patiently till the evil remedies itself, which it certainly will do if only left unmolested by any outside interference." Here the prisoner asked, humbly, "What is to reduce fares if they are left alone?" The Court answered, sternly: "'The laws of trade' will sooner or later regulate them. All you have to do is to wait." Again the prisoner stated that he was unable to wait till that time, as he wanted to get to Bakersfield to work at harvesting. "Silence!" cried the Judge, drawing on the black cap. "Prisoners, your case is one of the most atrocious and diabolical that has been tried in this Court since it was established. Your actions are simply damnable, and if not rooted out society must be destroyed. The sentence of the Court is, that you be taken from hence directly to the corner of California and Powell Streets, and within twenty minutes be banged in front of Dictator Kearney's palace, an example to all such offenders. Call the next case!" The prisoners were at once led out for execution. Being old friends of all three of them I naturally felt a strong desire to see them hanged. I, therefore, followed out with the crowd, and walked along in the direction of the spot where the execution was to take place. Just as I reached the street I saw in my dream my old mule standing at the corner, all saddled and bridled. In my dream I forgot that the mule was dead long since. I mounted the animal and rode along with the crowd till I reached the scaffold, which was already erected directly under Kearney's window. Just as the prisoners were mounting the steps I caught the Dictator's eye. He was examining the beast upon which I rode. Directly after, I observed him giving a sign to his private police who stood around. Then he called out, "There is a man on a mule, worth $40! Let him be hanged with the others, and lead the mule to the stable." It was all over with me. In another moment I stood in line with the other four prisoners, with a rope tightly drawn around my neck. Then there was a jerk, the stars flew about before my eyes, and I awoke—very thankful that it was only a dream!

New York society has given birth to a new dance called the "Wave." Beside it the "Glide" is a modest gleam. It knocks "The Dance of Death" perfectly cold. It is a waltz—a wild, wicked waltz. It is made up of hops instead of slides, and the vigorous skips necessary to a successful rendition of this waltz produce an impression upon the minds of spectators that savors a little of indecency. The "Wave," with its violent exertions and eccentric motions, is constantly bringing the bodies of the dancers into contact, and if one can judge from the blazing red color of both partners at the end of the several movements of this dance, the effect of the jostling into each other's arms is anything but moral. A dashing blonde young woman from New York has introduced the dance into Washington, and it promises to be popular in society. To hear the comments made by some of the spectators when this dance was first exhibited stamped its character. It is fashionable in New York, however, and it may have a run throughout the country.

The craze for dime necklaces has broken out, and promises to be a greater scourge than were the dreadful button-strings of ten years ago. The dime necklace is built by levying tribute upon one's friends. A young lady concludes to possess one. She asks every soul that she can call a friend to contribute a dime with his or her monogram engraved upon it. After she collects twenty-five or thirty monogrammed dimes, she has a jeweler string them together, and the necklace is an incontrovertible fact. As it costs fifty or seventy-five cents to have each dime polished and engraved, the young lady with dime necklace intentions is studiously avoided.

Lucy H. Hooper writes that as General and Mrs. Grant were about leaving a Paris reception, the hostess led forward her young daughter and remarked: "General, with Mrs. Grant's permission, I should like to ask of you to accord a favor to my daughter. My grandmother, when a girl of thirteen, was kissed by General Washington, and I should like my daughter in after years to be able to say that she had been kissed by General Grant." The General saluted her.

Some wicked wretch suggests that deacons be compelled to use a bell-punch when they take up collections in church. O tempora! O mores!

NO TASTE FOR GLORY.

A Masterpiece by Singleline.

"The path of glory leads but to the grave,"
But what care I whereto the pathway leads?
If I want glory I must go to find it
Where those have found it who are gone before,
Or else remain inglorious; or find out,
Like Stephenson, or Edison, or any other son,
Some route of rattling newness up to fame,
That's what's the matter—and I know it!
But I don't see how glory can be caught
By putting salts of rhyme upon its tail;
Or, slinging ink upon the great white dog,
That sits with deadly eyes at glory's tree
Until he grows as speckled as the brute
That trots with canine ardor by the wheel.*

Yet I want glory. Oh, you need not laugh!
Go back to bed again and ask your dreams
What foolish things "abused the curtained sleep"
When you were snoring on the field of war
In high old triumph. No, don't laugh at me Until you get your glass house boarded in.

They tell me there is glory to be had
By being a martyr to some holy cause,
But that's played out—flat bursted—
Old Simeon Stylites bursted that.
What glory has old Adam in the fall?
How many thousand years has he of fame?
Where is his dust?—if dust he is.
As well ask him who rolled, in '49,
The wealthy bowlders from the golden brook—
And put bright hundreds in his bottle nose:
"Where is your dust?" He spent it in the having,
His life was like the day—a dawn of gold
That ran to its meridian, then fell
Through burnished wealth of sunset into night.†
And such a night! O man and woman!
You played hell on your first watch, or else
You have been speaking falsely ever since—
And since in such a case is awful.
Since! Since! Since when? Who knows?
I'll swear that I don't.

Oh, no! It will not do.

There is no glory in pale sacrifice,
Nor in the red heat of the hot assault.
The only glory is in standing still—
And that can't be.

To say I lead. What's that?
If, from a mighty river gathers mud
From every source in winter's weeping time,
And bears upon the surface of its swell
The dead wood of the forest in the hills,
I ride a floating drift-log in the foam,
Have I a right to shout, to citizens
Who line the shores to note if I will drown,
"See what a flood I'm pilot of to-day!"‡
Such is the style whereof we heroes make.
Such is Grant and Kearney—I mean Denis—
And such in fact are all the motley host
Of doughty dead ones who, right or wrong,
Left their old scenic garments on the stage—
The sacred duds of duty duly done.

Old Bonaparte, with snow about his feet,
Hoisting his rotten ladder where the light
Of burning Moscow roiled all the sky
And wrote his "Mene teke!" on the clouds—
That's glory, is it? He who wished to mount Fell sprawl upon himself and died, I think,
Of too much pressure. I thank my stars
That I do not like that sort of thing. Not much.

Birds build their nests and line them soft within,
There sing and whistle while they lay their eggs—
Then silence through the hatching time, and then More birds, more nests, more laying, and so on
For ever. Such is life. Man does about the same
If he does aught. There's compensation in it,
And, I must say, I've found it oftentimes pleasant;
In fact I think it's bully.

But I see not
The place where glory comes. From Adam down
'Tis the same. To come, to live, to love,
To go. To be good-natured and be clean
In all things if you can be. Finis.

"Go where glory waits thee." Oh, git acout!
What 'r ye giv'n us, Liza Jane? What glory
Was there, in the grave, with Sherman to the sea?
Negro votes and a public debt, returning boards.

Ah yes, returning boards, but not for him—
Perhaps his headstone glorifies a mule
That died for lack of forage on the march,
And left its bones to pad the contract out
For burying the Nation's dead. Oh, bosh!

What's glory to the man who bought Alaska—
Bought it blind? A thousand years of purgatory
Can't bleach that purchase from Ambition's soul.
The Russian bear has chuckled o'er that cheat
Through hibernating dreams a winter long;
And the wild seals, which snooze upon the rocks
Beneath the shadows of the flying gulls,
Lift ever and anon their sleepy heads
To laugh and then lie down again. Oh, glory!

[Well! the fact is: If I can hear anything,
In the next six months, that's at all likely
To recommend glory, I'll send it to you—
Done up in poetry such as this—
Because I know from a remark you made,
That you like it. I mean the poetry.

WATSONVILLE, January 24, 1879.

* These four lines are suggested by Norse Mythology from Sitka, and present a beautiful reason for the peculiar marking of the English coach-dog. Our author had to turn a double fliplop to get these lines in without rhyme. No first-class poet is guilty of rhyme in this new era of verse.

† These nine lines have been much admired by lovers of native talent. They indicate their origin. Their odor, like that of the sage brush, belongs on this side of the continent. In fact, they are autochthonous.

‡ This conundrum is open only to statesmen and warriors. The figure is borrowed from Sacramento, and shipped down here at great expense.

FINAL NOTE.—This whole poem is unusual. It comes very near saying something—and that is high praise, if the author but knew it, in these days of poems on all occasions, as well as of poems for which there is no occasion. This is one of the latter—but is not had of its kind.

You can get an autograph letter of Daniel Webster for eighty cents. You can also get sixteen glasses of beer. Of course, we'd choose the autograph, but we fear the other ninety-nine would give a gentle rap on the counter and softly murmur, "Beer."

Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines boasts that her wardrobe does not cost as much as $30 a year.

FEMININE FACTS.

Lucretia Mott has lived to be called a "bon Mott" by the Chicago Times.

"Don't give me a weigh," as the fat woman said when asked to get upon the scales.

Gail Hamilton's chair in Senator Blaine's household at Washington is vacant this winter.

The fashion plates that come from Paris are colored mostly in the prisons by female convicts.

At Vassar some lisping ladies have formed a lisping club. Their principal study will be mythology.

Whether a lady claims a rubber shoe which she has dropped in the mud depends on the number of the shoe.

The ancient Egyptians were educated, thoughtful, and refined, but their women never wore low-necked gresses.

The ex-Empress Eugenie is said to have lost all her animation of manner and to be singularly cold and quiet.

A young man recently told his auburn-haired darling that she had red hair. She settled the business by saying "it is false."

Mrs. Bayard Taylor is German. She is very accomplished, and it is said that she burns the midnight oil. She will write a biography of her husband.

A colored woman who sat down on a beehive to watch the progress of a fire in Russellville, Kentucky, left her seat before the close of the entertainment.

Ilma di Murska, at a concert in New York, recently, actually sang "My Grandfather's Clock," and was permitted to escape after the performance uninjured.

Senator Sargent's two daughters have both studied medicine, and the elder, having been graduated, is practicing her profession at the Freedmen's Hospital, in Washington.

Miss Anna Dickinson's new play, Aurelian, will be brought out next April, with Mr. John McCullough in the title rôle. Miss Dickinson is to play with him, taking the part of "Queen Zenobia."

Olive Logan says that the duchesses, marchionesses, and other noble ladies who write to her by penny-post, can't spell, and don't understand grammar, although they are charming in face, form, and manner.

Baroness Mary Itulak Artymowska, twenty-five years of age, and moving in the best Russian society, has just been banished to Siberia for forgery, fraud, and bribery, leaving debts to the amount of 2,000,000 roubles.

A young lady was told by a married lady that she had better precipitate herself off the Niagara Falls into the basin beneath than marry. The young lady replied: "I would if I thought I could find a husband at the bottom."

A lady eighty years old was out coasting with her granddaughters and the rest of the little girls in Burlington, Iowa, one evening last week. She said she "didn't use to do it in Old Virginia" when she was young, but it was grand old sport.

"Yes," said a young lady, who was possessed of a fine voice, "I am often asked to appear in public, but—" "But what?" observed a friend. "Well," she replied, "I should never be able to sustain my part, I am so easily decomposed."

In the Sphinx Sarah Bernhardt wears a ball dress of pale yellow satin, with an embroidered apron to match; the basque terminates with a fringe of lime blossoms, and the train is looped up with guelder roses and bronze chenille leaves; the sleeves are mere strips of lime blossoms.

When Emma Abbott appeared in opera at her old home in Peoria, Illinois, she wrote to a local paper, extending an invitation to all friends, "especially the girls with whom I used to romp and make mud pies," to come and see her in her dressing room at the close of the performance.

London has a club that rivals Sorosis. The prospectus announces that the "tariff" is moderate. The world at large wonders what the "tariff" means. Sorosis is an expensive club. The ladies belonging to it are generally fashionably dressed, there are fortnightly lunch parties at Delmonico's, etc., and in the winter, evening entertainments which wind up with a ball.

Mrs. Madison is probably the only lady who, after leaving the White House as its mistress, received up to the time of her death the same attention as when its queen. Many now in Washington remember how the crowd, including all the diplomats, always went from the White House to call on Mrs. Madison, who, when she was past seventy years old, used to receive in a low-neck dress, and always wore a turban. Such crowds called on her that the visitors were obliged to pass out the back door while others entered by the front.

A Wisconsin girl put on trousers and started through the deep snow to walk six miles to a village for provisions, the family larder being empty. She soon became tired out, besides losing her way, and the cold was intense. A big Newfoundland dog which accompanied her was the means of saving her life. She scooped out a hollow in the snow, lay down in it, and made the warm dog lie on her, shifting him about so as to successively cover the coldest parts of her body. In that way she passed a whole night, and was not very severely frostbitten. "With two or three more dogs," she said, "I would have got along very comfortably."

"Ophelia" writes to ask if sacred history mentions card-playing. Certainly, my dear girl. Moses "led" for the children of Israel, and when the latter got to Jordan they "passed." Solomon "ordered up" the temple, Balaam "held a jack," and the seven priests before Jericho took the city by playing their seven trumpets. In the beginning of the world God "made it," and held the first pair, but Satan "led" off, took the first trick, beat Adam and Eve out of "bawlers," and played the deuce generally. I is only to add that when Eve lost, and was compelled to "heave" "ace high."

SUBURBAN SAUCE.—A MASCULINE QUINTET.

MY DEAR JUNO:—I think Oakland can claim the precedence for a freak of nature existing in her midst over any zoological garden or menagerie under the sun, stocked as they may be even to repletion with their calves two-headed, or their fowls four-legged. She has, Juno, a Pythias and his four attendant Damons. This little curiosity can be seen any day pacing the deck of the five o'clock boat. Pythias himself generally takes the lead, and in close proximity follow the Damons four. One perhaps caresses a hand, another has linked an arm in his, a third holds reverently a corner of the long ulster he wears, and the fourth treads closely on his heels. Round and round the boat they go in this order. I have watched them often, and I confess also to having listened to their conversation, and in consequence I have a panegyric to offer in their praise. Never did a mother bird in her downy nest in the tree-top give evidence of more tenderness and devotion to her birdlings than do these gentlemen to their beloved master. Oh! the cooing, the twittering, and the soft love-notes they breathe in his ear. Oh! the eagerness they exhibit to serve him—ever and anon darting from his side, to return speedily with their grain of information, or dainty tit-bit of a cigar or cigarette to refresh him with. In the midst of so much that is sordid, calculating, and changeable in this world, it quite revives ones faith in human nature to know of beings so steadfast in their affections, so unswerving in their fidelity, as these Damons. My reliability as a chronicler demands, though, that I attest to the fact that in their intercourse with each other they infuse an amount of bitterness, gall, and wormwood that seems incredible. Long, hard, and vindictively has the contest waged, and yet the solution to the mooted question of who is his most intimate friend—the Damon par excellence—appears to be as far distant as ever.

As to Pythias himself, he is certainly a very nice, deserving gentleman, hailing from New York; in presence tall and commanding, straight as a reed, tidy in dress, and agreeable in manner. Though generally liked, his acquaintance are at a loss to understand the species of wild adoration that seems to possess his companions in regard to him. Believe me, Juno, by this I in no way wish to detract from that excellent gentleman's reputation. In addition to the attractions I have already enumerated, he possesses other fine traits, for instance: He is very pastoral in his tastes, preferring all simple country sports to the more unhealthy excitements of city life. As regards our sex, he is a perfect Chevalier Bayard, the humblest woman he meets with on his travels inland always receiving the same courtly, deferential treatment from him. Indeed, he carries his affability and self-abnegation to that extent that he has been heard to express much preference for the society of the lowly. I am willing, as you see, Juno, to concede him many virtues and accomplishments; but I do not think, and others agree with me, that the most roseate view of his character and attainments that could be taken would suffice to account for the extraordinary affection the Damons exhibit for him. I think the solution to the mystery must be found in these other parties. I read once—I forget exactly where—that intense devotion is not as often excited by the superior qualities of the idealized object as by the capabilities of certain natures for self-sacrifice and life-long devotion. Let us consider the Damons; and the better to do so please imagine a tournament. Enter for the list our four Damons—a banker, a commission merchant, an ex-grain king, and a lumber dealer.

Knight No. 1, the banker, passes in review before us, mounted on the cream-colored pacer from the Fourth Street stable. His manly form appears to fine advantage; a better idea of his grace has been obtained at certain soirée dansante when he has given his creditable imitation of Palladino and de Rosa. This gentleman is very accomplished, singing and dancing divinely. In business life he has gained the confidence and admiration of all who have dealt with him. His corporation (the bank) has known many changes and misfortunes. Among its employés, defalcations and depositions have been rife. He alone, towering like a beacon-light, remains staunch and incorruptible. He is supposed to draw his inspiration from Casabianca, the smile of heaven, and the approbation of his dear Pythias.

Bow your head, Juno, reverently and admiringly before genius and beauty, for here comes now on Beach's "Bob" Oakland's Apollo Belvedere, the commission merchant. The honor of sheltering this brilliant intellect is jealously claimed by both Front and California Streets. This is not to be wondered at when it is understood that his business capacities are said to be of a high order, and his personal appearance and accomplishments are known to be beyond reproach. As a diversion outside of business life he dips into poetry, metaphysics, and belles-lettres, and plays the rôle of lover, german leader, poet, actor, and theatrical manager. In the contemplation of a being so versatile as this, one is moved to question the wisdom of Providence that showers all her gifts on certain individuals, leaving others so poor and unfavored. A little of the ability that is concentrated in this quite man would, if distributed there, redeem a fair proportion of the inmates of an idiot asylum. Great curiosity is expressed in this community to see if in the drama the same brilliant success will follow this gentleman's efforts as has, heretofore, in all the other branches of literature that he has attempted. It is regretted, at the same time, that there is already a lien on the title, "Loyal Till Death." A biographical drama bearing this title and coming from his pen would create much pathetic interest, as his loyalty to a life-long love is well known here. Our Apollo enhances, if such a thing can be possible, his natural charms by very fine dressing. Bob tells me, the other frosty morning not long ago, he appeared on an early boat in a combination ulster that was, to use Bob's words, "just tip top." It looked (he tells me) at first like two distinct garments, but on closer investigation was found to be but one, and cut on the Eastlake model.

That falcon eye, that eagle crest of yon majestic rider who now draws near us belongs to the ex-grain king. Well may you say, with bated breath, he looks the monarch he once was. Behold his coat of arms—the crouching lion; observe his royal smile, the sweet imperialness of manner, as he guides his milk white steed—and 'tis his own, too, Juno—by us. Saw you ever a more kingly person? I throw thee nay. Could you have but sat, as I have done, on Sabbath days in the Alameda church, listening to his superb vox humana rolling from the organ loft—quavering, darting, flashing through vaulted arch; could you have but witnessed his dramatic fervor, his masterly impersonation of an impotent rage in "Saratoga," you would cry with me, "blessed" be the fatality that deposed him from his kingly eminence, for in the operatic arena he will achieve a fame and glory that will last through all time and eternity. Amen.

A clatter of hoofs, a whirl in the air! Bravo! speed on, my gallant Damon! Yes, 'tis he, Juno, the brightest jewel of them all—the lumber dealer, who, seated on his roan trotter, is now flying past. His speed precludes the possibility of your viewing closely that kindly, beaming face, that indicates so plainly the noble, philanthropic nature that dwells within. Ah! that I had words with which to paint the sort of glorified estimation in which he is held by certain members of the community for his indefatigable efforts in behalf of the Free Reading Room some few years since. An unpleasant rumor is afloat on "Change" respecting the honesty and probity of this gentleman, and it is to the effect that his family larder is constantly replenished by the neighbors' fowls, who, after being coerced and importuned by offers of grain and seeds from him to visit his premises, are then and there, in violation of the laws of hospitality, shot down in cold blood. I am glad to be able to pronounce this story a base fabrication.

And now, my dear Juno, having considered these wonderful phenomena individually and collectively, I regret to say that I feel hardly satisfied with the result. Have my words conjured up before you warm, pulsating human beings, or have they simply sufficed to arouse a desire to see what is yet a mere suggestion? If so, you shall have the opportunity some day when you come to pay me a visit. Bob says at harvest time the sight is most beautiful. Then the Creek boat, by which the "freak" is ferried across, is laden with new-mown hay. Pythias, with his unerring pastoral instinct, soon scents this freight, and, followed by his band, goes quickly to commune with it. With a spring they are up on the sweet pile, all but the commission merchant, who not being agile is helped by dear Pythias from above and a deck hand from below. With this assistance he too is soon landed up by his brethren, and there they sit in sweet companionship all the way over. May I consider it settled, then, at next harvest time you will be ready to view our curiosity, or do you prefer the peripatetic view, on the five-o'clock boat, which is to be obtained now? Write, dearest, and let me know.

Your own MAID OF ATHENS (OF THE WEST).
OAKLAND, January 30, 1879.

New York society is just now absorbed in a new social feature—the introduction of four o'clock teas, an imported London fashion, adopted almost of necessity, because of the growth of the city and the difficulty of paying the requisite attention to a large circle of friends. Cards are issued for the tea on a specified day, and ladies go either in walking dress or more elegant evening array, to spend more or less of the hour from five to six. Occasionally a string band enlivens the scene, and dancing is allowed to the young people as a sort of dessert; but the simple entertainment of tea, cakes, and ices is not intended to interfere with the home dinner of the guests. Ladies who can not have all their friends to a formal dinner thus discharge their social obligations, and prominent strangers in the city are often entertained at teas. Mothers thus "bring out" their daughters. The young lady's name is put on her mother's card of invitation, and she is introduced to society supported by a bevy of young girls. The fashion of giving balls at Delmonico's is also adopted by the best people, who either have too limited accommodations at home or sensibly object to having their houses torn up. The cost of such entertainments—an item which every woman will be glad to know—is from $3,000 to $5,000. This innovation on the old established customs of calls and calling would be very popular here in San Francisco if properly introduced and kept up. Something of the kind is needed to mould society and keep it together; and where there is so much hotel life as obtains here, a social rendezvous of this description would be a boon to those who dislike the frigid and formal reception.

The people—the gentlemen, at least—who saw Mrs. Scott Siddons when she appeared here, will not be surprised to hear that during her recent visit to the Sandwich Islands, a native fell in love with her, and wanted to buy her from her husband. But they will be disgusted at the price offered—only a bunch of bananas.

The Boston Herald is of the opinion that Niagara Falls never looked handsomer than this winter, and believes that all it needs to make it perfectly grand is to have the trees decorated with dead hackmen.

A man in western Iowa, who is a candidate for three offices, has invented a method of shaking hands by postal card.

Many a man who prays not to be led into temptation would be awfully disappointed if the prayer were granted.

"Quite a cold snap," as the fox remarked when the trap took him in.

SAN FRANCISCO SOCIETY.

Something of the pioneer lingers in the manners of all communities that have grown up suddenly into wealth and greatness. It is the same in San Francisco, though there is less of the frontier element in our social composition than we might expect when we remember our small beginnings and our rapid progress. We are the result of the mining camp, and of such rude force and skilled energy as commonly seek fortunes in untrodden regions. Our social life is rich in its coloring, but tropical in its rankness. Our earlier and our later lives are sharply contrasted. When California became part of the nation, San Francisco was a wilderness of sand and chaparral, with a few respectable adobe houses and scattering huts dotting the peninsula at wide intervals. The population was Spanish, with a few adventurous traders from the East and European countries. The De Haros, the Valencias, the Noes, and Guerreros lived in the little village that clustered about the Mission. The Castros, the Estudillos, the Vallejos, the Ainsas, the Bandinis, and the Noriegas maintained rural state on ranches scattered about the bay and at points in the interior. The social amusements were bull-fights and fandangos. Daily life was like the drowsy existence of lotus-eaters. There was little more labor than was needed to procure the two essentials, food and shelter. This silence was rudely disturbed by the advent of noisy, fortune-seeking, gold-hunting Americans, who began to come in large numbers in 1849. Few women came with them. Those in pursuit of gold scattered through the mountains; those who desired to obtain wealth without delving for it established themselves in trade, or sought labor in the city. Life in the mining-camps has been depicted vividly, if not always with strict fidelity, by Bret Harte, and has been described a thousand times in public prints and in discourses before Pioneer societies. Vice and crime flourished so rankly in the city as to make the swift judgment of the Vigilantes a blessing. The American women first seen in San Francisco were wives of soldiers. A few merchants' wives came in 1850, and a few more in 1851. Places to shelter them were not numerous. One of the first houses suitable for feminine entertainment was the hotel at the corner of Kearny and Commercial Streets, kept by Messrs. Hart, Joyce & Sullivan, which was burned in the fire of 1851. In 1850, vessels landed at the wharf at the corner of Clay and Sansome, from which point the settlement extended westward up Clay, Washington, and Sacramento Streets. One of the first hotels which could pretend to be fashionable was the St. Francis, at the corner of Clay and Dupont, which furnished good entertainment and made extravagant charges therefor. It was not much patronized after 1852. At the corner of Pike and Clay was a hotel kept by Henry Gordon Walton, whose intellectual wife was the author of the poem read at the celebration of California's admission as a State, on the 19th of October, 1850. On the opposite corner was the Garrett House, kept by Zeke Wilson, afterward landlord of the Portsmouth, on Portsmouth Square. These hotels entertained most of the male representatives of our aristocracy in the first two or three years of the city's history. The Oriental Hotel, a large and convenient place of public entertainment for those primitive days, was built in 1851 at the intersection of Bush, Battery, and Market Streets. For six or seven years it was the centre of fashion and sociability. Among the ladies who were its permanent guests were Mrs. Ira P. Rankin, Mrs. R. J. Vandewater, Mrs. Jacob Underhill, Mrs. Squire P. Dewey, Mrs. Garnett, Mrs. Henry Haight, Mrs. Robert Wakeman, Mrs. Frank Page, Mrs. A. A. Ritchie, Mrs. Henry Payson, and Mrs. Dr. Hitchcock, the mother of Mrs. Howard Coit. The Tehama House, at the corner of California and Sansome streets, where the Bank of California stands, was a rival of the Oriental Hotel, though having a different patronage. Its corridors were brightened by the uniforms of dashing army officers, and loud with the disputes of politicians. Captain U. S. Grant came from his post at Trinidad, in Humboldt County, and, unaware of his future greatness, in Mexican sombrero and serape, smoked the pipe of peace in contented taciturnity on its front steps; and "John Phoenix," the first humorist of the Pacific Coast, was for a long time its respected guest. There were many other army officers who were its frequent patrons, among them General Sherman, General Wool, General Clark, Colonel Anderson, Colonel Graham, Colonel Benjamin Beal—a great wit, Captain Whiting, Captain Folsom, Captain Gibson, Captain Burns, and H. A. Leonard, Army Paymaster for many years. The famous Mrs. Greenough and her daughter, and the handsome Mrs. Samuel Ward, were guests of the Oriental during the winter of 1854. The Brannan House, at the corner of Bush and Sansome, the Rasette House, which stood on the site of the Cosmopolitan; and the International, at the corner of Kearney and Jackson streets, were more or less noted as abodes of wealth and elegance during the same period. None of these hotels ever achieved the position so long and so honorably maintained by the Oriental. The gay society of those early days danced to the music of the military and naval bands, had its assemblies, and listened, at Mr. Thomas Maguire's theatres, to the singing of Kate Hayes, Biscaccianti, and Madame Anna Thillon, and to the ravishing strains of Ole Bull. The sexes were hardly in proportion, there being in attendance at these pioneer operatic performances perhaps one lady to twenty gentlemen. There were fashionable boarding houses in the city, at which some of the bachelors of the period were entertained. At Mrs. Leland's, on California Street, near Kearny, might be found Judge Botts, Judge Thornton, Governor Low, and Judge Hoffmann; either then, or not long afterward, the wearers of these titles. At Mrs. Pettit's, next door, could be seen a pleasant set, of which Judge Heydenfeldt, Judge Woodruff, and Mr. Derby, a Boston gentleman of some fame, formed a part. An agreeable group of ladies and gentlemen made its headquarters at a large boarding house built by Henry Meigs, at the corner of Broadway and Montgomery streets. The list of guests and visitors included Charles Webb Howard, then a young Green Mountain boy, with face as round and red as a Vermont pippin; Edward Gould and his wife, A. J. Moulder, and Mr. and Mrs. Tobin. In 1852 society began to crystallize. Its first efforts at local aggrandizement were on Stockton Street, north of Washington, where—

[NOTE.—For a continuation of this article, see Elite Directory—the above being the first three pages only of a long society résumé.]

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The programme for the matinee of next Wednesday—Mr. Herold's silver wedding, as it were, with our orchestra, since it is the twenty-fifth anniversary of his taking it in charge—has been announced, and consists of Schubert's unfinished symphony, the Leonore overture, No. 3 (for which, many thanks in advance), the Danse Macabre, Von Weber's Fidel overture, and the march from Tannhauser, all for orchestra. Besides this, there is to be a scena from Il Guarany (the same that she sang so beautifully at the concert of the Christian Association), with orchestral accompaniment, and a canzonetta by Haydn, sung by Mrs. Henry Norton. A magnificent programme, truly, and one worthy the occasion. Everything points toward a crowded house and a brilliant performance.

Willhelmj is coming! Mr. Gray has received a telegram from Mr. Strakosch announcing the speedy arrival in San Francisco of this famous violinist, who has been turning the heads of Eastern audiences and critics, and who will undoubtedly fiddle us out of all claim to a symmetrical adjustment of anything excepting our ears. The preliminary announcement says nothing of the artists who will accompany the great violinist ("greatest living," Strakosch calls him, which, however, I will venture to qualify by a prefatory "one of the"), but it is to be hoped that it will be either a better "support" than I see advertised for his late Eastern concerts, or none at all. San Francisco will not endure a single great artist surrounded by sticks—witness our treatment of Wieniowski—unless, indeed, those sticks are taken from her own wood-yard. Then they may be as rotten as they like; indeed, sometimes I fancy that the poorer they are the better their chance of success.

The subscription for the coming season of Quintet Concerts is well under way, and the prospect for a delightful series of thoroughly musical evenings, excellent. Among the novelties in preparation for the first concert are Schumann's "Scenes from the Orient" for piano-forte (in which Miss Schmidt will be joined by a very talented young local pianiste who has not yet appeared in public), and the latest quintet, for piano-forte and strings, by Rubinstein. This work is making the rounds of the Eastern and European concert programmes, and is hailed as one of the master's finest productions. If Mr. Schmidt happens to be at a loss for a quartet number that will certainly be very welcome to all of his old subscribers, I can help him out by suggesting a grouping together of Bach's lovely Aria and the posthumous C minor movement of Schubert. They were both exquisitely played last season, and I think I know of a score of people who will be ready with a subscription at once for the sake of hearing them again.

One of the most interesting features of the very attractive programme announced by Mr. Herold for the matinee of next Wednesday is a contrasting at one performance of three great orchestral compositions of such entirely dissimilar character as the third Leonore overture of Beethoven, the B minor symphony of Schubert, and the Danse Macabre of Saint Saens. We have here grouped together the apotheosis of dramatic expression, in the Beethoven overture, the most perfect lyric grace, in the symphony of Schubert, and, in the Danse of Saint Saens, probably the extreme of what has hitherto been attained of bizarerie in thematic as well as harmonic and instrumental treatment; I may say, indeed, that the French composer has in this work gone beyond the conditions prescribed by either good taste or the natural laws of art, one of the first (indeed, the first) of which is that the art-work should be beautiful in itself, seeking to express only what can be kept within the limits of the beautiful, and calling to its aid only such forms of expression as shall lend a higher and more plastic grace to the thought that is to be embodied. The Beethoven overture has always stood to me as one of the finest examples in our literature of the wonderful self-poise of a truly great artist-mind; it is unquestionably a work of immense dramatic force and expression, wonderfully concise in form, clear in handling (logical treatment), and vivid in instrumentation. And it is always beautiful. From the first note to the last it is beautiful—supremely beautiful—music, perfectly coherent, perfectly logical, perfectly enjoyable. The work of Saint Saens, on the contrary, is never really beautiful. It is exciting in its piquant harmonies (dis-harmonies, rather) and peculiar themes, and extremely interesting in its instrumentation. But it is a nervous irritation, rather than a piece of beautiful music; it is a sensation, rather than a work of art. One has but to listen to it after the tenderly graceful symphony of Schubert (holding oneself well in hand, however, lest the very atmosphere of the thing intoxicate, and steal away one's better judgment) to be at once fully convinced that if the one is music the other is not—that if the one belongs within the domain of art, the other has its proper place somewhere beyond. The Danse is a great, an interesting piece of work, but so are, also, Walt Whitman's poems, yet we should hardly call them poetry. S. E.

Wilhelmj, the great fiddler, passed through Oil City yesterday, with his $5,000 Stradivarius violin, on his way East. A Derrick representative was delegated to interview the renowned artist, with the following result:

Reporter—How do you like this country thus far?
Wilhelmj—Very muchj, indeedj; itj isj aj greatj countryj. Ij havej seenj aj greatj manyj thingsj herej thatj surprisedj mej, andj inj manyj thingsj Ij thinkj thej peoplej herej arej superiorj toj thej Europeansj. Ij thinkj thisj countryj isj destinedj toj bej aj greatj onej; Ij doj, indeedj.
Reporter—Would you not like to stop off in Oil City and play for a dance on the "flats" to-night?
Wilhelmj—Gooj toj Hellespontj!

Just then the train moved off, which was no doubt a fortunate circumstance for the reporter.

Louis Philippe was paying a visit to a rural burg, where his affable manners so enchanted the Mayor that that worthy magistrate exclaimed in rapture:

"Ah! sire, after all, one thing is lacking. Why, oh! why, didn't you fetch your wife along?"
 "Well, you see," blandly replied the citizen-king, "some one had to stay at home and look after the house."

HULDA.

In a castle built of stone
 Hulda sits and sighs alone.

Since her ill-starred natal day
 Forty years have passed away.

Suitors had she by the score,
 In the palmy days of yore.

Belted knights of high degree
 Came to woo on bended knee.

High she held her stately head—
 I will wed a Prince, she said.

Homeward rode the knights forlorn,
 As she turned from them in scorn.

But the Prince came nevermore,
 In the palmy days of yore.

So she sits and sighs alone
 In a castle built of stone.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 27, 1879.

L. H. FOOTE.

Dead Sea Fruit.

Two women, tall and graceful, proud and fair,
 Came to me in a dream,
 One clad in purple, jewels in her hair,
 Of gracious mien.

The other, wearing on her comely head
 A snowdrop wreath,
 Her robe as white, slow and abashed her tread,
 Fragrant her breath.

The one in purple spake, her voice rang clear
 And strangely loud,
 The while the other modestly drew near,
 Her sweet face bowed.

"I dwell," she said, "within a palace rare,
 Where all night long
 We woo delight, and laugh at tiresome care,
 In wine and song."

"Women, whose glowing eyes are bright and deep
 As tropic seas,
 Speed on the hours, which fools consume in sleep,
 In arts like these."

She danced, as never mortal woman moved,
 To some wild rhyme,
 Which told the victory that those beloved
 Gained over time.

Her garments shed a perfume which oppressed,
 Yet filled the brain
 With longings to caress and be caressed,
 Feeding a flame

That burned in sluggish ardor, none the less
 Because subdued;
 "Come to me," cried she; "come, let this caress Quicken your blood."

I kissed her lips—then all was changed, the bloom
 Fleed at a breath;
 She seemed to moulder, filling all the room
 With airs of death.

Her burning eyes waxed glassy in their stare;
 Her voice, a groan
 That thrilled me with the deep, intense despair
 Breathed in its tone.

She of the snowdrop wreath spake clearly then:
 "In moments wasted,
 Have you not mourned, like other unwise men,
 Delights untasted—"

"Mourned because in strong temptation's hour,
 With noble pride,
 You found within your manhood's self the power
 To turn aside;

"Yet when the time had passed, the sin once scorned,
 The rapture lost,
 With deep regret and guilty grief you mourned,
 Soul passion tossed!"

"Canst think yon loathsome, charnel-tainted dust,
 Corruption's trace,
 Is that fair opportunity of lust
 You would embrace!"

"Sweep from thy soul the ashes of desires,
 Keep clean the hearth;
 Upon its altars kindle nobler fires
 In a new birth."

OAKLAND, January 27, 1879.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

For an Album.

How pleasing 'tis to have a book where friends
 May write their thoughts in words both grave and gay,
 In stately verse or sparkling phantasy
 That charms the ear, and then fond memory sends
 To scenes gone by, where oft it sweetly blends
 With some almost forgotten melody.

But if, perchance, in drawing you have skill,
 I'll happy be to see the limner's art
 Adorn my book; or if some counterpart
 You may possess of etching that can fill
 A place herein, please give it, and I still Shall thank you for it, and with all my heart.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879.

FRANK BOWDEN.

Mining.

The shaft some thousand fathoms I descended,
 To where stout miners worked 'mid endless night.
 The walls reflected back my taper's light
 As through these catacombs of gold I wended.
 I saw the rocks from where God placed them rendered
 By patient stroke of pick and muscle's might.
 And then I saw the metal fair and bright
 Cleared of the dross with which 'twas willow blended.
 I said, while watching them the quartz refine,
 The poet with these toilers is akin;
 Although a different meed he seeks to win,
 Yet he, instructed by a power divine,
 Selects from thoughts ignoble, mean, and poor,
 The golden ones that ever must endure.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 27, 1879.

R. E. W.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

A ole cat she had 2 kittns, one was a nice feller, but the other it was no count, sore eyes, and one day wile the ole cat was gon the rats thay found her bed, and thay et the wel kittn up. Wen the ole cat she come home and see how it was she was in a mity bad way, and she sed: "The best is always took youngest, if that little feller had ben spared he wude ben the splinddest ratter wich was ever see. Things is orderd with grate injustice in this world."

Mose, wich is our cat, he dont hav no kittins, but he is pretty good at line by the stove, and wen you rub him the rong way in the dark he strikes fire like he was a flint. Billy he ast my father if Moses sparks was lecktristy, and my father he sed: "I gess so, Billy, cos I've oberseed that wen you tred on his tail he is littenin!"

One day there was a offe storm, thunder and littenin, and nex day ole Gaffer Peters he cum over to our hous, and he sed to my Uncle Ned, ole Gaffer did: "Edard, its a sollum thot that in the midst of life we are ded. I had a mity narro escape yisterdy from ben killt by littenin, yes, in deed, a little more an you wude never seen ole Gaffer any more in the flesh."

Then Uncle Ned sed: "In the bones, Gaffer, in the bones," cos Gaffer aint fat, its jest the other way.

But Gaffer he sed: "The littenin hit a tre over on Missis Doppys ranch, and Missis Dobby is my dotter."

Then Uncle Ned he sed: "Bles my sole, wot a dredfle close call! If I was you Ide have Missis Dobby sel that ranch and bi a other one further away."

And ole Gaffer he said he had ben a thinkin of that hisself. But my father he says he dont think that will hellup matters, cos the poetry man says the king of shadders loves a shining mark, and altho Missis Dobby has got a red hed, Gaffer haint got no hair onto hisn, and he mite mebbey get a lick on his own account.

One time there was a feller had bot sum brim stone for to smoke out the gofers in his garden, and the brim stone was in his bed room, but he was in a other town. So one night the littenin it struck a tre in the town were he was, and nex day every body was lookin were it had hit, and the man he sed: "Ide jest like for to know were that littenin struck las time fore it cum here"

The other men thay said wot for did he want to know, and he sed: "I notice a offe smel of brim stone round here were it struck, and I jest wudent be sprised if it had ben hitn my wife."

But Mister Oraferty, wich lives jest round the corner, he hits hisn hisn self with a ax handle wen she dont be good.

Mister Jonnice, wich makes poetry, he knew a man and his wife wich quarld and jawed all the time, and once thay was both tuke sick, and the wife she died but the man he got well. And then Mister Jonnice he rote this poetry about em, and it was printed in the paper, bad spellen and all.

"When Bolivar Gump was departing this life
 He cussed his already departed wife;
 But the river of death he couldn't cross o'er,
 For she sailed him back from the other shore."

Me and Billy we ben readn fairy tales, and I never see such woppers, I bet the feller wich rote em will be burnt every tiny little bit up wen he dies, but Billy he says they are all true but the facks. Uncle Ned sed cude I tell one, and I ast him wot about, and he sed: "Wel, Johnny, as you got to do the tellin lle leav the choice of subjeck entirely to you, jest giv us some thing a bout a little boy that went and sook his fortin."

So I sed: "One time there was a little boy went out for to seek his fortin, and first thing he see was a grate big yello posy on a punkin vine."

Then Uncle Ned he sed: "Johnny, was that the punkin vine wich yure hed once had a bizness connection with?" But I didnt anser, only went on with the story.

"So the little boy he worked into the posy, and croid down the vine on his hans and kanees bout ten thousan hundred miles, till he come bime bi to a dore which he opened and went in and found hisself in a grate big house, offe nice like a kings pallow or a hotell. But the little boy he didnt find any body to bome and went out a other dore, were he see a ocion with a bote, and he got in the bote."

Then Uncle Ned he sed a other time: "Johnny, excuse the ignance of a man wich has ben in Injy and evry were, but is it the regler thing for punkin vines to have sea side resorts in em?"

But I only sed: "Wen the little boy had saild out of site of land the bote it sunk, and he went down, down, down, in the water, like he was tied a round the neck of a mil stone, til he was swollord by a wale, cos wales is the largest of created beings wich plows the deep, but lions is the king of beests, and the American eagle can lick ol other birds, hooray! Wen the little boy was a seekn his fortin in the stumck of the wales belly he cum to a fence, and wen he had got over the fence he found hisself in a rode runin thru a medder, and it was a offe nice country fur as he cude see."

Uncle Ned sed: "Did he put up at the same way side inn wich was patternize by Jonah wen he penetratid to that part of the morl vinyerd?"

But I said: "Bimebi he seen a rope hangin down from the ski, and he begin for to clime it up, a sayin 'Snitchety, snatchety, up I go, 'wot time is it, ole witch?' 'niggers as good as a wite man,' 'fee-faw-fum,' 'Chinese mus go,' 'all men is equal fore the law,' 'blitherum, blatherum, boo,' and all the words of madgick wich he cude think of. After a wile it got reel dark, but he kep on a climing, and pretty sune he see a round spot of dalite over his hed, and then he cum up out of a well in a grate city."

Jest then my father he cum in and he sed: "Johnny, you get the bucket and go to the wel and fetch sum water for your mother to wash the petatoes."

But I sed it was Billys tern, and Billy he sed twasent nn sech thing, and I sed he lide, and he hit me on the snoot of my nose, and we fot a fite, but vickery percht upon the banners of my father, cos he had a stick. Then wile me and Billy was cryin Uncle Ned he spoke up and begun: "One time there was a Grate North American fairy teler—"

But I jest fetched Mose a kick, wich is the cat, and went out and pitcht into Sammy Dobby wich licked me all over. SAN RAFAEL, January 26, 1879.

A MODERN ROBE OF NESSUS.

By Robert Duncan Milne.

"I could tell you," said the Basque shepherd, as he lit his pipe after supper, and drew his stool closer to the fire, at the same time filling a pitcher with red wine from a keg in the corner, and handing me a cup, "I could tell you a story of the great world of society—a story of which I am now the only depository; and it can be no harm to tell it, for all those to whom it relates, including my own Lisette, are dead. Ah, me!" continued he, passing his hand reflectively over his forehead, "the curse of that night's work fell upon her, too."

I had been traveling all day in the foot-hills of the Sierra Nevada of Mariposa County, and at night found myself partaking of the hospitality of a shepherd's cabin. My host, despite his rough garb, had the appearance of a man of experience and meditation; and his bearing betokened that though not "to the manner born," he had yet acquired something of that which characterizes the social intercourse of gentlemen by contact or attrition. He took a deep draught of wine, looked thoughtfully in the fire a moment or two, and began:

"You have been in Paris? Twelve years ago? Ah! then you could not have had personal knowledge of the events I am going to tell you about, for they occurred two years earlier, in '64. Nevertheless, you may remember reading in the papers of the day about the burning of the mansion of the Marquis de B., during a bal masqué, and the elopement on the same night of Madame la Marquise with a certain Abbé, at that time well known in Paris. Ah! you remember hearing something about it? Well, whatever you may have heard or read was not true. I alone of living men—for even the Doctor, who is now in the galleys, can only suspect what happened—can give you the true story of this affair, for I was a principal actor in it. To tell it will relieve the burden of my mind—that is, if you care to hear it?" politely queried the shepherd. Being assured that nothing could be more seasonable and welcome than a story at such a time, after throwing another log upon the fire, the Basque shepherd began:

I was not always as you see me now, but ill-luck has followed me since I left France. It is true that I am one of the people, but my condition was once much better than it is now.

At the time I speak of I held the position of valet de chambre to the Marquis de B., and Lisette was what you call lady's maid to Madame la Marquise. I was then younger than I am now—not more than thirty years old; and Lisette was twenty-five. We had saved our earnings for several years past, and intended to leave service in the autumn and marry, and go back to Béarn, where we had decided to open a hotel—but it was never to be. Monsieur the Marquis was tall, and proud, and rich; Madame la Marquise was tall, and proud, and beautiful, but not nearly so pretty to my taste as Lisette. Monsieur was fifty years old, and Madame was (Lisette told me she found it out from the back of a miniature) thirty-five. Monsieur was fond of gayety, and so was Madame; and to outsiders it must certainly have appeared that they were a very happy, well-matched couple. But we of the household had, of course, opportunities of observing every little thing that went on, and Lisette and I would often compare notes and draw conclusions from what we saw and heard. About three months previous to the time of which I write, Madame la Marquise had fallen out with her father confessor, and taken a new one in his stead. The Abbé R. was as fine looking a man as I have ever seen. He was as tall as the Marquis, but much younger; his carriage erect, his bearing stately, his eye keen, his nose aquiline, with a good-humored smile always playing round the corners of his mouth. He was very kind and pleasant to Lisette and me, always speaking to us when he called, and generally bestowing a five-franc piece on one or other of us, and on one or two occasions even a Napoleon. He used to call very frequently upon Madame la Marquise, who received him in her boudoir, which opened by one door into the grand salon, and by another into the conservatory. Lisette used to say that she thought Madame must have been committing more sins than usual of late, since it took so much longer time to confess them; but this was only to me, for we were much too discreet to let our thoughts be known at large. The Abbé generally came in the forenoon, when Monsieur had gone down to his club or was amusing himself in the billiard room, for Monsieur troubled himself very little about the religious exercises of Madame. About two months after the Abbé began to pay his visits, Lisette came running into my room one morning very much excited and flustered, saying that there had occurred a grand émeute between Monsieur and Madame in the grand salon; that Monsieur was walking up and down with folded arms, and stamping with his feet, and looking as black as night; while Madame was reclining on a sofa in tears, her face buried in her hands. Lisette had seen them through the keyhole; and something very unusual and extraordinary must evidently have happened, though we never knew what it was. We, however, connected it somehow with the Abbé, for we noticed that from that day he came no more. For a week after this Madame was very sorrowful and triste, while Monsieur remained sombre and terrible. Then Madame brightened up all of a sudden, and began to approach and coax Monsieur so assiduously, and in such a pretty, winning way, that Monsieur relaxed his gloomy mood, and soon the whole household knew that preparations were on the tapis for a grand masquerade ball, which was to eclipse anything of the kind ever seen in Paris since the golden days of Louis Quatorze; for Monsieur the Marquis was very rich, and not at all afraid of spending his money.

This was in March, and the ball was to take place just before the holy season of Lent, in order, as Lisette said, that the great folks might have pleasant memories to carry them through those dull weeks when they were debarred from the actual pleasures themselves. Our house was one of the finest in the Faubourg St. Germain, and stood alone within its grounds. The grand salons were au premier, comprising five apartments stretching through the entire wing, Madame's boudoir being at the end of the two salons which ran along the side wing, opening on to the conservatories. Everything was being turned topsy-turvy. The polished oak floors were waxed in three of the salons for dancing, while the two next the conservatories, furnished with the richest carpets and decorated with a profusion of mural hangings, were reserved for conversation and lounging. I remember all the particulars as well as if it were yesterday. Parterres of flowers and groves of trees were borne in from the gardens. Water-pipes were laid cunningly along the walls and in corners to distribute perfumed spray, and aid in cooling the air. It was the day of the ball, and I happened to be engaged in performing some little offices in the conservatory salons, near Madame's boudoir, when, fortunately, or unfortunately, I became the participant of a conversation which was going on therein, and which struck me from its peculiarity at once. The dialogue was being carried on by Madame on the one hand, and a male visitor on the other. It was Madame who spoke:

"Then Monsieur is sure there is no risk of detection?" "None whatever, Madame," answered the visitor. "In order to prove to you with what caution and discretion I have executed your commission, I will tell you that I, with my own hands, prepared the fibres; that I then sent the silk to a loom at Lyons, whence the piece was shipped to a costumier in this city and made up by his workmen. I have carefully concealed every trace of these several steps, so that in the event of any unforeseen occurrence the chance of collecting the links of evidence in a connected chain are reduced to a mathematical minimum."

"Will Monsieur the Doctor please to explain again the nature and operation of this dress, so that I may be certain to commit no inadvertence?" continued Madame.

"With pleasure," responded the visitor. "The substances with which the fibres of the silk are impregnated are well known to chemists, though not in the combination in which I have used them. The effect of the warmth and moisture of the skin upon these substances is such as to draw out their properties very gradually. Their action, imperceptible at first, manifests itself primarily in a delicious languor, which, in its turn, gives place to aphasia and paralysis of the nerves and muscles. In this condition the subject may be kept utterly helpless, but in full possession of his senses, for about half an hour. The dress must then be removed—be pleased to particularly remember this—or spasms will supervene, actual paralysis ensue, and finally death."

"But surely Monsieur does not suppose that I should allow the last contingency to happen?"

"Certainly not. Your object, as you confided to me, is to keep your friend in a condition of helpless consciousness, or conscious helplessness, while you carry out the object you have in view. So far as I am concerned it is a feature of the masquerade. Nevertheless if the contingency I have referred to should happen, Madame la Marquise may rest assured that the cause of it would ever remain a secret, even to the most experienced physiologist."

"Proceed, Monsieur le Doctor."

"I have so accurately gauged the quantity and strength of the substances which permeate the silk, that death will result only as a consequence of their complete absorption by the pores. Their action being directly on those myriads of nerves the extremities of which underlie the entire surface of the skin, with a counter action on the muscular system, no trace will be left of their presence in the tissues, or any of the secretions. The most skillful and suspicious chemist would be baffled in detecting the least souffçon of the substances, either in the silk or in the person, and his verdict would be, 'death from paralysis.'"

"God forbid that it should ever be put to the test," piously ejaculated the Marquise. "Long before then my object will have been accomplished, and orders left with the servant to undress my friend, and to destroy the dress."

"Yes, in that case the dress had better be destroyed. Permit me to thank Madame for the ten thousand francs which I have had the pleasure of drawing from her bankers. May success and pleasure await her in her little experiment with her friend. Adieu."

I stood motionless with surprise on hearing these words, the singularity of which caused them to be so deeply engraved on my memory that I remember them distinctly, even at this distance of time. I could comprehend that they threatened evil to some one who was an object of aversion to the Marquise. But what evil? And to whom? I retreated behind a large porcelain vase in the conservatory, and awaited developments. The door of the boudoir opened, and a man whose appearance betokened his business to be that of a costumier, with a large bundle of goods under his arm, emerged from the boudoir and passed through the salons on his way out.

In spite of his disguise, and the way in which his cap concealed his face, I recognized a well-known physician of the Quartier Latin, whose character for honesty was as low as his reputation for skill in his profession was preëminent. I was just making up my mind what to do, when a groom of the chambers approached the boudoir, intimating to Madame that another costumier was in waiting. I determined to remain where I was and await the event. The door of the boudoir closed behind a tall figure enveloped in a cloak, the face closely ensconced beneath a slouched hat of exaggerated proportions, but whose tout ensemble seemed familiar to me. The lace curtains which veiled the windows of the boudoir looking into the conservatory were so carefully drawn that it was impossible to see anything through them, but I could hear the sound of the quick rustling of a dress; and then a sound as of sighs, alternating with another sound which I conceived to be that of kissing; and then the whispered words:

"François!"

"Mathilde!"

I recognized the voice. There could be no doubt about it. It was the Abbé. "Ha, ha! Monsieur l'Abbé!" I thought, "you are a bold man to dare the vengeance of my master in this manner; but, ma foi! in spite of your five-franc pieces and Napoleons he shall know it, and then"—[Here the Basque shepherd replenished his tin pannikin with wine from the pitcher, and, taking a deep draught, resumed:]

"The Marquise came to the window, drew aside the lace curtains, and looked cautiously out up and down the conservatory. I crouched more closely behind my vase, and remained unnoticed. She drew the curtains again, satisfied, and retired. A conversation ensued between the Abbé and the Marquise, which has, like the former one, been indelibly impressed on my mind by succeeding events."

"At last," murmured the Marquise.

"At last," responded the Abbé.

"Is everything arranged?"

"Staterooms are secured on La Belgique, from Havre, at eight to-morrow morning. We leave Paris at midnight. A carriage will be in waiting at the north door to convey us to the terminus. Once on board we are safe from pursuit. In America our new life begins. Our name is Dubois."

"You have had the money transferred?"

"Yes. Here are the vouchers; and the robe—?"

"Is that of Mephistopheles. It is our friend's selection."

"Nothing could be more appropriate—Mephistopheles outwitted," laughed the Abbé.

"You like the idea of the medicated dress?"

"Admirable! It is a stroke of genius."

"For which we must thank the Doctor. He considered it much more suitable to the purpose than anaesthetics."

"Yes, I see. Mere stupor or insensibility would have taken away the point of the coup and robbed your departure of its déclat. It would have been a story without a moral."

"I can fancy him lying there upon the sofa, impotent in his fury, incapable of speech or motion, yet appreciating all, while we stand before him leisurely holding our last confidential talk before leaving. N'est-ce pas drôle, mon ami?"

"And waving him a last adieu as we go out."

"I must at least kiss him once before saying good-bye," plaintively remarked the Marquise.

"And leave orders for his nurse to undress le pauvre enfant, and put him to bed," laughed the Abbé.

I was now all attention, but the voices were lowered, apparently discussing some more confidential matters. I had, however, heard enough to convince me that the dress referred to in the two conversations I had overheard was destined to be worn by the Marquis, for I was already aware that he had decided to appear in the rôle of Mephistopheles. Further than this, I could gather that the Marquise and the Abbé were plotting in concert; that they were evidently on the most intimate terms, and that the Marquis was the object of this conspiracy. The conversation was presently resumed in a louder key.

"And this is your dress, François—a Mephistopheles, like our friend. When he retires to repose here, on my invitation, at eleven o'clock, you will take his place in the salons. Your ensemble is similar and the personation will be perfect. Besides, it will heighten the effect of our farewell when he sees his place occupied by so flattering a representation of himself," laughed the Marquise.

"If—suppose—ha! ha!—you have, of course, provided against it—some mistake should occur, and the dresses get changed. The notion is not a comfortable one."

"Impossible. Voilà! Our friend's suit is adorned with two little crosses of white ribbon, one here on the back of the collar, the other on the left angle of the hose. Yours is free from such embellishment."

"Your providence is delightful."

"An apartment au troisième has been assigned you as costumier. I will carry your dress thither with my own hands. You will appear on the floor at eleven. If I have occasion to communicate with you our password is 'croix blanc.' Now go."

"Till eleven, then. Au revoir!" and the cloaked costumier passed out, presently followed by the Marquise, attired for her daily drive in the Bois.

During the latter part of this conversation my feelings had undergone a revulsion. Disgust and loathing had taken the place of curiosity. Could it be possible, I asked myself, that France—that the world—could produce such embodiments of baseness and malignity? Was it possible that a crime such as was contemplated could be committed for the attainment of any object whatsoever? Was it possible that this could be Madame la Marquise, whom I had known for so many years, without knowing her true character; or had her character become horribly and suddenly perverted and changed? I passed my hands over my forehead to wipe away the drops of perspiration which had gathered on it like dew.

I tried vainly to persuade myself that it was some horrible nightmare. I tried to move, to crawl away, but some deadly fascination that I could not resist nullified the power of my will, and arrested motion. Gradually the contemplation of the enormity of the deed yielded to the desire to counteract and thwart it. This in its turn produced excitement. I rose from the shadow of the vase. I flew to Lisette, whom I found in her room, and she started on seeing me as if I had been a ghost.

"Run!—fly!" I cried; "quick! change the ribbons on the dresses, or we are ruined—lost!"

The poor girl burst into tears, and fell on her knees, invoking the saints for protection. She thought I had gone mad. But I caught her in my arms, and almost carried her along to the boudoir of Madame. There lay the two red silken suits of tunics and trunk-hose—both identical costumes of Mephistopheles, except that on the collar and angle of one suit there appeared little crosses of white ribbon.

"Now, Lisette," I cried, "as you value my love—as you value your own life—as you value your hopes of heaven, take a needle and thread, and—quick!—detach these crosses of ribbon from this suit, and sew them in exactly the same positions on the other."

The poor girl trembled and looked at me with a frightened expression, saying not a word, through fear, for she was now thoroughly convinced I was mad; but obeyed me mechanically as speedily as her fright would allow her, and at length the ribbons had changed places on the garments. I then laid the suits back carefully in the same relative positions in which I had found them, led Lisette back to her room, and implored her to calm herself and that I would tell her all in time.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Father of adored one: "Then it comes to this, sir; you have no fortune, you have lost your appointment, you have no prospect of another, and you come to ask for my daughter's hand—and fortune?" "No! Suppose we put it this way: I am unembarrassed by wealth, am free from the cares of business, and my future is irradiated by hope; therefore, this is the crisis when I can best devote myself to your daughter, and enjoy that affluence with which you will crown our love."

WHAT TO WEAR AND HOW TO WEAR IT.

Special Fashion Letter from Our New York Correspondent.

Fashion was never more lenient than at the present time. Paniers are en règle, as are also plain dresses. It is as much the style to wear the hair high as low. One thing seems obligatory, and that is, whichever way the hair is dressed there must be very little of it. Puffs are rather passé, although some ladies still cling to them, and as most of them are false, consequently it is very easy for a lady to arrange her own hair without the assistance of a hairdresser.

Large Alsacian bows of black velvet, satin, or gros grain ribbon of any becoming color, are very extensively worn, pinned directly in front, against the puffs or braids. These bows are very becoming, and especially liked by short ladies, as they help to make them look taller. Another beautiful and stylish novelty worn by the ladies of fashion to the opera and very swell dinner parties are turbans made of figured silk handkerchiefs of one color, red being the most in favor.

The favorite shades for evening dresses are peach and lemon, pale turquoise, and a cream tint. Pink is again a favored color, as it combines so effectively with black, brown, and dark green. The trimming most in use is lace of all kinds. It is worn everywhere. Jabots down the front and sides, from the waist down, are seen on the loveliest dresses.

Embroidery of all kinds is worn, and the height of elegance is to have the embroidery worked directly on the dress itself; but this is very expensive, and when the bands of embroidery are neatly transferred, the effect is almost the same. A great number of handsome black dresses were worn on New Year's Day. They are always considered elegant, for young as well as middle-aged ladies. There is a great fancy for black velvet dresses for receptions, and even for evening wear. Rich costumes of black satin, all trimmed with beaded passementerie and fringe, or lace, for the older of the fashionable ladies; while for the younger matrons, black satin in combination with plain gros grain, or watered silk. An exquisite dress is of rich black satin, embroidered in a lily of the valley and fancy pattern, in a dense garland. Three embroidered scarfs cross the tablier diagonally, and form the drapery on the train. The skirt is trimmed around at the foot with triple-clustered box plaiting, headed by knife plaiting arranged in the half-open fan style. A charming combination of velvet, satin, and faille is in the princess style, with a basque in front and square train in the back, the dress being principally of black velvet. The vest and cuffs are of old gold satin, and handsome panels of the same material extend down each side of the skirt in front, and are crossed by three small sashes made of double-faced ribbon, black velvet on one side, and red satin on the other. A ruche of red faille, faced with old gold satin, extends round the neck and down the fronts in a line with the edges of the vest, and covers the front seams of the panels. Another similar ruche borders the train, and is continued up the side, simulating a manteau de cour. A handsome bridal dress of white brocade combined with white satin, has white lace sleeves to the elbow, square neck, round at the corners, and finished with lace ruffles raised upon a wire, and bent over to form a lace collar. The back is cut en princesse, but with small side paniers and a trained skirt, of which the trimming is formed of alternate knife plaitings of white satin and crêpe lisse, over which the brocade is cut out in vandykes, edged with narrow quilting and rouleaux of satin.

A dress to accompany this bridal dress is composed of delicate rose-colored and white brocade silk, and plain ciel blue faille. The waist and the skirt, to nearly half its depth, are formed of the brocade, the dress being extended to the requisite length by the blue faille. At the foot the skirt is bordered by a neatly-laid knife plaiting, overshadowed by a shell-like arrangement of the brocade silk, edged with narrow knife plaiting of the faille. A scarf drapery, formed of the two varieties of silk, so covers the skirt as to rob it of the singular and outré effect, which might be supposed to attach to it. The trimming is of white and rose-colored lamiré fringe, with tufts of apple blossoms, without foliage, confining the folds of the drapery.

Fur is not yet worn on ball dresses, but it would not be surprising if it does appear, so great is the favor in which it is held this season. It is in its place, one must admit, as a border to a tasteful and comfortable robe de chambre, made of some soft woolen material, say of an écru shade, not too light. The fur should then be of a pretty brown shade, bordering the dress and sleeves, and forming a graceful collar round the neck; slippers of écru velvet, trimmed with fur, to match that of the dress. Speaking of slippers, it must not be supposed that the chaussure remains stationary in the movement which inclines fashion toward change. At present, ball shoes are made of the same color as the dress. They are trimmed with small bows or buckles, or else with a very small bunch of flowers—to correspond with those on the dress. When the dress is designed for a dinner, or soirée without dancing, the shoes are of black kid, as soft and glossy as a glove; the upper part is cut in bands on the front, which are trimmed with buckles or flowers. In this case, silk stockings are de rigueur, and should match the colors of the toilette. When the latter is gray, with pink bows and trimmings, the stockings should be of gray, striped or embroidered with pink, and so on. This style of chaussure is also adopted for the ball, but only by those not dancing. For walking and traveling are worn boots of kid, with the upper parts made of a color to match as nearly as possible the toilet. For instance, a traveling dress of plain, bottle-green wool (the half boots are of the same color) and Scotch plaid; the front of the dress is of plain material, with flat puffs, and trimmed with a flounce of the plaid; the back breadths are of plaid, and the basque of plain material, with plaid sleeves trimmed with plaid. A triple cape of the plain, trimmed with bands of plaid, serves as a wrap. The dress is trimmed with bows, not of ribbon, but of bottle-green silk, but from the piece. Long pelisse of bottle-green cashmere, lined with fur.

Short dresses are worn almost exclusively for the street and church, and are often seen at receptions. They will also be worn at balls, if they resume the old style of dancing; for, in order to dance—that is, to take steps, and not merely walk through a dance—it is indispensable to renounce long dresses.

C. M. HEATH.

NEW YORK, 116 East Twenty-fifth Street.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

The Mystery.

I saw a wonderful light—
Watching the midnight sky—
Leap suddenly into the voiceless dark,
And as suddenly die.

Was it a golden lance
Into the silence hurled
By the spirit of air?—a new-born star?
Or the wreck of a world?

ALBERT LAUGHTON, in February Atlantic.

Fate.

Through the streets of our cities,
With Grief for attendant,
Marches Misfortune,
Stealthily creeping
Round men's habitations,
Knocking at this man's Portal to-day,
To-morrow at that man's—
But wholly spared as yet has it none.
Its loathed and dreaded
Message, right painful,
Sooner or later
It leaves at each threshold
Whence a living eye looks to the sun.

—Schiller's "Bride of Messina."

A Coup d'Etat.

If little seeds by slow degree
Put forth their leaves and flowers unheard,
Our love had grown into a tree
And bloomed without a single word.

I haply hit on six o'clock,
The hour her father came from town;
I gave his own peculiar knock,
And waited slyly, like a clown.

The door was opened. There she stood,
Lifting her mouth's delicious brim.
How could I waste a thing so good?
I took the kiss she meant for him.

A moment on an awful brink—
Deep breath, a frown, a smile, a tear,
And then, "O Robert, don't you think That that was rather—cavalier?"

—London Society.

Engaged Too Long.

Why do I grieve with summer here?
I want the flower that died last year;
I want the old drops of the dew,
And my old love, sir—and not you.

Younger than you, nor quite so wise,
Was he who had your hair and eyes,
Who said, "I love you," first, you see;
This you repeat, and weary me.

MRS. S. M. B. PIATT, in February Atlantic.

Sub Rosa.

Under the rows of gas-jets bright,
Bathed in a blazing river of light,
A regal beauty sits; above her
The butterflies of fashion hover,
And burn their wings, and take to flight.

Mark you her pure complexion—white,
Though flush may follow flush? Despite
Her blush, the lily I discover
Under the rose.

All compliments to her are trite;
She has adorners left and right;
And I confess, here, under cover
Of secrecy, I, too—I love her!

Say naught; she knows it not. 'Tis quite
Under the rose. J. B. M., in Scribner.

"She was a Beauty."

She was a beauty in the days
When Madison was President;
And quite coquettish in her ways—
On cardiac conquests much intent.

Grandpapa, on his right knee bent,
Wooded her in stiff, old-fashioned phrase—
She was a beauty in the days
When Madison was President.

And when your roses where hers went
Shall go, my Lill, who date from Hayes,
I hope you'll wear her sweet content,
Of whom tradition lightly says:
She was a beauty in the days
When Madison was President.

H. C. BUNNER, in Scribner.

Science.

While the dull Fates sit nodding at their loom,
Benumbed and drowsy with its ceaseless boom,
I hear, as in a dream, the monody
Of life's tumultuous, ever ebbing sea;
The iron tramp of armies hurrying by
For ever and for ever but to die,
The tragedies of time, the dreary years,
The frantic carnival of hopes and fears,
The wild-waltz music wailing through the gloom,
The slow death agonies, the yawning tomb,
The loved ones lost forever to our sight
In the wild waste of chaos and old night;
Earth's loom, long dream of martyrdom and pain;
No God in heaven to rend the welded chain
Of endless evolution! Is this all?

And mole-eyed Science, gloating over bones,
The skulls of monkeys, and the Age of Stones,
Blinks at the golden lamps that light the hall
Of dusty death, and answers: "It is all."

SARAH HELEN WHITMAN.

Long Ago.

The bark sails slowly over unseen seas,
The coats of youth long faded out of sight;
The gleam that lingered on the last dear height
Lost, as we drift before Life's steady breeze;
Yet, as the ship glides onward, fair green leas,
And wood-crowned uplands, bathed in mystic light,
Show on an isle set in the moonbeams white
Or blush of sunrise. Ghid, we steer for these;
The mirage pales, the mists close thick again.
We see the great gray waves, and nothing more;
And listen, with a yearning, useless pain,
To hear the soft waves whisper on the shore—
Shore of the happy land we used to know,
Ne'er trodden twice in life—the Long Ago.

NEWSPAPER SCANDAL.

Adapted from an Editorial in the "Sunday Chronicle" Changing the Gender.

The Social Gossip.—The mission of the reporter of a sensational newspaper is malignant, and he serves no useful purpose. He issues forth to instigate contention and stir up calamity. No impulse to correct evil, by rebuke or criticism, animates his heart. He is hostile by nature, like the tiger of the jungle or the serpent of the swamp. His patron saint is the Father of Lies, and his lips are imbued with the deadliest poison. Few social circles are sufficiently small to utterly exclude him, and none so exalted as to wholly escape his presence. His purpose is slander or cold deduction, and his remuneration is the misery he causes, and the pain he succeeds in inflicting. He is an abnormal product of the male sex, and is accounted for solely on the principle that where great good exists great evil will be found also. He thrives beside true manhood as the most degraded poverty prevails in the vicinity of unbounded wealth. There is no legal statute ingenious enough to keep him in check, nor any penalty terrible enough to silence him. The leopard can not change its spots, nor can he hope to be other than the viper of society.

The curiosity of this venomous creature is insatiable. He is ever on the alert for unsavory intelligence, regardless of truth or of personalities, and rather than that a breath of slander should not reach his ears, he would travel whole miles on foot, if ordinary means of transportation were unavailable. In the pursuit of information that does not concern him, he has been known to exhibit demoniac zeal. Many a man would achieve fame and fortune if possessed of half the determination he frequently displays when simply in chase of a contemptible fact that is of no actual consequence to him or to any one else. This once obtained, its dissemination and frantic discussion is his subsequent delight. There is no duty imposed upon him by the circumstances of life that is permitted, for one moment, to interfere with his enjoyment of a sensation newly acquired. He marshals its main incidents with dramatic skill, and rolls its minutest detail under his tongue like a sweet morsel.

There are many remarkable traits in his totally diabolical character. He may grow weary of his ordinary vocations. At times life may seem to him flat, stale, and unprofitable, and not worth the grinding ordeal through which most people pass, but he is never too cynical and exhausted to hunt down a new victim. Once start the hue and cry, and, like a sleuth-hound released from the leash, he becomes the incarnation of intensified life. His jade eye flashes with rekindled fires, and his pen is like a mechanism of perpetual motion.

Not all his discoveries and triumphs are achieved by straightforward exertion. No criminal detective of wide local fame is more cunning than he in unraveling a problem wherein concealed guilt may lie, or, what is quite to his purpose, the semblance of it. Day and night, at all hours, and in all companies, will he patiently seek a clew to the mystery that annoys him. He will probe it completely in his own good time, come what may, and in defiance of any efforts to circumvent him. On the trail of a hidden scandal he is remorseless and unerring. There is no treachery he will not be guilty of, no artifice he will not resort to, and no subtlety he will not employ in the hope of accomplishing his purpose. In a pursuit of this description he is invincible.

"I like to gamble with a poor man," remarked a famous Duke; "when he loses it hurts him so." A similar spirit animates the ogre of society. If he finds it delicious to pervade social gatherings, like a plague, and scatter seed broadcast that grow up to poisonous life, this sometimes becomes tame by comparison. His supreme gratification is to steal to the hearthstone where innocence and happiness dwell, and with the sympathetic reluctance of a pitying Samaritan, breathe into the ear of an unsuspecting sister words of dread import that all the years of life will not quell. This is his master stroke of malignance. He watches every quiver and pang of the pierced quarry as the matrons of Rome marked the agonies of dying gladiators. And then he departs, soothing his meager outline of a soul with the reflection that, in addition to the rapture of the affair, he has actually performed a righteous deed.

Some feminine reader, whose thoughts of the male sex are tinged with generosity and romance, may pronounce this pen picture overdrawn, and, at all events, demand of what practical use it is to indulge in such bitter abuse of a mere unthinking man. The picture will care for itself, for the living and moving model of it is to be seen wherever the sunshine and shadows of social life fall. He lives and breathes, and in contrast to honorable men is like the noxious reptile that coils beneath the budding rose. When the long-continued development of his detestable qualities has reached the climax of evolution, he is as hateful a thing as ever intruded into civilized homes. He deserves to be delineated that he may be known at a glance; to be mercilessly excoriated, that he may reap scorn and contempt; to be held up in his most revolting colors, that all who detect his presence may shun him as they would a lurking basilisk. He is the lowest of his sex—baser than the street tramp, whose manly characteristics may be blunted, but are not always destroyed. There is nothing in his whole composition that admits of apology or extenuation; there is nothing to respect, nothing to admire, nothing to excite pity or regard. He is simply a cold-blooded, malicious being, as destitute of charitable instincts as a rattlesnake is. It is a repulsive task to even discuss his abnormal weakness. The advocates of the doctrine of total depravity will find in him a living exemplification of their sombre theory. It is philanthropy and expediency combined to lash him with a whip of scorpions, in the vain endeavor to partly counteract his crime.

Persons who have suffered at any time from the malevolence of this odious monstrosity will find the present article of great value if cut out and preserved.

Man carries under his hat a private theatre, wherein a greater drama is acted than is ever performed on the mimic stage, beginning and ending in eternity.

What is even poverty itself that man should murmur under it? It is but as the pain of piercing a maiden's ear and you hang precious jewels in the wound.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $1 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, {
 FRED. M. SOMERS, { Editors.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1879.

The Republican County Committee, after hibernating through a rather severe political winter, is showing some signs of returning consciousness. It has put forth a manifesto, and informs the party, among other things, that "the air is instinct with the breath of victory"—whatever that may mean—and that in consequence of this circumstance a primary election will be called, and a strict party ticket put up for municipal officers at the ensuing election. This seems to be dealing with the municipal question much in the old way, and if any real reforms are to be attempted or expected from such a system, it must be upon the theory that the hair of the dog is good for the bite. In matters of national politics, no doubt Republicans in California are in favor of acting with their brethren in the East, and upon national affairs they will act with the national party. But what bearing have national questions upon the local concerns of San Francisco? Suppose the Democrats of South Carolina do use tissue paper for ballots, does that prove that a Republican is a safer man to act as Supervisor from the Twelfth Ward of this city than a Democrat? We ask because we reside in the Twelfth Ward, and our own interests are directly involved. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that Mr. P. B. Cornwall and his associates are correct in the statement that "the air is instinct with the breath of victory," does that prove that the Republican Superintendent of our streets, for example, is performing that duty better than a Democrat would do it? We think not, and we believe that the average Republican agrees with us. Now, what the Republican voter wants is less party glorification and better local government; less twaddle about "marching to the music of the Union," and one and a quarter instead of two and a quarter per cent. as the annual rate of taxation. Can Mr. P. B. Cornwall and his associates show us how to bring that about? Will his primary election produce it? We gravely doubt that such will be the effect. We have had primary elections in this city for twenty-nine years, and for twenty-nine years our municipal government has steadily been growing worse. If Mr. Cornwall and his committee can give us better men to vote for, men of higher ability and sounder reputation, he can get the votes of the Republicans of this city for his ticket; but, if he cannot, no matter how much he may rant about "the music of the Union," his ticket will be defeated. Whatever else may be in the air, we can tell him that that is, and that if the Democrats or any other organization put up a better municipal ticket than the Republicans, that better ticket will be elected; and in such case, if "the air be ever so instinct with the breath of victory," it will not do the Republican County Committee any practical good, for it will not be their victory.

The Republican State Central Committee has likewise had a meeting. We are glad to see that it is ready to go to hard and legitimate work, leaving the field of grandiloquent flapping to the more sentimental County Committee. If the State of California is to be governed by a Republican administration for the next four years, there is plenty of work to be done, and they can not get about it any too soon. The people must be divided upon the real issues of the day, and marshaled in line like with like. Heterogeneity must cease, and men who think alike must be brought together. Those who favor Kearneyism are going to vote the Kearney ticket. All who oppose that idea ought to be got to vote the other. The position of the Republican party in California at this moment is one of not a little delicacy, and requires the best wisdom and judgment in its councils. We have already reached a point from which we can overlook the coming canvass sufficiently to know that the struggle lies between the Republican party and the followers of Denis Kearney. It is no longer disguised that this man has, so far as California is concerned, attained the leadership of one of the two political parties, into which all free communities in modern times naturally divide themselves. How permanent this leadership may prove it is needless at this time to inquire. It is certain that it will continue till the next election—and till the next election is as far as political foresight ever attempts to penetrate. To those who think that the success of Kearney and his malcontents would be a calamity to our State we address ourselves, with our views as to the best method of warding off this evil. Our remedy is, for the party to lay aside all concealment and false pretense on the question of corporations and their interests, and to declare a policy with respect to them that it is willing to stand by and maintain. The trouble during the last few years has been that both of the old parties—as well the Democratic as the Republican—have pursued systematically a crooked, and even dishonest, course with respect to the railroads and other corporations. Inasmuch as both parties have always contained a considerable number of voters upon each side of this question, platform-makers and political managers have thought it prudent, in the interest of party success, to make the people believe that they were hostile to the corporations, and at the same time to endeavor to keep in favor with such rich and powerful influences as best they could. The consequence has been that in all the political campaigns the enemies of corporations have had the platform to amuse themselves with, while the corporations, as a rule, have, in return for their influence, been rewarded by the more substantial services of the officers when elected; resulting, as might have been foreseen, in charges of broken pledges, and even corruption and bribery; while the growth of distrust has been steady and continuous, until at last nobody believes in the good faith or honesty of any man seeking an office.

Now this is all wrong. Why may it not be just as honest, and as patriotic, and as statesmanlike to support corporations as to oppose them, always provided the candidate openly announces before the election what course he intends to pursue? Is it not, after all, only a matter of opinion, and nothing more? The managers of the great corporations in this State are citizens like the rest of us, with just as much interest in the public welfare as any, and need good government and honest officials more than the great mass of their fellow-citizens. They are the largest tax-payers in the State, and suffer the most by improvident or dishonest official action. They would naturally, it seems to us, prefer the offices to be filled with the very best men in the community, always provided those men could be depended upon not to be hostile to their interests when once elected. And this would be the case if all candidates would only openly avow their real purposes before election, for then the candidates supporting corporations and intending to be friendly to them would be chosen from among the best men on that side of the question; and surely there must be as good men on that side as on the other. But in the past both parties have conceded that a man who was known to be friendly to corporations must be defeated anyhow, and, desiring party success beyond all things, have chosen their candidates in many cases from the sneaking time-servers and still-hunting element, selecting those who were all things to all men and true to none. Now, it seems to us a self-evident fact that a man who conceals his opinions or purposes upon so important a matter as the rights and interests of corporations, in order to get elected by deception practiced upon voters, is sure to be unworthy when elected. He may, and most likely will, stand by the corporations when they are in power, but is not to be depended upon if they are ever in real need; and besides, at best he is a bad servant, for he is necessarily a dishonest man, and is likely to join any scheme of public plunder that presents an opportunity of private gain. And is it not obvious to the most casual observer that the time when this sort of deception can be practiced has gone by? It should never have been commenced. We think we can see that the enemies of corporations no longer believe in the good faith of either of the old parties on this subject, and that, disbelieving, they have gone over to Kearney and the sand-lot, where they think their views are earnestly taught, and will be honestly carried out. The Democratic party has been destroyed, at least for the present. All the anti-corporationists have left it and joined Kearney, or will do so before election day. Now, is it not certain that all Democrats who sympathize with the corporations will come to the Republican party, and act with it in September next? It seems so to us.

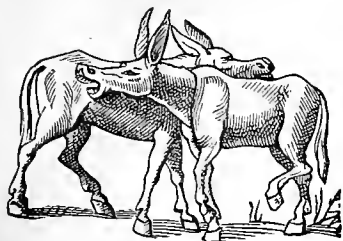

Such being the frozen truth, why is not the logical and sensible course for the party to pursue to put forward the best men to be found, on a platform taking ground squarely in favor of sustaining the railroads and other corporations against any effort to put them under the regulations of a hostile and unfriendly Legislature; and go before the people on an honest statement of their purposes and fight it out on that line. True, it is possible that defeat may be the result. But is it not better to be defeated struggling for what we believe in than elected under a false pretense? That is always supposing that, as a party, we really believe in such a course, which it certainly seems to us that we do. But what we desire above all things is to see the party come out in broad day and state its position, and at the same time provide for carrying out its views if it comes into power. And if the party is really, as some allege, hostile to corporations, let it so decide and we shall acquiesce without hesitation. Some of the best men in this State have been shelved by the Republican party, not because they were favorable to railroads, but because it was known they were favorable to railroads. These men had spoken out their true sentiments, and were rendered unavailable by it, to the great delight and continuous success of the undying race of sneaks and still hunters. If it even resulted in the election of the anti-corporationists, the party and the people, perhaps even the corporations—in the long run—would be better served than they now are, for there are among them many excellent men who are trying to do right, but it does not work that way. They, too, having taken sides, are accounted unavailable, and shelved to make way for the sneaks of another set or following. Let the Republican party take sides and fling out its colors. It makes no difference to us which side it takes, but let it take sides. It is not improbable that a majority of the party are really against corporations. If so, then take that side, say we. But above all things, take one side or the other. Let our platform express the principles we agree upon in unmistakable terms, and let us see to it that the candidates are on that side as well.

At last Congress has taken hold of the Chinese question in earnest, and if the Senate acts as resolutely and as promptly in the business as did the House, the ball we set in motion many years ago will, before the 4th of March, have rolled on to a crowning victory. It is seldom indeed that any individual reformer is able to witness in his own lifetime the complete and final triumph of the principles he was the first to announce to the world, and if we, upon this occasion, indulge in some little self-gratulation for our success in saving, as we have done, the civilization of the country from this Asiatic curse, we are sure our fellow-citizens will not begrudge us a pleasure so honestly earned. It will be remembered—for it is not so very long ago—with what a howl of indignation the supporters of Chinese immigration received the honest outburst of a heart too full almost for the utterance of temperate language when we stated, as we did in the face of the world, that rather than permit this curse to be perpetuated we would apply the torch to the steamships that carried it on. That statement went forth, and was received as the battle-cry of the new crusade. It has been repeated by a thousand imitators, in a thousand forms, and, at last, that which was conceived in the brain of one man has been adopted by the representatives of forty millions of men. We wisely accepted aid from whithersoever it was offered. Peter the Hermit had his Walter the Penniless, and no doubt looked upon his beggarly aid-de-camp always with contempt and often with disgust, as we do with Denis Kearney. But Walter, no doubt, had his uses. He had brazen lungs; he had feet that required no shoes; and a certain amount of ranting and howling is necessary to place the best cause before the people. But when all was finished, history acknowledged the gentleman to have been the true apostle of the great movement, and the name of the blackguard is only known to the more careful student of ancient lore. What reward a grateful people will bestow upon us for stopping the Mongolian immigration it is not yet known with absolute certainty. Most likely the office of Governor under the new constitution will be offered. But that involves a residence in Sacramento—a thing difficult to one of our tastes and habits. When we were younger, and less annoyed by dirt and discomfort, the thing would not have been absolutely impossible. We remember well when we wore a blue flannel shirt and baked our own slapjacks, but we were under two and twenty. And what is not possible to youth? We are older now, and can not endure so much. Our reward will, of course, be commensurate with our work, for a grateful nation will not be gainsaid in its resolve to do us justice, but we trust it will take some other form than that. In the meantime, happy in the consciousness of having wrought a great work, and secure in the good will of the present and the admiration of future generations, we shall rest content let come what may.

Republicans throughout the State are already casting about for gubernatorial and Congressional timber. For the first named office the party in the interior seems to be turning its attention most pointedly toward Honorable George S. Evans, of San Joaquin. Mr. Evans is eminently sound upon all questions that concern the public, and his nomination would give pleasure to us personally and to our patrons. The names of Honorable Horace Davis, Honorable George C. Perkins, and General John F. Miller have been announced as positive candidates for the same place, and their well known conservative views would entitle them to a just consideration at the hands of the Convention. The highest interests of the State would doubtless be subserved by the election of either. For Congress, one or the other of the last named three gentlemen will, in our judgment, be selected. In the event of Mr. Davis not being nominated for Governor, we take it for granted he will be entitled to the indorsement of a renomination for the position he now holds.

PRATTLE.

It is Mrs. Windle who smites the harp loudest this week, in reply to the self-proclaimed conundrum, "What is soul?" To this formidable challenge she has a quantity of answers ready, and she fires them off right bravely, to the unspeakable wrecking of the public intellect and dispersion of the public faculties. Frexample:

"Soul?—The heart you breathe in nature,
Else she had not been,
And her glassing back the feature—
Your without within."

These are noble lines; there are none like them in Shelley. Had Coleridge written them he had been amazed. Even I, pinnacled upon the skymost extreme of Parnassus, with the shades of Shakspeare, Dante, Camoëns, and that crowd, quarreling with Hector Stuart and Bill Pollock for the best places at my feet, have been unable to match them with anything better than this:

Soul?—The part that when you eat your Poet-meal—a critic, fried—
Pitches (through your singing-feature)
Your inside outside.

"The substitution of greenbacks for national bank notes will be the great issue of the next Presidential contest, and as for me, I shall be found on the side of the People."—Senator Jones.

Whenever the terrible struggle's at hand
Of Wheedle-de-bluff against Wheedle-de-blund,
As loyal as e'er to the Pole was the Needle,
You'll find me upholding the standard of Wheedle.

So much for the future—now bear what I think
Of Twaddle-de-worry and Twaddle-de-wink:
On this current question the People, please God, 'll
Ne'er find me deserting the banners of Twaddle.

On Monday last the Constitutional Convention did a wise thing and a foolish one. It struck out of the Bill of Rights a declaration binding the State to remain in the Union forever, under any and all circumstances; that was the wise thing. Such a declaration would never prevent secession, if secession should ever seem right and expedient, but it would give to the act an odious character of bad faith, and the "cause" would be heavily handicapped from the start. The declaration was a piece of ineffable nonsense designed to war-warm the cooling cockles of the Northern heart, and restore the wasted virility of that once lusty sentiment, "Our country, right or wrong"—than which, from his abounding loyalty, that austere patriot, the Hon. Mr. Satan, did never evolve so base a political creed.

The foolish act of Monday's session was the retention of the clause permitting juries to determine the law as well as the fact in trials for libel—an exceptional favor to men of the press to which they have no kind of claim, and which those of them who are honest reluctantly accept. This unique privilege had its origin in the British Parliament. It was intended to serve a temporary purpose in foiling a tyranny which only a peculiar state of the laws made possible just then in England, and which was never possible in America. The odious provision is a mere survival. It had long outlasted its necessity at home when it was adopted here with the same blind and blundering deference to the "wisdom of our ancestors" which makes us still hang our criminals on a Friday and find a verdict of "temporary insanity" when some phlegmatic citizen puts himself to death with conspicuous prudence, foresight, provident regard for the rights of dependents, and punctilious observance of the customary ceremonial rites.

It is easy enough to understand how a now needless law may survive, even for ages, in the country of its origin, through mere indifference or neglect; but how men of fair average intelligence can deliberately import and incorporate into their own legal system laws which are not only needless but unjust, disserviceable, mischievous, inept, and offensive, transcends comprehension. It would be no more pigheaded in us, needing immigration, to send our ships abroad for the living and the dead alike.

From the inaugural address of a President of the nation down to the superfluous buttons on the back of a coat, life is full of these survivals—customs, manners, and things, which had once a practical utility or meaning, but now exist only by sufferance of that dogged lack of thought which so nobly distinguishes human reason from brute instinct. Fix your attention where you will, cast your glance in whatever direction, and you discern something for whose existence there is no better justification than that it existed heretofore. It may be a religious rite, like turning the palms upward in prayer, downward in benediction. It may be a mannerism in art, as an actor opening a stage letter strikes it smartly with his fingers to dislodge the sand supposed to have been used in blotting. It may be a social ceremony, like mentioning what was once of capital interest to naked savages—the weather. It may be an office of dignity, as that of surgeon to a regiment of militia. It may be a literary fashion, like writing poetry in "lines," although pronunciation is now so uniform, and metre so well observed, that it would sing itself. Or perhaps it is some material object, like the battlements on a cottage, the band on a silk hat, or General Howard, of Los Angeles, in the politics of this State.

Silkskin is penniless and brainless, but being handsome and amusing is adored by the callow belles of society, and has naturally a lofty opinion of his own worth. Said Chaffwell to him, the other day, mentioning the name of a beautiful, cultivated, and wealthy woman, the wife of one of our most eminent men: "Silkie, my boy, they say she is just savagely enamored of you, and gives herself dead away whenever your name is mentioned in her hearing." "My dear fellow, I beg you to dismiss the belief if you entertain it. You little know the nature of that woman, and I am not myself so conceited an ass as to mistake the character of her preference. It is not love, mon enfant, it is not love. It is ambition."

Concluding an account of the dreadful plague of the fourteenth century, in which 70,000,000 lives are believed to have been lost by the disease, a contemporary tranquilly remarks: "Fortunately for the race such terrible scenes will never be witnessed again." In these unholy days one can not, of course, prophesy to advantage unless one is an editor and an idiot; but it really seems as if one might be taken in band early and taught how to be an editor and an idiot without prophesying.

I observe, by the way, that the German and Austrian governments have determined to shut out the plague by establishing a cordon of troops along their entire frontier. I don't altogether approve of large standing armies, but it is only fair to mention this advantage they have over the slender military establishment beloved of the tax-payer. It would be merry to see—what's-his-name—our Secretary of War drawing a thin blue line of brigadier-generals and quartermasters along our northern border to keep off the belly-ache.

Dim, grim, and silent as a ghost,
The sentry occupied his post,
To all the stirrings of the night
Alert of ear and sharp of sight.
A sudden something—sight or sound,
About, above, or underground,
He knew not what, nor where—ensued,
Thrilling the sleeping solitude.
The soldier cries: "Halt! Who goes there?"
The answer came: "Death—in the air."
"Advance, Death—give the countersign."
"I can't." "Then just approach that line—
By G—, I'll take your life!" "What! what!"
Cries Death—"You dare me? I'll be shot
If I don't cross that line!" "You'll be Shot if you do, my lad," said he.
To change his tone Death thought it wise—
Reminded him they'd been allies
Against the Russ, the Frank, the Turk,
In many a bloody bit of work.
"In short," said he, "in ev'ry weather
You and I've done business together."
The soldier wouldn't let him pass—
"Go back," he growled, "you tiresome ass—
Go back and rest till the next war,
Nor kill by methods all abhor—
Miasma, famine, filth, and vice,
With plagues of locusts, plagues of lice,
Foul food, foul water, and foul gases,
Rank exhalations from morasses.
If you employ such low allies
This business you'll vulgarize.
Renouncing then the field of fame
To wallow in a waste of shame,
I'll prostitute my strength, and lurk
About the country doing work—
These hands to labor I'll devote,
Nor cut, by Heaven, another throat!"

I wonder if it ever occurred to any of the Eastern theatre managers who are complaining so loudly of the ruinous exactions of "star" actors that they need not comply with these exactions unless they wish. These lackwit loobies, the managers, go into an open market, make their own bargains, fail, and then charge the result of their business incompetence upon a "pernicious system" which nobody has encouraged but themselves. If they continue to make disastrous contracts that is their affair; we shall bear their losses with a fortitude which if it do not win their esteem shall at least command their admiration.

Observe, O manager, our grit—
Let him cry out who's baredest hit.
The "stellar system" you pursue
Lies as sea stars, but it makes you.
The difference is—the stars you're eying
Are brighter and more wildly flying.

The following "Cuticles of Cannibal," or "Follicles of Calabash," by Mr. Afflicter A. Spewart, are warranted. If they do not suit they can be exchanged at this office for "Canticles of Caliban"—in manuscript—by a writer of similar name and fame: The Poet thinketh the four-bit piece redeemable, for if after many days he returneth the one you loaned him he expecteth back another. Whoso taketh a dinner every day hath not duly considered that the gorged buzzard doth not sing; but the Poet's vacuity maketh a pleasant noise. When the Poet findeth a hole in the lining of his vest-pocket the days of that garment are numbered; for it is so that he rendeth it many ways asunder for the possible dime. There is silence in the temple of laws, and a noise of the going of pens, while the poet complaineth that he has dashed off something; but lo! when he hath departed there are heard the voice of a reader and the sound of sin. Folly affecteth a modest manner, but Genius toppeth himself with a smoking-cap, parteth his collar, and saith, Behold! I am Byron. The poet visitationeth the country editor, and saith, Verily, I have written for thee these many years without reward; give me now, I beseech thee, the shameless puff, that thy readers may know it is poetry, else they will say unto thee, This is damstuff—stop my paper. And it is so. The Poet standeth before the mirror and shouteth, Here's luck!—but the goblet hath nothing in it; wherefore he writeth, The flagon flows with the rich red wine. A chew of tobacco payeth the Poet, but a fire-cracker disguised as an editorial cigarette maketh trouble.

CLARA S. FOLTZ, ATTORNEY.

"A lady's admitted to practice, I've heard."
"To practice? No, no, to profess is the word;
In law and religion, O learned brother,
Profession is one thing, and practice another."

Thursday last was the day set apart by common consent of good Christians throughout the country for public prayer for the public schools and all institutions of learning. The exercises in this city at the Church of St. Ciprico were of an unusually interesting character. They began with singing by the choir, composed of Mr. E. S. Carr, Jr., the Misses Nagle, Mr. John Moore, and others who, singing veiled, were not recognized. They gave with fine effect the famous hymn beginning—

"Ewald had some little lambs;
He fleeced 'em in a row;
They went each year to San Rafael,
For a new fleece to grow."

The Rev. Mr. Ewald himself then sang—

"There were ninety and nine that safely paid,"

And made a few thoughtful remarks on school reform for the instruction of the Almighty whose aid they were about to invoke. At this point the State Superintendent arose and protested that the divine aid was not required—his Deputy would "see the right thing done;" and Professor Herbst sarcastically replied that the Deputy would at least work by the divine method, for, like God, "she moofs in a mysdereows vay her vonders to bervorm." The State Superintendent's infidel proposition being thus summarily slain by the whimsical buffoonery of a Dutch imagination the whole pious congregation joined in prayer. They preyed on one another.

"If I show my face all the thieves will withdraw,
As imps fly the bishop's crozier,"
Says Kearney. "But, Denis, you darent—the law
Prohibits indecent exposure."

Dr. Stivers, the police surgeon, has for some months been dangerously ill from blood-poisoning, but is now convalescent. In overhauling the dead body of a white woman, the doctor had the bad luck to impale his paw on a broken bone, and after cutting up a Chinaman next day he observed that he had a hand that appeared to be qualifying itself for spanking a young giant. He explains that the virus of the Chinamen must have got into his wound. Doctor, I don't like to bother you, but if your medical judgment is not colored by your political aspirations, and if your skill in diagnosis is not the slave of your race prejudices, perhaps you will have the goodness to state whose wound the virus of the white woman got into. True, the Chinese must go—I know that. The important question is: Shall the white women remain?

It strikes me that this matter (I don't mean the virus) would work into verse tolerably well, under some such title as

ASSIMILATION.
A doctor cutting up, one day,
John Chinaman's abandoned clay
Got, in a scratch upon his hand
(Just how he did not understand),
Some poison from the dear dissected,
Whereby the man was much affected.
But ere he yielded up the ghost
He made this ante mortem boast:
For civic fame, no doubt, desirous,
And swol'n with vanity and virus:
"Behold!" he cried, "O statesmen, see
The Chinese problem solved by me,
They need not 'go' (tis hot, I vow Where this d— beggar's gone to!)
Take 'em in hand; I've shown you how
To absorb them—if you want to."

If Congress passes the bill limiting the number of Chinese passengers a vessel may bring into this port, it ought to be entitled: "An Act to Compel Ship-Building." It is clear the "merchant marine" must be vastly increased.

W. H. L. U.

"O, I love the soldier's life," sings he
And he rubs up his epaulets,
And his long-bright sabre whets;
"But the soldier's death is what worries me."
"Yes, I love the soldier's life, but I wish
That the enemy didn't, too,
For he takes it without ado;
And that is the reason I'm State Milish."

Joe Emmet, the Dutch dialect man, has been committed to an insane asylum at last. Mr. Emmet's peculiar hallucination is that he is an actor.

FATHER CARTER.

A Californian Preacher of the Early Days.

Father Carter was a "hardshell" Baptist preacher. His youth had been spent in the mountains of Carolina. For many years he had not given much promise that his later years would be spent in the clerical profession. He had not indeed paid much attention to religion of any kind, until in a moment of deep emotion he had prayed, and become, to use his own language, "a new critter." His theological attainments were limited; they did not extend beyond the discussion of the question of immersion. His argument on all occasions was, "He went down into and came up out of the water," and this he would hurl at the heads of his adversaries in argument with the evident conviction in his own mind it was a settler. If it failed the first time, he gathered his stone from the brook, and encountered the Goliath with it again and again. His adversaries were generally forced to yield, at least they were silenced. He was fond of argument—a great controversialist, if not very logical. If his premises were true, if his exegesis of the Bible correct, then it was useless to debate with him at all. He was not always exact in quotation, and sometimes muddled his ideas; but that was the opinion of his enemies, and therefore not entitled to serious consideration. It is reported of him that after his immersion he forced his way into a large concourse with a Bible under his arm, and exclaimed: "I am ready to discuss." At one time living in Oregon, he would insist on arguing with Bishop Scott of the Protestant Episcopal Church of that diocese, until the Bishop even, one of the most genial and self-sacrificing gentlemen in the world, became wearied. One day the Bishop, in reply to his favorite argument, said to him:

"Father Carter, suppose a man was immersed in water all except a small spot on his forehead, would he be baptized?"

"No," replied Father Carter, indignantly.

"But suppose you covered the spot, would he then?"

"Yes," said the old man.

"Well," said the Bishop, "that's just what we do, and, of course, the candidate is baptized."

Father Carter hung his head for a moment as if in deep reflection, and then slowly replied:

"Well, Mr. Scott, that's something wrong about your argimint, but I don't 'zactly see whar it is."

He had but one idea; it became part of his being; it was incorporated in his very nature. He was an enthusiast on the subject of "immersion," and being strong in his own convictions, earnest and decided in expressing them, he influenced others. He gathered around him disciples, even men of higher cultivation than himself. They saw an ignorant man, but an earnest one, and earnestness always has its power. His preaching was an extraordinary compound of emotion, sense, nonsense, misquotation, and confusion of ideas. He certainly put into practice his belief in the right of individual interpretation. His preaching would astonish any city congregation, but it was at least stirring in its character. In the woods, and under the giant trees, and in the log school-houses of California, where he was brought into contact with minds as rude and uninformed as his own, it was that then his emotional nature met a response and carried his audiences with him. A favorite sermon of his he called his "eagle" sermon, and was from a text in Deuteronomy: "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them." The writer once heard it, and its general tenor is indelibly imprinted on his mind. After a long-continued preliminary exercise, he began:

"My friends, thar is menny kinds of eagles. They are singular birds—that is, they is quare birds. Thar is the gray eagle, with white bars on his head; thar is the bald eagle ditto, who goes about like a roarin' lion seeking what he may eat up. Thar is the grand old American eagle, whaflops his wings and flies over all creation; and I hev hearn tell of a double-hedder, an Austrian, but I never seed one, and I don't believe thar is one—though that don't signify, fur some of you uns might say you hadn't never seed God, consequently thar wurnt none. But thar is nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"Now I onct knowed an eagle—that is, I knowed on him—and her, too, fur thar wur two on 'em, a big rooster eagle and a hen eagle. It wur in the big mountings of Caroliny; and thar they pitched their tents in a tall and towering pine—right in the top—and it hung over a deep purciple, whar it wur in danger of being participated down the purciple when the 'loud-winds did roar on Caroliny's shore.' But it wurnt; fur He calleth His sheep by name, and they foller Him, and the desert blossoms like a rose, and the barren are better than them that beareth children—nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"Wal, these here eagles pitched their tent in this waste, howling wilderness, whar they wur as lonely as a solitary snipe in dog-days—down on Coyote Creek, down thar—and the dear little babes in the woods which wur covered by the robin-redbreasts, who sung their funeral hymn. Thar they wur, whar they builded their nests and sot to hatchin' out their chicks.

"Now, when these eagles struck that are spot they went thair whole pile on it; fur it was to thair taste, and it looked as if it had the color big. Fust, they got whar there wur two cross-limbs; then they brought big sticks, and laid 'em carefully round and round until it begun to look sorter like a big balloon careening in the sky, only it was on to a tree; then they put in littler sticks, and littler and littler till bime-by it wur small and compact like. Then they got all the wool, and down, and moss, and soft things, and put 'em down into the bottom, and on the sides of its inside, and made it smooth, and warm, and comfortable like—like unto the man whar filled his barns, and told his soul to be easy and take things nateral like—and laid thair eggs thar—but fur the terrible voice that said: 'Fool, this night thy soul shall be'—that is, he wur to die that very night, and all his nice things wouldn't be enay more use to him—though they wurnt hurt, fur thair eggs were hatched and all thair young uns came out with nary a single feather on them—nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"Wal, these eagles and thair young uns in thair fine home, and had on soft clothing like John the Immerser wandering in the wilderness, whar they wur in kings' houses—and the big uns fed 'em, as parients feed thair little uns—though thar's a commandment agin stealing, which the eagles have to do, but it's thair natur; though that don't signify, fur a man's natur is to steal sumtimes, and he's got to fite agin that natur; fur when I would do good, evil is present—and a man ain't an eagle-bird by chance—nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"When the eagles grew up and had feathers—that is, when they came to the age of 'countability, which is expected of boys and girls like, though eagles' natur is different—then the old eagles wanted them to fly abroad and mount up on wings of eagles, and jine the song that floats around the throne. And that's whar the text begins; fur that's the way the Father up yonder wants us to do when we reach the age of 'countability—to fly upward—to fly upward and jine the band in the narrer way and pass through the strait gate. But they didn't like to leave home, and thair kinned, and thair parients, and seek a country like unto the good old Abraham—

"Whar, oh, whar is the good old Abraham?
Whar, oh, whar is the good old Abraham?
Whar, oh, whar is the good old Abraham?
Safe in the promised land!"

"not knowing whither he went; though we know not whar it is He wants us to go, 'that land of pure delight.' So the rooster eagle gits right among them, and kicks right and left, and stirs 'em, and they begin to feel an awful stirring and want to git away—fur he stirreth up the nest; and sometimes we are stirred up, and the power of sin is felt, and we begin to feel the hot air from below rushin' up like the air from a register—which by the same isn't used in this beautiful land of Californy,

"Whar the wild flowers bloom
All the year round!"

"and hear the devils cry: 'That's my game!' and feel old Satan a grippin' at us; and we git a kind o' scared like, fur he is stirring up his nest; but that ain't enough. We crawl up like the baby eagles and look down, and see the dark purciple; we look up and don't see nothing to stand on up thar, fur we ain't reconciled; and we look around, and the old scurvy pine-tree seems better than nothing, and so they settle down in the soft wool, and down, and comfortable things, and don't think of flying upward whar the bright waters flow, and the rivers of waters clear as crystal, and the tree that shadders the airth, and whar thar's

"Rest fur the weary!
Rest fur the weary!
Rest fur me!"

"and we air afeered to try, because, like the young eagles, we feel we are weak and like little babies in good, and fold our hands and say: 'A little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands, when I have a convenient season I'll send fur thee, fur almost thou persuadest me. We haven't tried our feathers yet—our pinions ain't strong—to-morrer may be too late, fur the smoke of thair torment is like unto a weaver's shuttle, it endureth but a little time and then it is gone, and whar are you then? Nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"Then the old eagle goes off and 'fluttereth over her young,' and that brings us to the second pint of our discourse. 'She fluttereth,' she flosses her wings, like unto as you have seen a hawk just gitting ready to pounce down upon a poor field-mouse—though it ain't like that neither, for the hawk flutters in wrath, but the eagle flutters over her young uns in love. Brethren and sisters, she flutters in love just like when you see your dear little ones a treading of the downward path, and your heart flutters and flutters because you're afraid; and she goes above the nest and hollers squawk, which when you holler you means to tell 'em to 'take keer,' 'take keer,' only the bird's talk is not like our talk; and they hear that voice, and creep onto the sides of the nest, and see thair fond parients a-flopping of thair wings, and cry with thair little pecked voice peck—which means father dear and mother dear, I like to foller you; fur

"I'm bound fur the land of Canaan!
I'm bound fur the land of Canaan!
I'm bound fur the land of Canaan!
Fur it is my happy bome."

"And they'd like to foller thair father eagle and thair mother eagle as they mount up and look at the shining sun without blinking thair eyes, fur they say that's our eagles' natur—and it's strange how often natur comes in—but a man like unto you and I can't; but I didn't mean these here eyes that we sec with, but the inner eyes that can

"Walk in the light!
Walk in the light!
While it is day,"

"and ain't blinked by the glory, and the shining, and the brightness no more than them thar eagles; but they sec 'em floating on nothing, and don't know they hev got wings and the air can hold 'em up, so they cry peck, which means as before said, and look out and want to fly, but they dussent. Brethren and sisters, they dussent, and only see the soft down, and the nice wool, and the good things in thair home here on the airth, and so they snuggle down like unto a man on a cold morning in his bed, while the birds all are a-singing, and all nature is a-carousing the song:

"Early to bed and early to rise,
Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise."

"And he's got to stir 'em agin. Nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"So he gits into thair nest, and begins to pick away thair soft things. Fust he takes away thair wool, and cotton, and moss out, and

"The cold wind doth blow,
And if they have snow,
What will the eagles do then, poor things?"

"And the little eagles feel the hair, and the moss, and the twigs underneath ain't as good as the wool and the down, and they look up and want to fly; but they dussent, though they git very oneasy—they dussent until they begins to think hair and twigs better than

"The river filled with blood, Whar saints immortal reign."

"And that's jist so if we won't fly upward. Then He takes our good things away—our money, our goods, our chattels, our houses, our farms, our mines, the water that fills our ditches, the gold lead in our claim runs out, and thar ain't the first nugget left. Even then we don't give in, and He takes the little branches away. Oh, my friend, it is sad when He takes the little branches away! But they go, then all we cling to, like them little eagles with thair feet a clinging to the last big stick that war put thar by the big eagles fur a foundation fur thair nest. The eagle hath stirred her nest, she hath fluttered over her young—and that brings us to the third pint of our discourse.

"And now, my dear friends, what does she do? Look, bretheren and sisters, what does she do? Spreadeth abroad her wings. Thar she is right up in the sky, her wings stretched like the shadder of a mighty rock in a dry land. Thar below is the little eagles a-standing on the last stick, the last prop, holdin' on with thair tremblin' feet like grim death, while fiery billows roll beneath, afeared to fly, afeared to stay, afeared to do anything, afeared not to do something, knowing thar is a deep purciple, whar the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched; knowing thar is a place whar the streets run with milk and honey, and whar thar's no weepin', no mourning, no gnashing thair teeth; knowing they hain't got nothing here, nor won't have nothing thar unless they stir themselves and fly upward. Oh, my friends, jist think on it! Why don't they fly upward? Thar they tremble, and shiver, and cry, and want to fly but dussent—waiting fur a convenient season which never comes; and thar above all is the old eagle a-spreadin' abroad of her wings and looking down to see if they won't do something—like men and wimen, instead of jist staying thar like marble statues to be wafted about by every breeze; and thar she is a-spreadin' abroad her wings, until at last she gives one great squawk of wrath, and flosses down on the whole brood, and knocks the last pin from under 'em. And whar are they? Yes, and whar are you, my bretheren and sisters? Whar are you? Some a-fluttering like wounded doves down, down to the lake whar they cry for a drop of water to cool the parched tongue, whar Lazarus was in poor Dives' bosom—or a-mounting up on wings of eagles, whar they shall run and not get weary, whar they shall walk and not faint. Nevertheless, notwithstanding fur which.

"And that brings us to the fourth pint of our discourse, which is He taketh 'em. And thar's different ways of taking things. Thar's people with mighty takin' ways, and thar's officers whar takes you to jail; and thar's boys that takes apples and peaches, which things they oughten; and thar's people whar takes you in—which isn't meant for the good uns which take strangers in and takes keer on 'em—like unto the Gommorians when Lot's wife was took into the house like a pillar of salt and divided into four quarters and sent into the land of Israel, for which the anger burnt agin 'em, for the hurt of the daughter of Israel was sore.

"But He taketh them—I don't mean the eagles—and leads them to near pastures and beside still waters, whar there's no more sighing and suffering, no more weeping and parting; fur

"Parents and children thar shall meet!
Parents and children thar shall meet!
Parents and children thar shall meet!
Shall meet to part no more!
On Canaan's happy shore!"

Imagine all this uttered in the most impassioned manner, the tears at times streaming down the preacher's face, and the quotations—from psalm-book, Mother Goose, or Franklin's aphorisms—chanted with a rich full voice, and you can get a glimpse of Father Carter in his palmy days. On Father Carter's preaching days in San Andreas the public "meeting-house" would be crowded to excess. People assembled not to laugh, but to have their feelings wrought up by the manner and excitement of the preacher; and those who could not appreciate, with the exception of a few graceless scamps, would stay away. An eloquent and learned Presbyterian clergyman, who also visited that mining-camp, would collect a congregation of thirty or forty, and a Methodist, a man of culture and earnestness, would double that number; but Father Carter would "draw the boys," as he not very elegantly expressed it, in great numbers.

HEALDSBURG, CAL.

J. W. BROTHERTON.

Red lead in cayenne pepper, chromate of lead in mustard, sulphuric acid in vinegar, corrosive sublimate in pickles, prussic acid in tea, scented and colored clay in coffee, alum in bread, sand in sugar, marble dust and plaster of Paris in flour, powdered stone in soda, terra alba in cream of tartar, damaged grain in Graham meal, chalk in baking powders, arsenic and copper in the coloring of candy, creosote and salts of copper in whisky—such are only samples of some of the adulterations in food and drink pointed out, the other day, by Mr. George T. Angell, in a paper read to the American Social Science Association of Boston.

Sara Bernhardt told Mary Anderson that she slept in a coffin three years to familiarize herself with the idea of death, but lately the narrow bed had become uncomfortable. Miss Anderson says of the French actress' boudoir: "The carpet was of black velvet, and the walls were hung and the furniture covered with the same material. The skeleton of a man who died of love at Mantua hung before the mirror, with finger pointing at its own reflection. In large bowls about the room rose leaves were heaped, the fragrance from which was overpowering."

It is said that a cat, when skinned, resembles a rabbit so nearly that good judges are liable to be deceived. Buy your rabbits only from responsible dealers. Unless you prefer cats. Of course it is not for us to dictate.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, February 2, 1899.

Consomme a la Bonne Femme.
Boiled Codfish, Tongues and Sounds, Browned Butter and Parsley Sauce.
Beefsteak a la Bordelaise, Mashed Potatoes.
Salsify Fritters, Brussels Sprouts.
Roast Pork, Apple Sauce.
Celery Salad.
Lemon Pie, Preserved Ginger.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Oranges, Bananas, Figs, Prunes, and Dates.
To MAKE CONSOMME A LA BONNE FEMME.—See Vol. III, No. 1.
To COOK BEEFSTEAK A LA BORDELAISE.—Have a fine large of two small porterhouse steaks well broiled, put upon a dish, salt and pepper, cover lightly with finely minced onion and parsley (some prefer a trifle of garlic added); have a large piece of butter melted and pour on boiling hot.

INTAGLIOS.

The Children.

Do you love me, little children?
O sweet blossoms that are curled
(Life's tender morning-glories)
Round the casement of the world!
Do your hearts climb up toward me
As my own heart bends to you,
In the beauty of your dawning
And the brightness of your dew?

When the fragrance of your faces,
And the rhythm of your feet,
And the incense of your voices
Transform the sullen street,
Do you see my soul move softly
For ever where you move,
With an eye of benediction
And a guarding hand of love?

O my darlings! I am with you
In your trouble, in your play,
In your sobbing and your singing,
In your dark and in your day,
In the chambers where you nestle,
In the hovels where you lie,
In the sunlight where you blossom
And the blackness where you die.

Not a blessing broods above you
But it lifts me from the ground;
Not a thistle-bard doth sting you
But I suffer with the wound;
And a chord within me trembles
To your lightest touch or tone,
And I famish when you hunger,
And I shiver when you moan.

Can you tell me, little children,
Why it is I love you so?
Why I'm weary with the burthens
Of my sad and weary woe?
Do the myrtle and the aloes
Spring blithely from one tree?
Yet I love you, O my darlings!
Have you any flowers for me?

I have trodden all the spaces
Of my solemn years alone,
And have never felt the cooling
Of a babe's breath near my own.
But with more than father passion,
And with more than mother pain,
I have loved you, little children—
Do you love me back again?

RICHARD REALF.

Famished.

If only mothers knew, she said,
How hungry children are for love,
Above each little virgin bed
A mother's lips would prove
How sweet are kisses that are given
Between a rosy mouth and heaven.

If only my mamma would kneel,
As your dear mamma, every night,
Beside her little girl, to feel
If all the wraps are folded tight,
And hold my hands, her elbow fair
Between my cheek and her soft hair—

And looking in my dreaming eyes
As if she saw some lovely thing,
And smiling in such fond surprise
On all my hopes of life that spring
Like flowers beneath her tender gaze—
I could not stray in evil ways.

I would not wound the gentle breast
That held me warm within its fold;
My mother's love would still be best,
However sad, or plain, or old;
And even should the world forsake,
I'd love her for her love's dear sake.

To a Milkmaid.

Sprightly as a lightsome fairy,
Charming goddess of the dairy;
Maiden with the milking pail,
Listen to thy lover's wail:

"While with true love I am burning,
You're the happy day a churning;
Oh, it sometimes makes me shudder
To suspect you love an udder!
After giving me your word,
After all that has o'urd,
To keep faith you will not fail,
Maiden with the milking pail!
But I swear by my dejection,
By the cream of her complexion,
By the sun in heaven glowing,
By the kine in meadows loving,
By the gentle morning zephyr,
That no other one shall heifer,
I will have no maiden butter,
And I'll keep her when I've got her.
Yes, I'll win her, come what may—
'Where there's will, there is a way.'"

From To-day.

The past is wasted. Let it go.
The faded suns, the joys, the tears;
A desert of mixed dreams, I know,
Is paltry gain for forty years.
For all the toil, the pain, the strife,
The thoughts of fame, the hope deferred,
Only an ashen urn of dead,
And that in these no voice is heard!
Yet, quivering with the spring, the dawn
Brings melancholy flowers my way;
And something yet within me sings,
"It shall be better from to-day."

To a Scrap of Seaweed.

Neglected flower that in the ocean blooms,
Poor exile from the fragrant groves of earth,
What sorrow rises in thy salt perfumes,
To what sad thought thy humble charm gives birth!

Tossed by the tempest and the fluctuant tide,
The vulgar plaything of the slimy eel,
Crushed by the vessel's keel or cast aside,
What bitterness thy injured heart must feel?

Thy lovely sisters blush on field and lawn,
The lily, pink, and rose are kin to thee;
Yet thou art destined, from grim night till dawn,
To hide thy envy in the turbulent sea.

Alas! none know why thou wert strangely torn
From leafy woodlands and rich orchards blest,
Nor why thou shouldst not have been sweetly born
A tuberoso to grace my darling's breast—

Unless the Eternal, in His august might,
A sacred usage for thy beauty found,
And made thee to fulfill some sacred rite
Upon the ghastly foreheads of the drowned.

F. S. SALTUS.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting
Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address
of nearly Six Thousand Society People.

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

The ELITE DIRECTORY is a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

JUST PUBLISHED, AND FOR SALE BY THE PRINCIPAL
BOOKSELLERS, AND SPECIAL CANVASSERS.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.
SAN FRANCISCO SOCIETY.
RECEPTION DAYS.
CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
JEWISH ADDRESS LIST.
OAKLAND ADDRESS LIST.
PRIVATE MEMORANDA.
ARMY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
NAVY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
PERMANENT GUESTS AT HOTELS—
Palace.
Grand.
Occidental.
Lick.
Baldwin.
BAR ASSOCIATION.
ART ASSOCIATION.
LORING CLUB.
BERKELEY CLUB.
CHIT-CHAT CLUB.
CLUBS AND CLUB LIFE.
PACIFIC CLUB.
UNION CLUB.
BOHEMIAN CLUB.
OCCIDENTAL CLUB (Oakland).
SAN FRANCISCO VEREIN.
CONCORDIA.
SPANISH-AMERICAN CLUB.

OLYMPIC.
THEATRE DIAGRAMS—
California.
Baldwin.
Bush Street.
Standard.
Grand Opera House.
POINTS OF ETIQUETTE—
Introductions.
Salutations.
Calls and Calling.
Strangers in the City.
Visiting and Visiting Cards for Ladies.
For Gentlemen.
General Directions, Cards, Calling.
The Kettle-drum.
Parties, Balls, and Germans.
Dinners and Dining Out.
Breakfast, Luncheons, and Supper.
Etiquette of Weddings.
Opera and Theatre Parties.
Theatre Etiquette for Gentlemen.
Ladies' Theatre Invitations.
Miscellaneous Rules.
PERSONNEL OF THE PRESS.
CHURCH DIRECTORY.
PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
BUSINESS NOTICES.

BE SURE AND SEE A COPY

NEW

BOOKS

Brazil and Brazilians, portrayed in Historical and Descriptive Sketches. By Rev. James C. Fletcher and Rev. D. P. Kidder, D. D. Ninth edition, illustrated, revised, and brought down to date. 8vo. $4 00
Samuel Johnson. His words and his ways, what he did, what he said, and what men thought and spoke concerning him. Edited by E. T. Mason. 2mo. 1 50
Robert Dick Baker, of Thurso, Geologist and Botanist. By Samuel Smiles, LL.D. 12mo. 1 50
Health Primers. No. 3—The House and its Surroundings. No. 4—Premature Death; its Promotion or Prevention. Each. 40
Selected Speeches and Reports on Finance and Taxation. From 1859 to 1878. By John Sherman. 8vo. 2 50
Modern Fishers of Men. Among the various sexes, sects, and sets of Chartville Church and Community. Paper. 50
Captain Nelson. A Romance of Colonial Days. By Samuel Adams Deake. Paper. 75
A Account of the Life and Times of Francis Bacon. Extracted from the edition of his occasional writings. By James Spedding. In two volumes. 5 00
The Dining Year-Book. By Mar an Harland. Common Sense in the Household Series. Cloth. 2 25
Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life among the Lowly. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. New edition, with illustrations, and a bibliography of the work by George Bullen, F.S.A. Cloth. 3 30

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M.D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M.D.
No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M.D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

FILIPPE'S ACADEMY OF LANguages, 120 Sutter Street. French, Spanish, English,
German, Italian, Latin, Greek, Portuguese, Russian, and
Scandinavian languages taught, at moderate terms, by thorough teachers, with the shortest and best methods.
Classes or private lessons day and evening. Take the elevator. Free school library for the students.

RARE ENGRAVINGS

.....AND.....

MODERN FRENCH ETCHINGS.

A CHOICE COLLECTION OF THE
best Proof Engravings and Etchings always on hand. Rare Engravings procured. All interested in Art are welcome to inspect collection either as visitors or purchasers. W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. THE NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street. MARK SHELTON.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10
each.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHIRLER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,
WHOLESALE GROCERS,
Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

The last London eccentricity!

The name would convey the idea that London had been indulging in a series of eccentricities, but it simply means, after all, that the capitalizer has had a happy thought.

Polonius was rather a clever old party at this sort of thing. His extemporaneous advertisement of the player's repertoire was really ingenious. But modernism has improved upon him.

Eccentricity is one of the most useful words of the age. What snarls and tangles it covers in dispositions. What may it not cover in the drama.

What a lot of nondescript stuff we have all looked at, and wondered what politeness would permit us to call it.

Eccentricity will henceforth be the happy harbor for every doubt.

It is not easy to arrange Gilbert's odd nineteenth century plays under any other head.

A propos of Gilbert, what is fame?

Think of a London first night, with his name on the bills over the play.

On Monday at the Baldwin there was a corporal's guard. On Tuesday the corporal's guard remarked to a friend, over a glass of toddy, that there was a very funny play going on up at Baldwin's.

Tuesday night a better house.

At last, by means of all the dips, spurs, and angles, extensions and ramifications of acquaintanceship, a good house came together to see He Would and He Would Not.

So named because there is something crooked in its production.

The real title of the eccentricity is Engaged.

What an airy, sparkling, clear, Gilbertian affair it is.

Every one who writes has one haunting idea.

Some hug it, and cherish it, and keep it—as some of the great authors do—for their later works.

But with Gilbert it peeps out everywhere.

It is his delight to turn the human species inside out—metaphysically speaking.

Artless vanity is his pet foible. Literalness is exquisitely humorous to him.

He is a philosopher, but—strange anomaly—a good-natured one.

He is a satirist, but a gentle one.

Are he and Wilkie Collins good friends? No one agreed with me; but I fancied throughout that, playful as the strokes were, they hit hardest at the great mystery-maker.

The idea was only dissipated by his having left out the great part in all of Wilkie Collins' novels and dramas—the keyhole.

There is a plot to He Would and He Would Not, but it is tortuous as the windings of the labyrinth of Crete.

Besides, it does not matter one whit what it is; the enjoyment lies in the situation of the moment.

A gentleman who saw the play in London, in the height of its run, complimentarily remarked, the other night, that, with one exception, it was quite as well played at the Baldwin.

As for Rose Wood, what has this Rachelesque young woman been doing all this time with her comedy.

She has grasped the substance of this soufflé satire with thorough comprehension.

She is a picture.

One can find her fac-simile in the beauty books and gift books of forty years ago.

Her entrance on the arm of the would-be weird "Belvawney" recalled the earlier days of fiction. People have read the "Children of the Abbey" without laughing at it.

There has been a time when the earlier heroines of Bulwer, Lord Lytton, and Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield, were not ridiculous.

Miss Wood, as "Belinda Treherne," is a memento of that period.

If it be original, there is inspiration in that heavy, unbound King Charles' lock which droops over one side of her face.

The lovelorn attitudes, the drooping gait, the stilted periods, belong to the romantic maiden of the past.

The eye for settlements and the excellent appetite are more peculiar to the maiden of to-day.

Rose Wood combines them harmoniously. In point of fact, she is exquisitely funny.

In her great scene there is something absolutely tragic in her mode of attacking a tart.

But there is much of the modern boarding-school when she, in the midst of her trouble—to paraphrase lines which should not be subjected to that indignity—

"Like a well-conducted person Goes on eating bread and butter."

"Belvawney," "the airy Belvawney," as "Belinda" expresses it, is, I take it, a foreigner.

Mr. Morrison makes him up to look like Dr. McBride, the King of Pain.

The King of Pain, like the Cornish language, has become extinct within a short time, and cannot therefore be offended.

Mr. Morrison adds to the make-up a pair of ghastly green goggles and some unusually good acting.

The latter is an eccentricity which he can afford to repeat.

The humor of the part is grim. So is Morrison's. In his each sits well upon the other. Hence, an irre-

"Minnie," the artless lassie, must be a god-child of that queer old bachelor, Charles Reade. His young women are all so innocent and so knowing. I think Miss Corcoran conveys the impression more than many ingénues.

She has many girlish little ways, but in the main she seems to know what she is about.

The well-posted "Minnie" fell into good hands.

So did every part, for that matter, with the exception of that of "Cheviot Hill."

I never before saw a play so really well cast at the Baldwin. Even the little Revel girl came to the fore with a fine Scotch accent and some really spirited acting.

Gilbert does not love Scotland and the Scotch as Black does.

There is a fling at their laws in the Scotch marriage; a fling at their thrift in Angus McAllister's banter of his sweetheart for "two pun' ten;" a fling at the truth of their maidens in Maggie's readiness to accept a new love.

Gilbert will fall under the ban of Victoria's displeasure, and his books will be unread of royalty.

For Victoria is a thrifty "auld lassie" herself, and likes it. What is Gilbert hitting at when he makes "Cheviot Hill," the hero, a stingy man? Stingy is an atrocious word, but if the gossamer-fancied Gilbert employs it why may not I?

A stingy bridegroom!

De mortuis nil nisi bonum is often said.

De bridegrooms nil nisi bonum is more often practiced.

After all, the crises of life are expensive, and a man can not change his nature simply because he is going to join it with another.

But these sort of things are not usually presented for our consideration from the stage.

I do not recall a character in fiction or drama upon which this might be a play.

Perhaps the author selected some unhappy gentleman from his circle, and held the mirror up to nature for him.

As for the indiscriminate love-making of "Cheviot Hill," that is not at all unusual.

Perhaps this is an inspiration of Mr. Sothern's.

However eccentric his part, he never permits love-making to be one of its impossibilities.

As the part was written for Mr. Sothern, it is plainly not adapted to Mr. Bishop.

He is a low comedian, and as such (to quote from a recent quoter) knows nothing of "that flower of modern civilization, the innuendo."

It will not do to broaden the lines of these superfine conceits.

It was much that, being a low comedian, he did not outrage the unities.

One could hardly fancy Raymond, another low comedian, in a character like this.

The irrepressibility of his humor must bubble to the surface in its own fashion.

He is not to be bound by text or author.

He loves situation.

He revels in "Col. Sellers'" turnip feast.

He glories in the revelation of the tallow-dip behind the isinglass.

He likes to refute with scorn the hare idea of being willing to go to Congress.

I once saw him play "Diggory" in The Spectre Bridegroom, and the people laughed till they were doubled up like jack-knives.

He spoke no word from beginning to end except "O Lord! Lord!"

But he said it in as many keys as there are notes in an octave, and he took as many attitudes as a marionette.

His embellishments are sui generis; hence, no other man will attempt to play "Col. Sellers" while Raymond lives.

But, we say with "Hamlet," "Something too much of this."

We know every trick, every gag, every joke, every situation of "Col. Sellers." We want something new.

We shall have it next week in My Son; therefore, let us say with "Le Blanc," "Sit still, my heart, sit down."

Poor "Le Blanc!" Is Billy Crane the one man in the world who can satisfy in the part?

No one has ever quite made a hit with it since Crane abandoned American opera bouffe to go into that singular dramatic partnership which has been attended with such pleasant pecuniary results.

Even talented, versatile Willie Edouin is thoroughly wretched, because he knows he is doing nothing remarkable.

Evangeline?

Worse even than its first presentation at the Grand Opera House.

And yet it has drawn well for a week.

Do people go to see how bad the thing really is?

What is the matter with the Oaklanders and the Virginians? They have all come to town lately grinning broadly.

They have two reasons: One, that they have seen the Eliza Weathersby Froliques; the other, that they have seen them before we did.

Your inlander glories in getting ahead of San Francisco in anything, even in going to a show first.

As for the Weathersby Froliques, with their impracticable name, they are to bring more of "Locke's Luck."

The verdict is, "awfully funny."

There are but six of them, and their entertainment is on the pattern of that of the Vokes, and their imitators, the Troubadours.

Nat Goodwin and Eliza Weathersby were the first architects of the good fortune of Evangeline in the Atlantic sea port.

Odd that they should set up a rivalry against it in the city of the sea on the Pacific.

Eliza Weathersby was here longer ago than gallant gentlemen will remember; but those who saw her have not forgotten her mignonette face and her great song, "Awfully Clevah."

She has the mignonette expression still; possibly a new song. Stranger things have happened.

One attraction is a form of fabulous thinness, which glances across the stage like a phantom in Walpurgis night.

Thinness is not attractive enough to bill.

But the inlanders report that there is a vague fascination in trying to see this form divine with the naked eye, which seizes them and impels them to go again and again till the feat is accomplished.

As for Goodwin himself, he must be a clever fellow, indeed, to sustain his Oakland reputation.

BETSY B.

ASSORTED BONBONS.

A student, in response to a reproof for the lowness of his position in the class:

"Well, Professor, never mind; I presume I am as much to blame as you are."

Scrap from the latest novel: "He held his head with one hand, and loudly called for help with the other."

"You've heard Browne's married again?"

"No; has he? Stupid ass! He didn't deserve to lose his first wife."

Positiveness and evolutionism—

Instructor—"What does Condillac say about brutes in the scale of being?"

Student—"He says a brute is an imperfect man."

Instructor—"And what is man?"

Student—"Man is a perfect brute."

As the happy couple are leaving church the husband says to the partner of his wedded life:

"Marriage must seem a dreadful thing to you; why, you were all of a tremble, and one could hardly hear you say, 'I will.'"

"I will try and have more courage, and say it louder, next time," replies the blushing bride.

A professor who has been trying for a half hour to explain a formula on the board, turns with his finger on his nose, which is a very prominent feature, and says severely: "Is this now apparent to you all? [Freshmen grin.] I am aware, gentlemen, that it is long. [Freshmen grin audibly.] But I hope you see the point. [Slight pedal applause.] It is called pous astuorum, of which, I hope, you see the application." [Loud and continued applause.]

Dialogue between two buyers of tickets in the national lottery—

"It's infamous! Will you believe it? They sold me a forged ticket!"

"What did you do?"

"Oh, I passed it off on another fellow for more than I paid for it."

Mother to her bad boy—"If you'll behave all day to-day I'll give you something to-morrow."

Bad boy to his sister—"What'll she give me—do you know? Will it pay me for the trouble of behaving myself?"

"What!" said the young man to his uncle, "you like to make New Year's calls! I perfectly detest them."

"You are wrong, nephew. A call from you can never fail to give pleasure; if not when you come in, it's sure to when you leave."

First Connoisseur—Ah, '47, '47! What a year that was for wine!

Second Connoisseur—Yesh, yesh; I remember '47. Poor, shainted Maria; how I wished to lick her in '47! [Sheds a drink to her memory.]

When young Aime Maillard was at college the professor of rhetoric gave the class as a subject "A Eulogy of Indolence."

On the given day the compositions were handed in, and the professor, after casting his eye over the paper, remarked:

"M. Maillard, where is your essay? I don't see it among these."

"Didn't I hand it to you? I beg your pardon," said the student, and passed up a neatly folded package of manuscript.

The professor opened it, turned over the pages, got very red in the face, and exclaimed:

"Sirrah, this is a miserable joke. The paper is a blank—not a word in eulogy of indolence anywhere in it."

"Oh, I thought that the highest eulogy of indolence I could give," replied the student, "would be not to write anything."

Court—Prisoner, you are accused of vagrancy, having no means of existence.

Prisoner—No means of existence! What do you call that? [Produces red a herring from his pocket and offers it in evidence.]

They were dining at Madame C.'s. A superb leg of mutton was put upon the table.

Guest—"Gracious, that mutton is actually raw."

Madame—"You think so? It seems to me it is just cooked to the right point."

Guest—"Pardon me, you have only to look at it, and you will see that it is raw."

Madame—"In that case, Monsieur—Marie, take this leg of mutton again to the spit."

At the end of a quarter of an hour the mutton is brought back, very nearly burnt to a crisp. Madame, in offering a slice to her guest, says:

"I trust you will not find it too rare now."

"Oh, Madame," he said, in refusing the plate, "it was not for myself I spoke just now; I never eat mutton."

A fortune-teller was plying his calling in the presence of an awe-stricken group of country folk, when a stranger approached, crossed his palm with silver, and received the usual prediction of health, wealth, a pretty wife, and sixteen children.

"Humph!" says the stranger, cynically. "Well, that's not so bad as folks in your professions go, but I can tell your fortune better'n you can yourself."

"Rash mortal!"—begins the seer.

"Come, now," says the stranger; "I never saw you before in my life, but I can tell you where you will sleep every night for the next six months, and you couldn't tell!"

"The stary orbs?"

"So you don't know? You'll sleep in jail for obtaining money under false pretenses. Come along with me." [Displays badge and marches off necromancer.]

THE MOST COMPLETE WORK OF the kind ever published, and a welcome visitor at every fireside, is the

FIRESIDE ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF POETRY.

Collected and Arranged by Henry S. Coates.

This important work, a collection of the best and brightest gems to be found in the whole field of English poetry, was begun in the fall of 1871, and contains 1245 poems by over 400 authors, English and American, carefully arranged under headings according to the subjects. It has been the aim of the editor to present a comprehensive collection, an Encyclopædia, of the poetry of the English language, one that will be a welcome companion at every Fireside. Each poem has been given complete, and great care has been taken to follow the most authentic and approved editions of the respective authors. Nearly all the longer minor poems that have become classic will be found in this volume; among which may be mentioned Milton's "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," "Comus," and "Lycidas;" Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" and "The Traveller," Coleridge's "Christabel" and "Rime of the Ancient Mariner," Pope's "Rape of the Lock," Keats' "Eve of St. Agnes," Campbell's "O'Connor's Child," Shelley's "Adonais," Mrs. Southey's "Young Gray Head," Macaulay's "Horatius," Ayton's "Edinburgh after Flodden," Drake's "Culprit Fay," Thackeray's "Chronicle of the Drum," and Mrs. Browning's "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," while in the shorter poems Shakespeare is represented by 31 selections, Burns by 23, Scott by 19, Wordsworth by 29, Herrick by 14, Hood by 18, Tennyson by 24, Moore by 24, Coleridge by 13, Byron by 16, Shelley by 18, Longfellow by 15, Whittier by 13, Mrs. Browning by 14, Campbell by 13, Southey by 13, and others according to their respective merits. The selection has been pronounced, by many of our most prominent literary men, one of the best and most complete ever made. The work is furnished with an alphabetical index of the names of the poems, an index of authors, and also one of first lines, thus making the means of reference more thorough than in any other work of the kind. Explanatory and corroborative notes have been appended to the volume, and add greatly to its value. The book makes a very handsome octavo of 1040 pages, printed from new type on fine paper, is illustrated by fourteen engravings on steel, and is beautifully bound. Both in contents and manufacture this is one of the finest specimens of bookmaking ever produced in this country.

Price, in cloth, extra gilt, $5; half calf or morocco, $7 50; morocco antique, $10; full calf, $12. For sale by

A. L. BANCROFT & CO.,
721 Market St., San Francisco.

Painting on porcelain. MISS RYDER, 26½ Kearny Street.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

There are many families in San Francisco who intend making a new departure this year, and instead of offering their guests intoxicating liquors will supply their place with Tea or Coffee. This may answer very well, but great care should be taken in the selection of these two beverages. A cup of really good Coffee or Tea is rarely unacceptable to any gentleman of refined taste. Every lady knows this, and probably that is the reason why Fred. H. Loring, of 922 Market Street, is selling such large quantities of his superior brands of "President" Coffee and "Treasure" Tea.—Golden Era, Dec. 21, 1878.

Let us live happily then, not hating those who hate us.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

What can give more satisfaction to a stern "parent" and his better half than to contemplate the lovely features of their amiable offspring as photographed by Mr. Boyd's Lightning Process, at the Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The great man is he who does not lose his child's heart.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

COMMENCING MONDAY EVENING, FEB. 3,
Every evening during the week and Wednesday and Saturday Matinees.

SPECIAL ENGAGEMENT OF

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S FROLIQUES!

—AND—

MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR.,

In their new collaborated Farrago, entitled

HOBBIES! HOBBIES!

"Gay, sparkling, festive—sweet, clean, and decent."
"Fairly sparkles with gems—hits the popular taste."

CHARACTERS IN THE COMEDY.

Minnie Clover.....Miss Eliza Weathersby
Prof. Pygmalion Whiffles, Mr. N. C. Goodwin, Jr.
Miss Constance, with songs.....Miss Elma Delaro
Miss Euphemia Bang.....Miss Jennie Weathersby
Major Garroway Bang.....Mr. T. H. Burns
Arthur Doveleigh.....Mr. W. J. Stanton

CHARACTERS IN THE BURLESQUE.

The Prince.....Minnie Clover
The Villain.....Prof. Pygmalion Whiffles
The Princess.....Miss Constance
The Fairy.....Miss Bang
The Count.....Arthur
The Audience.....Major Bang

MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR. will introduce his WONDERFUL IMITATIONS

Of the following celebrated actors:

Edwin Booth, John T. Raymond, Lawrence Barrett, Frank Mayo,
Jos. Jefferson, Stuart Robson, Chas. Fechter, and others.

The performance will commence with the farcical sketch,

UNDER THE ROSE

Justinian Sheepbanks.....Mr. T. H. Burns | Mrs. Modena Magnet.....Miss Jennie Weathersby
Susan.....Miss Elma Delaro

EXECUTIVE OF COMPANY.—N. C. Goodwin, Manager; W. J. Stanton, Stage Manager; F. Von Olker, Musical Director; Louis Voss, Treasurer; J. E. Warner, Bus. Manager.

ARTISTIC DECORATION.

One of the most important points in the furnishing of a room is the decorating of its walls. The eye naturally seeks them at the first entrance, and the general impression is often of their effect, whether agreeable or otherwise, than even of the pictures that may hang against them. To be in keeping with the surrounding objects, and yet preserve an individuality of its own, is the acme of perfection in everything. Art connoisseurs are insisting on this latter point nowadays; and, while the genius of artists like Morris, Eastlake, and others is being given to the task of beautifying our floors by carpets that outvie the products of the famous looms of Persia and India; window draperies, that combine all the richness and durability of medieval stuffs with the elegance of modern taste; and furniture, more perfect in workmanship, more varied in design than even the most luxurious ages of the past have ever known; this particular branch of house decoration has kept pace with all others. No carpet in the higher grades is made at present that is not complemented by wall hangings of similar character. For example: the magnificent carpetings of the Eastlake School—in the rich, dusky colors now used, and of designs at once wonderfully complex, yet severely chaste—will be matched by a papering of equally deep "tones," flecked here and there with vivid splashes of gold or silver; or a broad surface, over which is spread a wilderness of foliage and flowers. In both, the same character is sustained throughout; yet there is no monotony where they are put together, only a perfect unity. In the "dados," or broad borders that finish the lower edge of the paper, and the "frieze," or narrower one at the top, we find the correspondent to the peculiarly artistic borders of the floor coverings now in fashion. In the making of this class of papers are employed only artists of acknowledged ability and experience, even when their fame is not world wide, as in some instances; and it is not unusual that a fine and complicated design will cost $4,000 or $5,000 in the getting up. It would be difficult to discriminate among so many new and charming designs. Fancy no sooner declares for the dainty, silvery-blue satin ground, with glistening stems threading through and through the intricacies of strange exotics, and other fanciful conceits, the indescribable shades of dusky green, under a network of ivy leaves in dull gold, goblin-like blossoms of the chrysanthemum and aster and their sharp-pointed leaves, than a sheet is unrolled, stiff and rich as a breadth of silvery moire antique, over whose surface trail long, graceful stems and branches, drooping foliage, and flowers of delicate grays, touched here and there with a glint of silver, and filled in at intervals with a vase of tenderest blue and most exquisite form. The "dados" to these papers are marvels in themselves, some being in the form of panels, deep greenish-browns relieved by tall sprays of foliage terminated by a half open blossom or two, in which the red shows but slightly; pale cream yellows and coffee browns, bearing the figure of the sacred ibis rising from a bed of reeds, each alternate panel being a cluster of China asters. Another style is edged with a border of black velvet, both edges of this in turn being finished by a narrow, bamboo rod, gilded and banded at intervals with a narrow black line. Artistic unity, so closely studied nowadays, demands the abolition of the cold, bare walls of the past few years. Even the art of the fresco painter, so much employed of late, fails to convey the same idea of warmth and richness as does a fine paper. Particularly is this the case for side walls, where the work comes close to the eye. The attempt to reproduce the complex patterns of the new school by means of fresco painting, although a limited one, must prove a failure, if for no other reason than because of the immense expense of time and labor involved, as well as the unsatisfactory results thus far obtained. The change of sentiment that is bringing these artistic papers so greatly into favor is not by any means an evanescent fancy—it is rather the indication of a steady development of the general taste, and is, therefore, likely to be a permanent fashion. There is much to be said in favor of this method of finishing walls besides its artistic beauty. Its comparative cheapness, the ease with which renewals and changes can be effected, and, more than all, its adaptability to the other accessories of the room, all commend it, even were it not that the all-powerful voice of fashion is in its favor. In Europe the furor over the "new school" is still unabated, although it has been long enough established to be beyond the first flush of enthusiasm, and the more elegant dwellings of all the Eastern cities are, almost without an exception, adopting paper hangings in preference to any other style of wall decoration, and we are glad to know that our own business houses are not behind the rest of the fashionable world in this particular. Some remarkably fine specimens of new designs which we have seen lately at the establishment of Geo. C. Clark, No. 615 Market Street, having renewed our interest in this branch of domestic art, and it being the special province of the ARGONAUT to foster everything of artistic and æsthetic excellence among us, we feel constrained to call attention to the subject, having in view the many handsome dwellings in progress of completion throughout the city. We want to see our houses beautified. We feel an actual personal interest in the matter, and we hope besides to see a growing disposition on the part of our citizens to encourage home trade by intrusting the decoration of their houses to those who are prepared to embellish them. Mr. Clark is also agent in this city for Lesuer & Lewis of New York, and Beck of London.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,
PARTY INVITATIONS
AND VISITING CARDS

Engraved and printed in the latest style.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

LAST WEEK OF MR.

JOHN T. RAYMOND,

Who will appear on Monday evening, Feb. 3, and every evening during the week, and at Saturday matinee, as

HERR WIEGEL,

In the latest New York and Boston success,

MY SON.

Friday evening, Feb. 7, Farewell Benefit of Mr. Raymond.

Monday, Feb. 10, Brief Engagement of the incomparable artist,

ROSE EYTINGE,

And magnificent production of

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

LAST THREE PERFORMANCES

OF THE GALLENDER'S FAMOUS
GALLENDER'S FAMOUS

GEORGIA GEORGIA A Great Farewell Bill. MINSTRELS
GEORGIA GEORGIA MINSTRELS
GEORGIA GEORGIA MINSTRELS

LAST MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

Monday, February 3d, Eliza Weathersby's Froliques and N. C. Goodwin's HOBBIES.

Seats now on sale at the box office.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER

Last two nights of the last London Eccentricity, which has been received with roars of laughter.

This (Saturday) evening and Sunday evening, February 1st and 2d, will be acted

HE WOULD AND HE WOULD NOT

"'Tis well to be off with the old love
Before you are on with the new."
Old Song.

Only He Would and He Would Not Matinee this afternoon, at 2 P. M.

Monday, February 3d, reappearance of CLARA MORRIS as "Cora" in ARTICLE 47.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSRE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

Eleventh week and brilliant success of

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

Every evening at 8; Wednesday and Saturday Matinees at 2, the fascinating musical burlesque,

EVANGELINE.
EVANGELINE.

Monday, February 3d, Complimentary Benefit to the gifted lyric artist,

MISS LOUISE SEARLE,
By the ladies of San Francisco.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLIcation of the Brooklyn Land Company to be discontinued.—Notice is hereby given, the application of the Brooklyn Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, to be discontinued, has been presented and filed in the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that Monday, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1879, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, at the court room of said court, in said City and County of San Francisco, has been fixed and appointed as the time and place for hearing the said application. THOS. H. B. JONES, Clerk.

PRETTY WOMEN.

I must confess to an extreme liking for pretty women. Most men, especially homely men, might, I think, admit themselves possessors of a similar feeling. That pretty women, however, are universal admirers of homely men is not quite so certain; and yet it has been very generally observed that homely men often secure pretty women as wives. I don't pretend to understand what the philosophy of the thing may be. It is possible, however, that it comes of a dislike most men, as well as women, have for what has been called "doubles," or repetition of self; and, further, the universal partiality existing for contrasts. A very big man always likes to see a man something smaller than himself, and an extremely small man forever envies him who has the muscles of a giant. May it not be then that homely men are sometimes chosen by women with pretensions to good looks simply on account of the extreme opportunity thus secured for contrast—for showing themselves off, as it were, to the best advantage. Who ever saw even an ordinarily pretty woman leaning on the arm of an ugly man without exclaiming mentally: "How fine she is, and what a beast of a husband!" The same pretty woman walking with a tolerably good-looking man would not be noticed. It must be for some similar reason that picture amateurs often leave the brilliant-colored painting of the masters hanging in old, rusty, and even crickety frames. For my own part I never enter a room containing paintings, where one single picture happens to be situated as I have described, without its attracting my immediate observation. Certain it is, that a single rose, blooming amid the briars of the field, lures the eye sooner than the same rose blushing on the velvety lawn. There have not been so very many pretty women after all, women of extraordinary beauty, as one would at first imagine. Whole generations sometimes pass without one appearing. Some countries have not possessed one in a century—at least not one who, from her extreme beauty, or from fortuitous circumstances, has fixed her name in history. Great beauty is as rare, indeed, as great genius; and great beauty combined with wit, even rarer. But comparatively few of the beautiful women of the poets ever existed beyond the poet's fancy; the immortal Beatrice, even, being known rather for Dante's love and for Dante's verse than for any wonderful beauty. Byron's "Maid of Athens" was as much the child of his sympathy as she was the inspiration of his pen. Her mother was a widow with whom Byron lodged. She was poor, and her two daughters interested the poet. He described them in the plainest prose afterward, and, though they were beautiful, there were many such maids in Athens. Shakspeare's fair "Rosalind" certainly never lived in the flesh and blood, and "Sweet Margaret" was the creation of a Goethe, only after he had deserted a beauty more real. It has always been a fashion among the poets to create in their minds the beautiful forms, of which nature seems so niggardly; and, as in fancy they dwell in palaces, while their bodies languished in garrets, so they lived with the hours through married to the plainest of women. The pleasures of their imaginings, however, were far superior to the enjoyments of those who possessed real hours, and who lived in real palaces, yet lacked in the appreciation of the good fortune which nature had bestowed on them. Still, most poets have had one love that was real, one beauty that was supreme. It has, indeed, been asserted, and with a very great degree of enthusiasm, too, that no great poet ever existed whose genius had not been lighted into a burning flame at the altar of some fair face. "Give me a man," said a philosopher, once, "endowed with ordinary genius, and make him mad in love with a beautiful woman, and I will return a poet to you." It is not difficult to recall what many of the loves of the poets have been. What bright, voluptuous, yet half evanescent being they were. Commencing away back with Horace—whose odes made a Lydia immortal—Dante and Beatrice, Tasso and Leonora, Alfieri and his princess, Petrarch and Laura, Goethe and Fredericke. Some names that are engraven as if in brass, some hearts in whose warmth genius had its birth. The love stimulus has been no less inspiring to female genius than to that of men. Sappho only penned verses when in love. When she could find no mortal handsome enough to fire her muse, she fell in love with Phaon, whom Venus had transformed from an ugly old dwarf into the fairest of youths; and when she found her love unrequited, she threw herself into the sea. Poor, sweet Angelica Kaufman, the pride of Germany, the adored of England, never painted so well as when the eyes of that handsome villain, Horne, were upon her; and the pure Elizabeth Barrett Browning's genius leaped into higher life under the transforming wand of love. All women of exceeding beauty have had their history, and the triumphs and fate of a woman of exceeding beauty are not of less interest than is the life of a man of genius. From Eve—whose beauty must have been supreme—down, beautiful women have exercised the most tremendous influence on the destinies of the world. Helen, for whose charms hosts battled and Troy fell; Cleopatra, maddening kings to desert empires for her love; Honoria, for whom whole betacombs of Huns perished, that Attila might win her hand; Eugenie, dictating the manners, dress, and habits of civilized society; Carlotta, forcing a husband to assume the purple at the sacrifice of a people's freedom—each and all point to the majesty of the power of a woman of beauty. It has sometimes been asserted that beautiful women and men of genius have come up in crowds together, and that there is an Augustan age of fair women in the lives of nations just as there is an Augustan age of literature. Certain it is that, when England and France had the greatest poets, they had also the greatest number of women celebrated for their beauty, as was the case in the times of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, Louis XIV. and the Consulate. Scarcely a great poet, or, it might be added, a great painter, has come upon the scene, who has not brought with him at least one woman of almost supreme beauty. Of course, in judging them, allowance must be made for the distinction given these women by the geniuses who adored them. Yet the spirits of the dead fair might answer, "At our altars were their lamps lighted. We piped to them and they did dance." A German writer once intimated that had Goethe never seen the face of the fair Fredericke, it is doubtful if the world had not lost him as a poet. How thankless, too, this man, this poet, whom Emerson has pronounced "The soul of his century." How selfish even a poet can be, to pour gall into the wine-cup that cheered him—to coldly desert the true heart that gave wings to his genius. Fair Fredericke was but a village pastor's daughter—her lover was a society king. It was said, though, that he should have married her. But she was not alone; it was a love of great man had. Fredericke was a beautiful woman, a great man flower, fit for a poet to crush, that he might be intoxicated with its perfumes. Tasso declared that, for Leonora, he could write a world of poems; and Alfieri's genius soared highest when the fair Countess of Albany encouraged his love. Indeed, he would not write at all, if she frowned; and his constant prayer was that he might not outlive her. Of course she was a married woman—most of the lovers of poets were married women. This seemed to be a part of the stimulant, the necessity, as it were, to make real poets, in the old days of France especially. Married, unfortunate, beautiful, and a poet to adore her—this was the maximum of female glory, the distinction which great beauties held dear.—would be a bold man who would undertake to justify or to palliate greatly the apparent short-comings of the married beauties of one and two hundred years ago. I do not mean the love intrigues of the Maintenons, the Montespons, the Pompadours, and a score of other beautiful wantons and king's mistresses, but the weakness of that other class, who were sometimes even hated at court, and whose greatest offense was to be beautiful, and at the same time married, without even the asking, to men whom they could so easily hate. And yet there was some palliation, some excuse. Women always did and always will love to be admired; and French customs permitted that all pretty women might have as many admirers as they could honestly win. It was an outgrowth of the times of the troubadours, when every lady had her lover, and when the highest flattery that could be awarded a man was to sing to his wife at her chamber window. Of course married women could accept such attentions to even a greater extent than could the young maidens without her cavalier. Besides, all pretty women were sure to be married women. No sooner was a girl discovered to be beautiful than she was sold, as it were, to the highest bidder, who usually proved to be some rich nobleman, twice as old as herself, or some favorite of the king. Given then, a pretty woman, married to a hateful old man, whose only advantage was his money, a custom permitting married women to have admirers and lovers, and what might reasonably be expected as a result? All the romances of two centuries ago had women as their chief characters. Wit and beauty ruled the world, and affairs of State prospered only as some fair woman lent her magic aid. Beauty and fame, even more than gold, were the idols of the seventeenth century. There was more power wielded in the salons of Paris than there was in the castles of the kings. It would be unfair, however, to imagine that it was all, or nearly all, used basely. Among all the frivolities of the times, and gilt, and glitter, and hollow, there was still respect for that which is cultivated in woman than beauty—a virtuous heart, a high-cultured mind. It is noticeable that, whether in the castle of Rambouillet, the former residence of the French kings, or in the homes of the French nobility, the education of women was not neglected. The cloister and the abbey, indeed, stood in close connection with the salons of Paris, and it might be, and usually was, but a step from the one to the other. The cloisters were the young ladies' schools of those days, and the priests were not more the keepers of their consciences than were the good sisters the adorners of their minds. In the cloisters their lives commenced, and it was not so very unusual a thing that they sometimes ended there; for these retreats served not only as schools, but, on occasion, answered every purpose of a prison. Maidens imprisoned themselves there at times to be rid of the canting world; and sometimes, too, husbands, who happened to be jealous of their attractive wives, or who, from some incomprehensible reason, were weary of their presence, resorted to the not unfashionable practice of shutting them up in abbeys. It was such an experience, scarcely less than her supreme beauty perhaps, that made the name of Hortense Mancini, the Duchess of Mazarin, an object of historical regard. She was the niece of the great Mazarin, at that time the most powerful man in France. Possessed of infinite beauty and great wit, she was, at the same time, the richest heiress in Europe; for Mazarin had adopted her as his own, and proposed giving her the greatest fortune in France. Her beauty, too, was of an almost fadeless kind; she must have been near to sixty when she died, and it has been said of her that to the last she retained the sweet glow of youth and every beauty of feature. She was fifty when she wrote, "I was never healthier nor handsomer than now." Penelope, with her hundred princes, never had so many lovers. Rich noblemen tendered their fortunes and their hands, and Charles of England, and Peter of Portugal, each begged to share a crown with her. All these were refused, and nobody knew why, for at sixteen she was married to Armand Millerage, a court favorite, and a man twice as old as herself. Of course the result to be expected followed; a few short months of happiness, and then the green-eyed monster slipped into the husband's heart. He was not jealous, only he was furious at seeing the assiduous attentions of so many of Hortense's admirers. He hated every one of them; he hated his wife, he hated the king, and forbade his beautiful wife ever speaking to him. Threatenings and mistreatment, however, availed nothing. She was too beautiful. The world would admire in spite of his claims of private property; and then Hortense was locked up in the cloister of St. Marie, just joining the famous Bastille. Associated with a few dreary women, who looked upon her as a sinful thing of the world, to whom repentance even could bring small reward, her life was weary enough. At last, some friends pitying the imprisoned beauty, helped her to escape. Again a short trial with her husband, and again an escape. At night this time, on foot, in men's clothes, the great beauty was flying from Paris, the scene of her triumphs as well as her woes. She journeyed off to Italy, and on her way was everywhere the object of the greatest attention. At Chambery she held a sort of court, where some of her old admirers, and many new ones, flocked to see her, to congratulate her on her freedom, and to admire her beauty. She became renowned for the elegance of her taste in matters of personal adornment. She knew how to dress becomingly, and this was an art that even then was not understood by every fair lady. Whatever she wore seemed especially suited to her. One day in the costume of an amazon, another in the dress of a modern Greek; whether in the light drapery of the old statuary, or the heavier robes of her own period, she was pronounced the loveliest of the lovely. Her husband had managed to greatly reduce her fortune. Still she had enough left for charity, and she soon became as well known for deeds of goodness as for her beauty. She traveled back to Holland, and then crossed over to England, where the elite of London received her as the fairest of the fair. She brought to her new court the artists, the singers, the poets of the great city. She became the patron of learning, and among her British admirers were Dryden, and Pope, and Temple, and Swift. London, they said, was full of pretty women; but Hortense, though old, was the fairest of them all.

She died in England, in the midst of her triumphs, and there was scarcely a heart in Britain, her partial biographers say, that did not lament the beautiful but unfortunate niece of Mazarin. Skip a century, about, from the days of Mazarin, and one is struck by the great number of beautiful women who appeared in the salons of Paris, and the larger towns of France. The very mention of their names would surely remind the reader of the intrigue and abandonment that prevailed during the reign of the "Grand Monarch," till the days of the Consulate. How beauty was sought, how idolized, not that it was a thing of rarity, but that its power was appreciated. If a pretty face may be considered a fortune now, it was a kingdom then. Poor Nicolo Isouard almost died of sorrow that he could not find a singer with a face sufficiently pretty, and a foot sufficiently small to take the first part in his wonderful opera of Cinderella. All the pretty feet in Paris were looked at in vain, when Nicolo accidentally stumbled on the pretty little child, Manemiole St. Aubin. The composer's fortune was made in a single night. "The little foot will be looked at first," said Nicolo. "If that passes, all is well with the music and the face." The foot was looked upon and adored. All Paris was in excitement. Such singing, such a face, and such a foot. The sweet singer entertained Paris and the Continent for many years, and then she grew old, and compassionless time robbed her of relatives, of money, and of friends. She was seventy-five. There remained nothing to her of the past, save her recollections and her pretty foot.—Progress.

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms. The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements. It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds underlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont; water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table, range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted, rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

CALABASAS LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA. For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus, or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange, San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts. Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap. Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties. No. 605 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY SAN FRANCISCO. Successor to F. V. Scudder.

YELLOW JACKET SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada. Principal place of business, Main St., Gold Hill, Nevada. Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of said Company, held on the fifteenth day of January, A. D. 1879, an assessment (No. 31) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon each and every share of the capital stock of said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of Company, Main Street, Gold Hill, Nevada, or to James Newlands, Transfer Secretary, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, shall be deemed delinquent, and will be duly advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors. JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary. Office—Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

BEST & BELCHER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 13) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Thursday, the sixth (6th) day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary. Office—Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the third (3d) day of January, 1879, an assessment (No. 5) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixth day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the twenty-eighth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary. Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.
SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELANGER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY BELANGER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.
JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 570 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,
FIRE AND MARINE.
Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.
JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT
— AND —
INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE
CASH ASSETS.....$450,000
Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:
A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

ALASKA
COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING

— AND —
COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.
204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF
EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.
135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental
Hotel.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT

UNION IRON WORKS
(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.
COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,
Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery.
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorodizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.
PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

FRANK KENNEDY,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERchant Street, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

WINTER ARRANGEMENT,
COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At PAJARO, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At SALINAS the
M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey.
At STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

At The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points, and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings.
Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.
A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.
Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, Yuma, and Adonde (30 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco:
(Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays included, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

At Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted).
(Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.
ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

— FOR —
JAPAN AND CHINA,
Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for
YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,
GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.
February.....18 March.....15 January.....21
May.....16 April.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.
For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1,
September 29, October 27, November 24, December 22, and every fourth week
thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMER-ICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST IN-DIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th,
20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ,
SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

RUPTURE.
BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE's late invention.
Call, or send for New Illustrated
Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.
COMMENCING JANUARY 8th, 1879,
and until further notice,
TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:
Overland Ticket Office at Ferry Landing, Market St.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO
Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landings, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Kedding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Pallade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at 1.00 at 3.40 P. M.

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN FRANCISCO AND MAR-TINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles.
(Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M.
(Arrive San Francisco at 9.15 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.
(Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, ARIZONA
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall
San Buenaventura, and Santa Barbara. LOS ANGELES, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Stages for Prescott and Colorado River Steamers), connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Adonde (30 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.

(Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landings, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M. for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson.
(Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River.
(Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore.
(Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.
Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.
FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Fernside.	East	Niles.	Berkeley.	Daly City.	Del Norte.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	7.00	6.10	7.00	6.10	6.10
7.10	1.00	8.00	8.00	7.10	8.00	7.10	7.10
7.30	1.30	9.00	9.00	8.30	9.00	8.30	8.30
8.30	2.00	10.00	10.00	9.30	10.00	9.30	9.30
9.00	3.00	11.00	11.00	10.30	11.00	10.30	10.30
9.30	3.30	12.00	12.00	11.30	12.00	11.30	11.30
10.30	4.00	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.	1.00	3.30	3.30
10.30	4.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	4.00	4.30	4.30
10.30	5.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	4.30	5.00	5.00
11.00	5.30	3.00	3.00	3.00	5.00	5.30	5.30
11.30	6.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	5.30	6.00	6.00
12.00	6.30	5.00	5.00	5.00	6.00	6.30	6.30
.....	7.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.30	7.00	7.00
.....	7.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	7.00	7.30	7.30
.....	8.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.30	8.00	8.00
.....	8.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	8.00	8.30	8.30
.....	9.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.30	9.00	9.00
.....	9.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	9.00	9.30	9.30
.....	10.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.30	10.00	10.00
.....	10.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	10.00	10.30	10.30
.....	11.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.30	11.00	11.00
.....	11.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	11.30	11.30
.....	12.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.30	12.00	12.00
.....	12.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	12.00	12.30	12.30

Change cars at West Oakland.

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

From	From	From	From	From	From	From	From
Daly City.	Berkeley.	Niles.	East	Fernside.	Alameda.	Oakland.	(Broadway).
A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.
5.40	6.40	7.00	6.10	6.00	5.40	6.00	12.20
6.30	7.30	8.00	7.10	7.00	6.30	6.50	1.10
7.00	8.00	9.00	8.10	8.00	7.00	7.20	1.40
7.30	8.30	9.30	8.40	8.30	7.30	7.50	2.10
8.00	9.00	10.00	9.10	9.00	8.00	8.20	2.40
8.30	9.30	10.30	9.40	9.30	8.30	8.50	3.10
9.00	10.00	11.00	10.10	10.00	9.00	9.20	3.40
9.30	10.30	11.30	10.40	10.30	9.30	9.50	4.10
10.00	11.00	12.00	11.10	11.00	10.00	10.20	4.40
10.30	11.30	12.30	11.40	11.30	10.30	10.50	5.10
11.00	12.00	1.00	12.10	12.00	11.00	11.20	5.40
11.30	12.30	1.30	12.40	12.30	11.30	11.50	6.10
12.00	1.00	2.00	1.10	1.00	12.00	12.20	6.40
.....	1.30	2.30	1.40	1.30	12.30	12.50	7.10
.....	2.00	3.00	2.10	2.00	1.00	1.20	7.40
.....	2.30	3.30	2.40	2.30	1.30	1.50	8.10
.....	3.00	4.00	3.10	3.00	1.40	2.00	8.40
.....	3.30	4.30	3.40	3.30	1.50	2.10	9.10
.....	4.00	5.00	4.10	4.00	2.00	2.20	9.40
.....	4.30	5.30	4.40	4.30	2.10	2.30	10.10
.....	5.00	6.00	5.10	5.00	2.20	2.40	10.40
.....	5.30	6.30	5.40	5.30	2.30	2.50	11.10
.....	6.00	7.00	6.10	6.00	2.40	3.00	11.40
.....	6.30	7.30	6.40	6.30	2.50	3.10	12.10
.....	7.00	8.00	7.10	7.00	3.00	3.20	12.40
.....	7.30	8.30	7.40	7.30	3.10	3.30	1.10
.....	8.00	9.00	8.10	8.00	3.20	3.40	1.40
.....	8.30	9.30	8.40	8.30	3.30	3.50	2.10
.....	9.00	10.00	9.10	9.00	3.40	4.00	2.40
.....	9.30	10.30	9.40	9.30	3.50	4.10	3.10
.....	10.00	11.00	10.10	10.00	4.00	4.20	3.40
.....	10.30	11.30	10.40	10.30	4.10	4.30	4.10
.....	11.00	12.00	11.10	11.00	4.20	4.40	4.40
.....	11.30	12.30	11.40	11.30	4.30	4.50	5.10
.....	12.00	1.00	12.10	12.00	4.40	5.00	5.40
.....	12.30	1.30	12.40	12.30	4.50	5.10	6.10
.....	1.00	2.00	1.10	1.00	5.00	5.20	6.40
.....	1.30	2.30	1.40	1.30	5.10	5.30	7.10
.....	2.00	3.00	2.10	2.00	5.20	5.40	7.40
.....	2.30	3.30	2.40	2.30	5.30	5.50	8.10
.....	3.00	4.00	3.10	3.00	5.40	6.00	8.40
.....	3.30	4.30	3.40	3.30	5.50	6.10	9.10
.....	4.00	5.00	4.10	4.00	6.00	6.20	9.40
.....	4.30	5.30	4.40	4.30	6.10	6.30	10.10
.....	5.00	6.00	5.10	5.00	6.20	6.40	10.40
.....	5.30	6.30	5.40	5.30	6.30	6.50	11.10
.....	6.00	7.00	6.10	6.00	6.40	7.00	11.40
.....	6.30	7.30	6.40	6.30	6.50	7.10	12.10
.....	7.00	8.00	7.10	7.00	7.00	7.20	12.40
.....	7.30	8.30	7.40	7.30	7.10	7.30	1.10
.....	8.00	9.00	8.10	8.00	7.20	7.40	1.40
.....	8.30	9.30	8.40	8.30	7.30	7.50	2.10

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE
PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,

PURE MOCHA COFFEE,

PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

at Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

THE

Automatic

SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begg to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4

Suits, - - - 15

Overcoats, - 15

Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X For Dress Suits to the Tailor

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin

Pants, - - - $7

White Vests, fm 3

Fancy Vests, - - 6

Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

WANTED.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, WHO can give satisfactory references if required, desires room and board in a private family. Location, north of Market Street preferred. Address R. B. D., this office.

PACIFIC

BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA CO.

OF LONDON.

A Flattering Compliment

—TO—

STEINWAY & SONS.

Academy of Music,
New York, Dec. 28, 1878. }
Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Gentlemen—Having used your celebrated Pianos in public and private during the present opera season, we desire to express our unqualified admiration of their sonority, evenness, richness, and astonishing duration of tone, most beautifully blending with and supporting the voice. These matchless qualities for accompanying the voice, together with precision of action and unequalled capacity for remaining in tune for a great length of time, render the Steinway Pianos, above all others, the most desirable instruments for students of vocal music and the musical public generally.

MINNIE HAUKE,
ETELKA GERSTER,
MARIE ROZE,
CL. CAMPOBELLO,
G. LABLACHE,
LUIGI ARDITI,
ITALO CAMPANINI,
A. F. GALASSI,
G. DEL PUENTE,
J. FRAPOLLI,
A. J. FOLI,
F. DE RIALP,
J. H. MAPLESON.NEW YORK, December, 1878.
Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Dear Sirs—Allow me to express to you the entire satisfaction I feel in praising your magnificent Pianos. They are the finest and most superior instruments in the world, and I have therefore taken every opportunity, while in Europe, to extol their sterling qualities. Believe me, dear sir,

Yours, very sincerely,

MINNIE HAUKE,
Royal and Imperial Court Singer.SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS
ARGOSY.The Bachelor's Dressing.
No Pulling on Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St.

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 6.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 8, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

There are thirty or forty thousand American citizens residing in Paris. They go by the name of the American Colony. But of these so-called Americans, an actual investigation develops the fact that for some reason the naturalized citizens greatly outnumber those of American nativity. We are often asked to explain this singular fact. Of the rich Californians resident permanently in the French Capital we have Mr. John Mackay, the bonanza king; Mr. Andrew McCrary, formerly grocer; Mr. Heuston, of the clothing firm of Heuston, Hastings & Co., and that pretty nearly completes the list. These gentlemen are all of Irish birth and citizens only by naturalization. Yet, for some reason, they have practically abandoned the country of their adoption, and prefer to spend their lives and fortunes in a land foreign both to that of their birth and asylum. If this is the fault of our system we should endeavor to amend it, for so large a continuous expenditure abroad reduces the public wealth. It is the same absenteeism that possibly reduced Ireland to such a condition as to drive them away from it. It appears to be generally understood that the society here is so crude and rough that they can not enjoy life to the fullest extent. Of this we have no right to complain. Man is a social animal, and loves to meet others who are congenial to him, and if he cannot find them in one place he naturally seeks them in another. This is the history of social people the world over. But, inasmuch as it involves the community thus losing its members in a great pecuniary loss as well, does it not behoove the society thus left behind to better itself, so as to make matters more agreeable to its wealthy absentees and try and lure them back? Of course, this is difficult to do in many cases; but at least we might make an effort to keep those here from leaving us. Our theatres, though not so good as those of Paris, yet are not bad. Our parks are well enough in their way. "But we have no Court presentations," cries one. "We must go abroad to be presented; here we can't be." But the answer to that is: "No more could you be presented abroad if you told the truth about yourselves. You must know that the rule in those countries at court is most inflexible; that any person ever in trade, or whose father has been in trade, can not be presented." This is true of every court in Europe, except, perhaps, in that of the Pope, which can scarcely be called a court at all. At all others the slightest hint that you, or your father, possibly even your grandfather, had been a grocer, a tailor, or a working miner, would exclude you as absolutely as if you had spent your lives in a convict's cell. And if you get in, and are received, it is because you conceal this fact. Now, fellow-citizens of America, native and naturalized, are you willing to accept social recognition under a false pretense? We know that there is scarcely one native-born American in ten thousand, and not one naturalized American in ten times that proportion, qualified to enter the presence of royalty, with a borrowed sword dangling between his legs, if he did not allow a deliberate lie to be told for him by somebody in advance. And yet there are, we regret to say, scores of Americans who are willing to hang about Europe for years, soliciting, intriguing, scheming, and bribing, for a presentation at some court. To accomplish this they are willing to lie about themselves and their occupation, to deny their fathers, and mothers, and blood relations, and when they have at last obtained a reluctant consent on the part of some impecunious Lord Chamberlain, who all the time knows they are lying, they dress themselves up like so many monkeys, make an awkward entry into a large room filled with royal or noble snobs, where they make a bow, are understood, laughed at, and take their leave happy in their stolen honors. We do not suppose that any of our Californian absentees would consent to bring contempt upon the American name by submitting to this humiliating ordeal; but New York has done much to degrade the national reputation in this respect. If any of our Californians follow their example, we trust they will keep it to themselves.

In September, 1870, there was a shoemaker of the name of Gartrell, aged fifty years, and married, living at 614 Rue St. Honoré. After the defeat of August 6th, when MacMahon was rolled in the mud at Wissembourg, there was a call for the National Guard of Paris to arm for the defense of the city. Gartrell was on hand promptly at roll-call in his handsome uniform, with his musket shining like silver, and his regulation sword-bayonet swinging in his belt by his side. Madame Gartrell stayed in the shop in the Rue St. Honoré and waited upon the customers. As the German army approached the National Guard were kept more constantly in attendance. When the Germans were at Bar le Duc, Gartrell was only allowed to sleep at home. After the detour from Chalons northward toward Belgium to relieve Metz the rules were slightly relaxed, but upon the news of the defeat and capitulation at Sedan the civic troops were kept on the walls both day and night. But of this Gartrell was proud. He loved the life of a soldier, and, above all things, believed in the invincibility of the French army. At times I dropped in at Gartrell's shop (he made my shoes) and chatted with the citizen soldier, blazing in trappings and gold lace, about the situation. He never allowed himself to doubt of the triumph of France. When others had begun to discuss the possible surrender of Paris, this patriot had not ceased speculating upon moving the French frontier to the Rhine, and annexing Rhenish Bavaria, Mentz, and even Cologne. At last the Germans reached the Forest of Bondi, and camped within sight of the walls of Paris. This was the time I had fixed for my departure. All the railroads had been severed except the Rive Gauche, and there would be but one more train by that. Just before starting for the station Mont Parnasse, I looked in upon the shoemaker soldier for a final call. Gartrell, by accident, had himself just come in from the fortifications for a flying visit. "Well," said I, "the Germans are here." "Yes," said he, "but they will never get away alive; we will bury the last one of them in the ditches outside the walls of Paris!" "Are you sure of it?" I asked. "Sure!" he roared, almost like the bellowings of brazen throated Mars; "yes, sure. I am good for a dozen of them myself. They all die before the wall of this city. I have said it." I pressed the hand of the hero and departed. In January, 1871, I reentered Paris with Minister Washburne among the first after the siege was over. The Germans had held the city as in a vice of steel nearly five months, so that nothing without wings could pass in or out, and cold and hunger had done their work. And to add to the misery of the beleaguered population, the winter had been the most rigorous known for many years. The suffering from cold was even more trying upon the poor people than the want of food. Many perished from it. Almost the first visit I paid was to the gallant shoemaker in the Rue St. Honoré. I found him at his bench, but not in the panoply of war. He was in his plain clothes, with no indications of the soldier about the place. "Well," I said, "how did you get on with the Prussians?" "Oh, bad, bad," he murmured. "Why, sir, will you believe me, I was obliged to burn over two hundred of my best lasts to keep from freezing to death."

The Communists of Paris are not to be measured by the following of Denis Kearney in San Francisco. The San Francisco agitator has neither the vices nor the virtues of his Parisian prototype. There can be no permanent labor agitation until there is a permanent labor element. And for a labor element to be permanent the units composing it, the individual workmen, must have come to view their position as workmen as permanent and without hope of change. This can never be while, as is the case in America, the workman of to-day turns up as the speculator or capitalist of ten years hence. The acquisition of the smallest amount of property renders the irresponsible agitator the most conservative of men. Should the effort to raise Denis Kearney the sum of $25,000 be successful, it would inevitably withdraw him from the sand-lots. The possession of one-half of that sum would send him back into California Street as a stock speculator, and a single venture followed by a booming market would cause him to cut Wellock and Barbour and the whole crew dead, and put him to hanging about Flood & O'Brien's corner from morning till night skirmishing for points. To think otherwise would be to think that Kearney as a sand-lot agitator is a better man than Kearney as a stock gambler a year or two ago. It is more likely that he is not as good. The Paris Communist never speculates. He is born a workman and must die one.

The ARGONAUT is in almost weekly receipt of communications from the Eastern States and Europe from persons who desire to become correspondents of our "very valuable and widely circulated journal." These are usually accompanied by specimen copies, of which we give a bad example of the very worst. This is about the average nonsense to which the American reader is treated, and it is from such reliable (?) information that he forms his opinions of public men in Europe and makes his estimate of public affairs:

"Cluseret reached Paris from New Orleans in 1868. He was placed on the list of suspected persons in advance of his arrival. The police, in fact, had learned that he was coming, and he was marked as "dangerous" on the books of the Department. Yet, with the exception that he lived at Belleville, the quarter of the Communists, and kept company with the working people, there seemed no reason for alarm. He was once arrested for some pretended conspiracy, and appealed to the American Minister, General Dix, who obtained his release as an American citizen. In April, 1871, he came formally to the surface as chief of the Revolutionary party. Cluseret was Emperor for a certain time. Napoleon or Caesar could say no more. I called on him in the height of his power. An American had been detected reading a letter while sitting on a bench in the Champs Elysées. The sergeant de ville making the arrest was sure he was drawing a plan of the Palais d'Industrie, with a view of conveying the information to Versailles. The man was locked up in the conciergerie, with a ball and chain to his leg. I called on Cluseret to obtain his discharge. The moment I announced that I was a Californian I had gained my cause. The Chief refused to hear the particulars. It was enough, he declared, that a Californian wanted the man released. The order was made out, but I was detained to dinner, when I met Miot, Paschal Grousset, Rossel, Regère, Gambon, Delescluze, Raoul Regault, Dombrowski, and other leaders of the Commune. When the party broke up, which was not till one o'clock, I was escorted to my hotel by six soldiers, where I found that my friend, the American prisoner, had been conducted several hours before. Within one month every individual at the dinner, saving Cluseret and myself, had been condemned and shot to death by order of the Versailles Government. Cluseret made his escape disguised as a hackman, and landed safely in the United States.

"I was in the ancient city of Tours when Leon Gambetta alighted from his balloon fresh from Paris, prepared to organize the army of the Loire for one more effort to save France. I was the only American in Tours, and Gambetta recognized me as a sympathizing Republican. I dined with him daily. I admired him; and, sitting on his left side, which is the blind side, talked to him of Lafayette and Washington, of Bunker Hill and Yorktown. I love Gambetta for many reasons. I love him, first, because he is a true republican and patriot; I love him because he is the most eloquent man in France—he is Mirabeau revisiting the France of the nineteenth century; I love him because he is a true gentleman and good fellow. Gambetta's eye (he has but one) is equal to the two eyes of any other man in Europe; and the vacant space where the other eye ought to be expresses as much as the single eye of any other man. And the manner of his losing his eye was quite characteristic of the man. He told me the circumstance with the utmost good-humor the first time I dined with him. It seems he punched it out himself with a two-pronged carving fork on a wager made with a friend that he could punch them both out at a single stroke with that instrument. Luckily, not only for France but for mankind, the fork was too narrow in the gauge and only destroyed one of his optics, the other prong burying itself in the bridge of his nose. Gambetta was so chagrined at his failure that he resolved never to gamble again, and he assured me that he never has since. He keeps the lost eye in a vial of spirits, which he always carries about with him, but the carving fork he threw away. Gambetta only stayed in Tours a week the first time he came, returning by the same balloon to bring out his wife. Madame Gambetta, like her husband, is also blind of an eye, but it is the right she has lost; and, like him, she extracted the eye herself, but not upon a wager, as she is pious and never indulges in play. Madame Gambetta took out her eye with a butter knife, simply out of respect for her husband, whom she always speaks of as the greatest man living—always declaring that she does not wish to see any better than he can. After the return of the balloon with the Gambetta family, I dined with them almost every day, and discussed Lafayette, General Grant, and other matters of interest. This is about all I know with certainty concerning the Gambettas."

A NIGHT AT POINT CYPRESS.

It fell from out the book I read,
Beside my winter fire, this morn;
A fragrant, faded leaf or two,
A blossom, with its blushes gone—
Smell it, and throw it by!

It was a moonlight inspiration of mine, and I became the "prisoner of the idea" until I conquered it by confiding it to Hugh, whose cool intellect always crystallizes the nascent products of my imagination. So the following afternoon, two hours before sunset, four of our party, who had been spending the summer together in California's old capital, Monterey, jumped into Hugh's three-seated wagon, with a gray blanket, a towel, and a sandwich in our hands, and the love of the unconventional strong in our hearts.

Experience has taught us all (even Martha, his sister) to place a restful reliance on Hugh, relative to matches, fresh water, and the wherewithal for a camp-fire. Sarcastic Clarice cruelly remarked, as we drove off: "Each man for himself and the devil for us all!" A subtle knowledge of human nature rendered Hugh apparently impregnable, for he pretended he did not hear, but muttered below his breath, for my edification:

"A jest's prosperity lies in the ear
Of him who hears it."

Hugh and I sat in front, and Martha and Clarice on the middle seat; while on the back seat were strapped various bags and bundles, mostly pertaining to the welfare of the horses.

We turned to wave farewell to civilization and orthodoxy, and then away we flew, racing with the sun, for we must get camped before dark.

We drove straight through the forest that covers the low hills to the west of Monterey. Restful, curving hills, whose fringe of pine and redwood looks like the rare lace-work of sea weeds, floated out against a sunset sky.

Several times we stopped to gather logs and brush for our camp-fire; then on we went for about three miles, where, just as we reached the edge of the grove, we ran into a fog-bank, lying couchant until the sun should offer no further resistance to its march. Our unflinching oracle, Hugh, was immediately referred to as to whether the fog would detract from our night's pleasure. His characteristically laconic answer, "No," instantly became the germ, in three feminine hearts, of a quiet complacency, that, if analyzed, would prove Hugh's omniscience beyond any caviling doubt.

After leaving the woods, a few minutes' drive took us to the ocean's rock-bound edge. Earth, air, and sky seemed to meet and lose their identity in the great mass of gray fog that came rolling in relentlessly.

We turned south, and drove through the heavy sand lying between the ocean and the woods. The air was sweet with the fragrance of the pink sand-verbena, that is so exquisite creeping over the brown sand-dunes.

The gray light was fading when we reached Cypress Point, a rugged promontory that juts out into the ocean, a few acres of which are exclusively covered by that weird anomaly in the history of trees, the Monterey cypress. A strange place even by daylight, with its beautiful but ghostly trees, that stand so stiff and still, and lack so totally the sweet humanity of other trees; where a bird is seldom seen, and a cricket never heard; and where no brook is to be found, with its cheery little song. Sad and unique it stands, a place of fairies, charms, and witches, with a nameless horror brooding over it in silence.

We stopped in a sheltered dell within a stone's throw of the ocean, and in ten minutes Hugh had the horse tethered, and a bright fire started in a "close dungeon of innumerable boughs," just as the trembling Twilight fled in all her evanescent beauty at the approach of Night, slow and tragic, with the conscious dignity of tested power.

Our primitive housekeeping cares attended to, we doffed our long skirts, and presented to Hugh's long-accustomed eyes three figures in pretty bloomers, and then our sense of delicious freedom was complete.

Our eyes soon grew accustomed to the strange light made by the full moon, still low in the eastern horizon, covered by the drifting fog. Before us lay the ocean, whose monotonous roar seemed but a grander silence; behind us and on the left was a grove, a silent sea of cypress; on the right, in an amphitheatre of trees, our fire burned brightly, making an odd but cozy ingleside.

After supplying the fire with logs large enough to last for several hours, we wandered down to the ocean, our ardor somewhat damped at the hopeless persistency of the fog; but Hugh smiled knowingly at our innuendoes. We climbed far out on the rocky cliffs until almost surrounded by the white, restless waves that fumed at our feet, near enough for us to feel their awful power. There we sat, sometimes with one accord, silent; then, singing our very hearts out in ecstasy; then, a long silence, which Clarice broke at last with her intense voice, speaking as one who fears no misunderstanding:

"This pitiful warfare between the rocks and waves seems to me the bitter war between Sin and Virtue. The stern, gray rocks are Virtue—negative always, and cruel as death in its sense of conscious rectitude. And surely we see in these waves the awful beauty of Sin! See how they throw their clinging arms around their silent enemy, and lay their faces—white with the passion of tempting—on his cold, unresponsive heart, and then fall back pale and quivering, like Love's lips scorned by Change. I hate myself that it is so, but my sympathies are ever with the waves; the rocks seem to me nought but annihilation!"

"As usual, Miss Clarice, you look at things morbidly; or, at least, you only give expression to this side of your nature," said Hugh.

"Let no dog bark!" cried Clarice, in a stage whisper.

"I think," he continued, ignoring her banter, "the subtle charm of the ocean could be analyzed, although Ruskin calls it, 'trying to paint a soul.'"

"I suppose, reduced to its lowest denomination, we find it resolves itself into salt and clams, both of which we immediately relegate to their proper department, the stomach," laughed Martha, with a view to bringing the conversation down to a more comfortable level.

"One of the sea's greatest charms is its simple reflection of our subjective moods," calmly continued Hugh, with the dogmatism of a man addressing a feminine audience. "I have in my mind an illustration of this: Last week, when we drove out here in the warm sunshine, I recollect thinking, as I watched the breakers, how like they were to merry children at play in senseless ecstasy. To-night they reflect another mood: they typify the great, restless longing that is the crown of humanity; its highest phases men call proofs of immortality—its lowest, ennui."

"And its intermediate, dyspepsia!" persisted Martha, imitating his tone.

Hugh was visited by a sudden consciousness of having been beguiled into unwonted loquacity by the hour and scene; and I could not help smiling at the impatient shake he gave himself after springing to his feet, saying: "Come, no more nonsense. It's too chilly here for you girls!"

Just as we turned to go, laughing at some joke of Clarice's, Hugh cried "Hush!" with a harsh intensity that startled us all. He simply pointed to the sky, and then we stood as if spell-bound. The moon had struggled above all the curtain of fog that hung about the horizon, and, just as Hugh spoke, sailed slowly out into the clear sea of stars directly above our heads. It was as if we had hoped and prayed for the coming of a dear friend, and, at last, when least expected, the great joy of her presence had come upon us.

We stood thrilled as if in the presence of the Unknown. I felt, rather than saw, Hugh's hand creep up and bare his head; and then I knew that, whatever earthly obstacles barred our union, this man's soul and mine were one that moment in the great peace of spirit-land; and my hand crept into his, and I loved him the more that he was not conscious of it.

How long we stood thus I can not tell. Clarice broke the spell by saying, in her enthusiastic way:

"I understand now what James means, in his 'Passionate Pilgrim,' by 'the mind with a great passionate throb achieves a magical synthesis of its impressions.' I feel Nature as I never did before."

"I verily believe you people will go moon-mad if we stay here any longer. For the love of sanity, do let us go up to the fire, have some cheese and crackers, and be mundane!" cried our sweet Martha. So she ruled us all, as often the weakest does, after a great wave of passion has exhausted the very being of the stronger.

We turned our thoughts and faces earthward, and strolled through the bright moonlight toward camp.

"Now for solid comfort!" said Martha, with long-pent enthusiasm, as she bustled about, directing the renewal of the fire, and bringing to light the contents of her "Commissary Department," as Hugh called a certain little bag she always wore strapped around her waist.

"No matter how hungry you are to-night, be satisfied with this, and save your sandwiches for breakfast," she advised, dealing out, with comical exactness, her provisions of crackers, cheese, and beer—which last we discovered in the wagon, although Hugh vowed his mind was a blank as to how the bottles got there.

How ambrosial everything tasted! And certainly the gods must have sent to St. Louis for their nectar. The warmth and beer soon brought into play another part of our natures, and, for the next hour, Thalia was our muse.

Hugh was, as usual, our kind and appreciative audience as he lay smoking, with his feet to the fire. Martha, with her innate goodness, joined when we needed her, but the spontaneous mirth and mischief emanated from Clarice and me. With an instinctive knowledge that our dress, the fire-light, and the scene would with the eyes of our auditors into leniency, we dared anything.

I regretted the absence of music, and when next we noticed Hugh he was sitting on a log near by, flute in hand, awaiting orders; so with this and Martha's voice we gave them the "cachucha" to the life. Then followed a race around the fire, with bets from the excited audience that would have impoverished the Rothschilds. Then scenes from opera bouffe; then a travesty on poor, dear old "Casta Diva," for which I have never quite forgiven myself; then tableaux, which our audience hissed, declaring them to be hopelessly enigmatical. So, announcing that "to be great is to be misunderstood," we rang down the curtain.

In a burst of wild enthusiasm I started for a tree, intending to cool my ardor among its topmost branches. At this Hugh made various derogatory remarks relative to the symmetry of my nose, and that to break it again would be a sin against humanity, etc.

"An ill-flavored thing, sir, but mine own," was my answer, as I swung myself up to the lowest branch of the tree and flew up like a squirrel.

The closely-matted fibres of the cypress, viewed from the outside, are a rich dark green, with few limbs visible, but underneath there is not a vestige of green to be seen, only a net-work of branches and twigs.

When I put my head out through the thick foliage that formed the slanting roof of my tree, the view I obtained was grand. The great billows of dark cypress lay in silence round me as if turned by the spell of sorrow, like Niobe, into stone; beyond, lay the restless, moonlit sea just as we left it, and yet my mood so changed! It seemed like the great, changeless love of the Infinite that awaits our recognition through all time. And then came back my old wonder, whether a human soul is not a lesser thing than the grandest phases of nature; and my self-contempt drove me down the tree.

Looking from my height down through the net-work of brown limbs, how weird they looked grouped around the fire, like gnomes come up for an airing!

Hugh, with the firelight softening his strong, rugged face as he lay at full length smoking silently, seemingly lost in that masculine amusement of trying alternately all the means of exit that tobacco-smoke is heir to.

Clarice was sitting with her imperious head on Martha's shoulder, each reading her fate in the fire; the former with the old bitterness in her face—a bitterness born of being out of joint with the age—forming an odd contrast with the sweet content of Martha's lovely face.

"Hullo, Will of the Wisp! I thought of going in search of you, but I knew your spirit was on one of its aeronautic expeditions, and that you would not come down until some of the gas escaped," said Hugh, as I rejoined them.

"I do confess to a temporary collapse," I answered, warming my feet and hands by the grateful blaze.

"I should go mad if I camped out here a week; mad from an unnatural mental clearness that seems prophetic," announced Clarice, suddenly raising her head and tossing back the short black ringlets from her flushed Murillo face.

"These first vivid impressions and their effect would wear entirely away after the third day," answered Hugh. "This fact is grateful, although humiliating, when sorrow comes, but safe, if harrowing to the unphilosophical, when applied to joy."

"I presume, then, that a man really tries not to tire of his spouse, especially as it is a struggle which concerns his own great comfort!" And Clarice broke into her "woman's rights" laugh, as Martha called it.

"Am I to understand that you make the application to man's greatest sorrow or greatest joy?" queried Hugh.

She gave him a look of pseudo scorn with those brave, black eyes of hers, and said, with a gesture of abject humility:

"As the Philistines were slain by the weapon you wield so well, is it to be expected that I should attempt a resistance?"

The laugh that greeted her sally, and in which Hugh heartily joined, changed our mood, and out into the moonlight we strolled once more, Clarice leading the way singing to some daring improvisation:

"This is the fairy-land. O spite of spite!
We talk with goblins, owls, and elvish sprites."

Through the grove we wandered, trusting a safe return to Hugh's well-developed bump of locality. Under the trees it was as dark, cold, and silent as the grave, while here and there a vivid ray of moonlight pierced the gloom. Once we came to a group of trees whose foliage formed an oval frame through which the moon, a star or two, and a passing fleecy cloud were brought into beautiful relief. Then we crossed clear spaces, covered with the burnished summer grass, that shone like gold in the moonlight. About us lay trees, dead and uprooted, looking hideously human in the white light. They are ashy gray, and grotesque beyond a mere conception. Some lie in stiffened agony, like corpses struck with death in their writhings, with horrid, palsied arms raised in mute appeal, and the sough of the wind through the tree-tops thrills you as if they sighed. Others are like mammoth cranes, with their long beaks raised skyward. One seemed a gladiator striving to regain his feet after receiving his death-wound; another was "one of Nature's private jokes," Clarice said. It looked like a huge baboon trying to stand on its head, and making the most ludicrous contortions with his legs and arms. Some trees were covered with long gray moss hanging straight in the air, and looking like the moonshine dripping from the boughs. The pungent odor of the yerba buena, that trailed its fresh, green length along the ground, filled the air with a sweet fragrance wrung from it by our vandal feet. Thus we wandered, heedless of time, "learning the language of another world."

As we at last turned our faces toward camp, Martha and Clarice walked ahead, their voices coming back to us with weird effect as they sang "Lorelei."

"Little one," said Hugh's deep, tender voice in my ear, "tell me what the sea said to you to-night. I am selfish and wanted the dear spirit-reading all to myself, and so gave you no audience down on the cliffs."

"I have lived so much since we were down on the rocks, felt and thought so many things, that it is difficult to recall an event a few hours old; but I think, at first, the rocks suggested to me the great power and dignity of conservatism. Then something changed the direction of my sympathies, and the waves seemed the great, pure 'over-soul,' as Emerson calls it, fretted by narrow conventionalities, beating ever against the cold rocks of bigotry and moral near-sightedness, and often lashed into a wordless, impotent fury by misunderstanding and injustice. The world is full of examples of the awful power of weakness ruling arbitrarily and blighting hopelessly so many lives whose very greatness places them more entirely in its power, and whose keen, grand sense of duty alone binds them slaves forever."

"I understand, love," was all the answer Hugh made, but it covered a past and a future in its meaning.

In silence we rejoined the others, who were awaiting our approach, at a loss which direction to take.

"By the way, what o'clock might it be, I wonder?" asked Martha, after we were once more gathered around the fire.

"I left my watch at home so that time and the world-external might not touch us for this once," answered Hugh.

"But I know there are only a few remaining hours of darkness, and I vote we devote them to Morpheus."

Clarice rebelled, but was overruled by the majority. We followed Hugh's example and rolled ourselves up in our blankets, contrived some pillows that were guiltless of down, and lay with our feet to the fire.

We were too excited and uncomfortable to sleep well, and laughed and growled the night away; and so the peep of day found us four very forlorn-looking individuals. We ran down through the fresh, bracing air to a little, sandy cove, and there performed our primitive toilets; and very grateful felt the cold, clean water on our feverish faces.

Just as a faint pink began to tinge the sky, we snatched our sandwiches, and, eating them, flew up the hill back of camp in time for the whole effect of sunrise. The canvas was superb. Piles of gray cumulus along the horizon, that took the colors grandly; the great ocean waste that blushed and dimpled in the "grave tenderness" of the dawnlight. It was beautiful beyond description, and washed from our hearts all the fever of our night's experience.

We wandered down the hill in the sweet, clear light, and an animated, but not remarkably profound, discussion upon the comparative force of color and form in Nature brought us once more to the ocean's edge. Taking the opportunity the low tide offered, we explored caves, gathered shells and pebbles in the warm sands, and climbed over the low rocks that are covered with exquisite natural aquariums filled with dusky green anemones, purple sea-urchins, scarlet starfish, rainbow-tinted abalone shells, and brown, green, pink, and red algae of every form and texture.

And so time flew by until the sun was high in the heavens. A unanimous acknowledgment of homesickness covered the secret pangs of hunger that had attacked each one of us, so in twenty minutes we were conventionally attired and in the wagon en route for Monterey.

We did not leave the Point without a glance back and a sigh, and almost in silence we drove home across the glaring sands and through the sweet smelling pines,

BURIED.

I.

To die! To be a silence hid
In some dark coffin's closed lid,
To move not, speak not, and yet feel
The dumb worm crawl from head to heel.
Imprisoned, with a mountain pressed
In hard, cold pain upon the breast,
Shut from the loving grass and sky,
In the close earth to slinking lie;
No more of doubt, or hope, or pain;
No more of sun, or cloud, or rain;
Only a sinking utterly
As sinks a pebble in the sea
And ceases on the earth to be.

II.

To die! To find at last a rest
Full of fair dreams, and dispossessed
Of bitter words, and stinging sneers
Of coward men, and free from fears
Of calm or tempest. There we wait
And all sweet things, or soon or late
With noiseless falter fill our dreams.
We do not see the crystal streams,
But we are of them, and we know
The heart of winds, and mantling snow;
We do not smile, or mock, or weep—
The universe is broad and deep,
And we are hushed awhile in sleep.

NILES, CAL., February, 1879.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

Twilight.

There are some hours when silence fills the world,
As once, when down the hollow night was hurled
The law of light, and the great earth was stilled
And breathless to the echo, while space filled
To its far limits with the sweeping beams,
Which widened to the land of night and dreams.

And twilight is the echo of that hour,
Hushing the world when night asserts its power,
As daylight falls from out the pallid sky.
The hour hath neither like nor harmony
Between the thoughts it bringeth to the mind
And the cold speech in which they are confined.

Oh, that the thrill of that first twilight-time
Might pulse within the measure of this rhyme,
That all who read should feel the sacred fires
Burned on high altars; that the old desires,
Stilled into sleep, might leave the soul-life free
To draw inspired dreams from poetry.

NORTH COLUMBIA, January, 1879.

MAY N. HAWLEY.

Old Josette.

She wanders here and there,
With dull, unhappy air,
As if life were but one grand regret;
Coarse and faded is her gown,
And her hands are hard and brown
Toiling for her daily bread, poor Josette!

The fretful ills of life
With her make constant strife—
She was never known to conquer yet;
She wearies friend and foe
With her tongue's incessant flow,
And her temper is not sweet, poor Josette!

Yet she is kind of heart,
And takes in gentle part
What an evil one could not forget;
For, along the village streets,
The thoughtless ones she meets
Have their jest at crazy old Josette.

Ah, once Josette was young!
The golden sunbeams clung
To the tresses of her rosy pet;
And the sky's serenest blue
Was not sweeter than the hue
Of the shining eyes of "Pitie Josette."

That poor old wrinkled face
With girlhood's laughing grace,
Dimpled o'er from dawn till bright sunset;
Not a bird-note ever rang
Clearer than the voice that sang
The merry songs of young Josette.

Now oft she sighs and weeps,
But in her heart she keeps
A thought that comforts even yet;
Though weary, sad, and old,
In hunger ill, and cold,
"Le bon Dieu est pour moi," says Josette,

And He will know His own,
When grief and life are flown;
Not a care or pain will He forget;
And her years will fall away—
Fair and young, in that glad day,
Will shine the face of "Old Josette!"

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879.

JULIA H. S. BUGEIA.

Some Day.

Some day our hopes will be fulfilled—

Some day;

The weary, troubled breast be stilled

Some day.

Life's sorrow will not tarry long,

Some day our grief will change to song—

Some day.

Some day our dreams will all come true;

Some day

The cloudy skies will change to blue;

Some day

The aching heart will cease to burn;

Some day the old love will return—

Some day.

Some day our prayers will answered be—

Some day;

The mountain stream will reach the sea

Some day.

Be still, my anxious soul, and wait;

Some day thou'lt reach life's wicket gate—

Some day.

Some day the weary feet will rest—

Some day;

The hands be crossed upon the breast

Some day.

'Mid earthly gloom we close our eyes,

Some day to wake in Paradise—

Some day.

Petaluma, CAL., January, 1879.

CLARENCE U. THOMAS.

ABOUT WOMEN.

The young ladies of Cincinnati have dinners from which the masculine gender is banished. They are called "dove dinners."

We no longer question the propriety of considering vessels in the feminine gender. They run each other down almost every day in the English Channel.

"And they were talking so unkindly of you, dearest Louisa, and—" "And what were they saying?" "Saying that you painted your face; and I told them that it was untrue, and that your color was only erysipelas."

If young ladies attending church would give more attention to the number of the hymn the pastor gives out, and not so much attention to the number of him that are in church, they would not be so apt to sing one hymn while the congregation are singing another.

A new word of French extraction has been added to the great family of the English language—Vicereine. The London Graphic has published the portraits of the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise as those of "the Viceroy and Vicereine of Canada." It has been cordially accepted.

In the Sphinx Sarah Bernhardt wears a ball dress of pale yellow satin, with an apron to match; the basque terminates with a fringe of lime blossoms, and the train is looped up with guilder-roses and bronze chenille leaves; the sleeves are mere strips of lime blossoms.

A young couple in Hardin County recently eloped and were married. The father of the girl followed to interpose, but a device, artfully planned, led him astray, and he caught a closely-veiled woman, who proved to be his daughter's friend, but not his daughter. Meanwhile the runaways had found a Justice.

A woman lecturer advertises herself in Providence as a "child of nature, wearing the unmistakable crown of genius, and doing her share in the ever-appointed work of genius—the work of 'making the whole world kin.'" She brings with her the electricity of the North—the brilliancy of the aurora borealis—and all who meet her are magnetized.

Very frequently the "ideas" of new and popular fashions in women's attire emanate from the brain of some celebrated actress, and it is a well-known fact that a great many are suggested by the dresses worn on the stage. The panier has its rise in the dresses worn in the play of Joseph Balsamo, and were further illustrated in the opera of Le Petit Duc, whereas the old-fashioned dress of the Directoire is much due to Madame l'Archiduc.

A well-dressed, middle-aged woman occupied rooms several days in the Brunswick Hotel, Boston, paid her bills in full, and was liberal with gifts to the employés. On her departure she ordered an elaborate supper for five hundred persons, to be sent to her suburban home, accompanied by cooks and waiters. The stuff was taken at the appointed time to the place indicated, but the woman had no home there. She was a lunatic, and had escaped from an asylum.

A woman starts to cross the street, and when she gets one-third or half way over she sees a team approaching; the driver, in nearly every instance watches her movements and seeks to drive in behind her. If she keeps on her way, all is well. If she stands still, she is perfectly safe. But here comes in the strange and fatal idiosyncrasy of her sex. Just as the driver thinks he can safely drive behind her she stops, starts back a few steps, and, unless the driver is prompt, and draws his horse back on its haunches, the woman is under its feet, or knocked down.

Five French provincial journals were tried by the Paris Correctional Police for a libel on Madame Paul de Cassagnac, consisting in a false representation that she had instituted a suit for separation from her husband, accompanied by remarks of a defamatory character. The responsible editors were all sentenced to fifteen days' imprisonment, one thousand francs fine, and the costs of inserting the judgment in six journals. M. Paul de Cassagnac says in the Pays, this is the first time in his life that he has appealed to a court of law for a libel.

The Spanish beauty's figure is rounded and graceful—she has, unfortunately, a tendency in after years to grow stout—and her bearing such that no other race of women we know of can pretend to. The little arched foot treads the ground lightly but proudly, and her step and carriage are the very poetry of motion. The robe, which has generally a sweeping train, is worn somewhat clingingly, showing the contour of the form, but not impeding free action in every movement. A gauzy mantilla, falling artistically from the admirably arranged luxuriant tresses, is the simple head-dress, with perhaps the addition of a rose or camellia, planted just where one would have it. And she carries a dangerous, and often killing weapon, which in other hands but hers loses its power—the fan. How it opens and shuts with a dexterous, yet careless turn of the ivory wrist; how it taps the pink tips of the dimpled fingers, to give emphasis to some arch expression; how, in the sun-glare, it is spread and poised gracefully as a shield against the rays; how, when desirous of addressing unnoticed a gallant and stabbing him with a glance of the lustrous eyes, it is made to act as a screen; how, by an almost imperceptible movement, it beckons an expectant but irresolute admirer; how it imposes silence on some too presuming caballero, by being passed lightly over the speaker's lips; how it indicates impatience in its quick fluttering; and how it is sometimes so manipulated that its softly-cadenced breath fans both the wielder and the supremely happy lover. Yes; the Spanish woman is by no means deficient of the elementary powers of fascination, and if one can only induce her to descend from the realms of artificial complimentary speech, and to speak naturally, she is perfectly charming. She has a fashion of saying what she thinks—in this she differs from the lords of her race—and of calling a spade a spade. She is bright, and even sparkling in her badinage, which, however, seldom rises above triviality; and if one would not break the momentary attractive spell, one should never attempt to change the superficial character of the conversation.

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Sir: Your recent article on the temperance question meets the approval of many of your readers, but it needs correction on a single point. The advocates of temperance are not confined to the "goody-goody" sort of people alone; many of its warmest friends are as depraved a class as are some of the editors of the San Francisco newspapers. I suspect that some of them could be found, even, who advocate suicide, and would call it heroic for a miserable devil to cut his own throat. The writer of this makes no profession of any elaborate amount of piety, but he confesses himself as strongly interested in this temperance reform as any of the "goody-goody" people. He has good and sufficient reasons for his interest in this temperance movement, but they need not be specified here. How anybody who has not actually joined hands with the devil can stand in any other attitude no man can tell. There is one aspect of this subject to which I wish to call the attention of your readers. Six towns in this State have been founded on strictly temperance principles. Among them are Lompoc and Westminster. The corporators sell town lots only to those who pledge themselves to exclude the liquor traffic. They want to get rid of the curse of the saloon. But the Constitution and laws of California, with the Supreme Court at their back, protect and defend any man who can find a place to sell liquor within the limits of any one of these towns. The people can rid themselves of the nuisance only by resort to mob law. Could there be a more damnable outrage than that the State should thus help to force on an unwilling community this villainous business? Won't you employ your powerful pen to persuade those chaps at Sacramento to engraft the "local option" clause in the new Constitution? Yours truly, S. JOHNSON.

PETALUMA, January 31, 1879.

[Our correspondent (howbeit overmuch given to the up-setting sin of temperance people—intemperate language) takes his point well. It should, in our opinion, be possible for a temperance colony to exclude the liquor traffic. The advantage of these colonies is another matter; they contain, as a rule, only persons who would have been temperate in any community, and by withdrawing themselves from among us toppers, they throw away their chances of converting us. That is not the bravery of the true reformer; it is not by example alone that men are persuaded to the right—particularly by an example that is remote and isolated. It was not by establishing Christian colonies and apostolic towns that Paul and his successors fought against the powers of darkness.—EDITOR.]

What is He?

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Sir: A recent editorial in a prominent daily has taken the ground that Lord Beaconsfield is not a Jew, as he is a professed member of the Church of England. I should like to ask, what is the race of a man (for to be a Jew is to be one of a distinct race of mankind) whose father was elected to the office of Parnass of the Synagogue, and whose mother was the sister of Joshua Basevi, the celebrated Jewish architect? Being thus descended, I should like to know whether the fact that he was marked in accordance with the everlasting covenant between the Almighty and Abraham, receiving the sacred rite of the circumcision, makes a man a Jew or not? The Jews have a sufficient number of great men to spare you all you need. But let me ask you, sir, suppose that you owned a fine blooded horse, and it should announce: "I am no horse; henceforth I will be a jackass"—would that affect your inventory of stock? Against the parallel absurdity I protest as an ethnologist, and also as Yours truly, A JEW.

[This gentleman is so correct in his reasoning that he really could have afforded to spare us that "parallel absurdity." We are Christians, but we have feelings, all the same.—EDITOR.]

Chinese Cheap Labor.

MR. EDITOR:—You are a—dy—ng ————, when you come and tele us poor people to do without chines labor while you people of means employ them to the detriment of white Workingmen, you d— ————. How can you expect a white workingman to pay for any labor at all if he has not enough to support himself and family being obliged to work for the single loosy Chinaman's wages or be idle one is as bad as the other. Now you —ng chinamen chut up your dirty filthy mouh or we will go and spit in your face break your press and cut your ever d—to h— Chinese head Remember.

P. S. If you ever talk that way again well sine our 1.000. Names in your dirty blood.

[We are ever willing to give the Workingmen a hearing in these columns, but regret that in permitting this statesman to expound his views we have felt compelled (in deference to those who hold opinions of an opposite character) to somewhat abate by dashes the force of his more unanswerable arguments.—EDITOR.]

There is no leading newspaper or magazine now that does not number one or more lady editors. They have proved to be better adapted to many branches of literature than men. Mary Mapes Dodge has successfully edited St. Nicholas during the past five years. Ella Farnham has made a great achievement on the Wide-Awake. Mary Booth conducts Harper's Bazar. Mrs. Croly (Jennie June) is as well known as Grant. Mary Clemmer is high authority on all literary and political questions. Mrs. Dr. Conner ("E. A."), of the Cincinnati Commercial, is one of the best general utility editors on the staff of that paper.

Mr. C. H. Harding, a well known English man of letters, is in California having a look at us. Mr. Harding writes his impressions in special correspondence to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the Chicago Tribune; his letters being interesting, scholarly, and distinguished by uncommon acuteness of observation.

When we pray for clean hearts and heavenly minds, our prayers answer our prayers.

FEMININE FOLLYSWADDLES.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I suppose woman's innate desire for beautifying herself may be said to date from the beginning of all things. Certainly all the earliest annals of fashion we have show the crude efforts of the undeveloped feminine in that direction—in the smearing of the face and body with oils and unguents, and the painting of the lips and cheeks with various dyes. According to the Prophet Enoch, Azazel taught the secret of cosmetics to the Jewish women long before the deluge; and mythology tells us how Venus herself revealed the infinite possibilities of the cosmetic table to Helen of Troy. But although prophets and satirists, and even the enlightened modern critic, have attacked the fashion from time immemorial, it still lives; and really the most serious objections to be urged against the practice are the danger to the health from the use of deleterious compositions, and the shockingly bad manner in which it is too frequently carried out. The dressing case of the French woman of society is the acme of cosmetic art; and next to Paris itself, I believe, San Francisco ranks in the use of "fards" (as the French call all these beautifiers) in quantity, yet, alas! not in quality; for although there are some perfect complexions to be seen, there are a dozen bad "make-ups" to one good one. Why women with the lovely olive skins of the Spanish and Hebrew types, that so abound here, should so disfigure themselves by the use of dead white preparations, passes my feeble comprehension. The effect is so horribly unnatural as to be that of an actual mask, often increased by the very perceptible high-water mark left around the chin and back of the ears. The only "fard" suitable for a brunette is of a pale cream tint, that blends with the natural olive hue, and just softens the disagreeable glossiness that often goes with that complexion. For blondes an entirely different "fard" should be used—a rosy, or at best an ivory white. Then there are "fards" expressly for evening use, adapted to the peculiarities of gas-light (by the way, the electric light will have none of those unpleasant effects, every color maintaining its exact shade under it), and "fards" for street and house. The best to use is that in form of a paste, which is put on with the finger, and "blended" with a rabbit's foot. Here is a box, the contents of which provided the daily "make-up" of a charming French woman I once knew. She was a demi-brune, and being on the line, as it were, between the two extremes, availed herself of the "fards" belonging to each—that is, for day time she preserved the brunette type, and for the evening, lightened her whole appearance by the use of blonde "fards." There were white, and rose, and cream colors, in paste, for the face and hands; liquids for the shoulders and arms; pencils, for the brows; koeheil, for the lashes, and to elongate the line at the angle of the eye; azure "fard," for the drawing of artificial veins, and to give a soft, languid expression; powder for the nails; scented and oiled gloves, to be worn at night; depilatories and dyes, for possible gray locks; carnation paste, for the lips; pastilles and perfumed waters for the breath; dentifrice; eye-washes, to preserve the humid expression of the orbs; rabbit's foot, sponges, tweezers, "stumps," files, and nail-polishers. These preliminaries and subsequent proceedings were observed by her: A thorough cleansing of the skin by use of warm water and a weak dilution of ammonia, then rinsing with cold water and drying with a soft towel, after which a little rice powder to thoroughly dry the skin—which was allowed a few moments' rest before applying the mixtures—well rubbed in with the finger and then wiped lightly over with a linen cloth. The rabbit's foot then spread the surface perfectly smooth, as well as blended the rosy "fards" laid on in the same manner afterward. The result was a brightening and softening of every feature, without one disagreeable effect. Judgment must be used in selecting the proper kinds of reds for the particular complexion, as the rosy tints of a brunette cheek are essentially different from those of a blonde. So, too, in the make up of the lips by artificial means. Nine out of ten overdo the matter by too much both of white and color. As to dress fashions proper, there are various rumors afloat, one being that we are to return next summer to wide skirts, fastened at the waist by plaits or gathers. Short costumes are decidedly less collant than formerly. The pretty, old-style "Bertha" is back again in use for low-necked corsages, and for demi-toilets an extremely low V-shaped waist, filled in with a plastron of lace or muslin, is the reigning fancy. Trains are now strictly round, instead of square or pointed as formerly, and for ball dresses are made extremely long. The new style of tournure, fastened under the back breadths of the dress, with only a narrow lace edging showing from underneath, is worn exclusively, and although the princesse form is still preserved, considerable fullness is allowed at the back and hips. Chenille embroidery is all the rage, and the more delicate and fade are the colors the more fashionable it is, and the more expensive, as each dress is embroidered after the breadths are cut. Long jackets, formerly known as habit basques, are indicated as probable favorites for the street this spring. These are especially handsome when opened over vests of embroidered velvet or brocaded satin. A sort of mantelet to be worn with the coming Louis XVI. costumes is made round at the back and on the front ends, finished by a round hood. The costume itself consists of a short skirt, with one deep plaited flounce, a Camargo corsage, open in front, and panniers plaited on the hips. Fabrics, specially designed for these suits, are to be introduced; they will have the very fine Louis XVI. stripes strewn over with small flowers; ruches à la vieille, made of the dress material or of black foulard silk. Mantles of this last mentioned material, by the way, will be used in the spring, and will doubtless become popular, as it does not catch the dust easily and is very light. As to coiffures, they grow more and more compact with every succeeding moon. Bands, almost flat, but puffing out slightly toward the ears, the back hair arranged in two braids, which are fastened at the crown with a Spanish comb, are one of the new styles, although the crimped and fluffy crown braids, with short curls at the ends, are still much worn. Fancy borders for handkerchiefs continue to be popular. We hear mention made of one New York house selling $1,200 worth in one day. There are some decided novelties this season in fancy costumes, for which every one interested in such matters should return thanks. The old and much used "characters" were getting dreadfully tiresome. Japanese, Turkish, and India dresses, French Guard uniforms, old English costumes, and even student's caps and gowns à la Tennyson's "Princess," are among the handsomest. The French Guard uniform is specially attractive. It has a short, round skirt of blue and white striped satin, with blue satin revers down each side, studded with gilt buttons. The Louis Quatorze coat is of blue satin, and has a vest with broad collar, cuffs, and pockets of white satin, edged with gold braid. A tri-colored canteen hangs from the shoulders, and the hat is of white felt turned up in three points at the brim. Minnie Hauck's success in the new opera of Carmen has made her gypsy dress an exceedingly popular one with masquerade goers. The little ones are not forgotten, and for the five o'clock "teas," now so fashionable in the juvenile world, fancy costumes are not infrequently worn. For these, Mother Goose supplies some appropriate models. The fancy dresses seen on Dresden china are also pretty to reproduce, and the quaint figures of the Georgian period seen on English Christmas cards are also recommended. Dominos, being almost invariable accomplishments to masquerade garbs, are also showing many improvements. A semi-princesse form is the neatest in appearance, and at the same time is a very effective disguise, especially where a long-pointed hood is added. When made of the thin, striped Algerian goods, a burnous fold takes the place of the hood, and in the richer fabrics, like velvet, silk, or satin, a waiteau fold is appropriate. Where something inexpensive is desired to be worn a part of the evening only, silesia, trimmed with pinked frills of cambric, are the prettiest. As ball dresses and walking costumes are naturally suggestive of the toothsome delights of the latter part of the evening, let me finish my letter by a recipe given me lately by a traveled friend who knows my one gastronomical weakness—a love of all kinds of soups. This is the exact receipt for the famous pilau or pilaff of Turkey: Put three thin slices of raw ham in a soup-kettle, together with a knuckle of veal, a large chicken, and a roasted shoulder of lamb, and vegetables to your own taste; fill up with water, season, and boil slowly. When the meats are done, uncover them, trim the flesh from the bones and cut in small pieces. Put them into a kettle with a teacup of rice and the strained liquor in which they were boiled. Season with cayenne and color with saffron. Boil the liquor down till it is reduced one fourth, add six ounces of raisins, or dried and pitted cherries, then boil again for twenty minutes, and serve. This, I am told, is the latest gastronomical furor in Europe, and is largely patronized by the noblesse who have ranged themselves politically on the side of Turkey. Their opponents, the supporters of Russia, declare as furiously in favor of ouka, or the national soup of that country, but of that I regret I am unable to furnish the secret. After this, one may well ask in what fashion does not rule?

Yours,

LILIAS DUBOIS.

A story has been circulating in the city for several days past to the effect that Hon. John S. Hager has become, for some reason, so disgusted with the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention that he has resolved to return permanently to Missouri as soon as that body adjourns. We have been at some pains to inquire into this rumor, and the result is that we are disposed to entertain very serious doubts as to its strict truth. The report comes from the Pacific Club, to which Judge Hager belongs, and which has been plunged into the most profound grief at the bare possibility of losing him. The attachment of all the members to the Judge is of the most loving character. His gentle and affectionate nature, his courteous bearing, his uniform deference to the older members, his thoughtful attention and tender solicitude towards the younger ones, have borne their natural fruit, and thoroughly established him as the idol and pet of the club. In our inquiry of Judge Hager's fellow-members concerning the painful rumor, we found but one opinion as to the irreparable character of the loss that would be visited upon the club, the city, the State, and the coast, should it be true that he had seriously resolved to leave us; and the expressions of anger toward the Constitutional Convention, for driving out of our State and to Missouri such a citizen, were unmistakably severe. And it is our unqualified opinion that if it should prove to be true, not only the Convention, but every member of it who has in the slightest particular contributed to the result, will sooner or later have cause to regret his conduct. But we have strong reason to think that Judge Hager's return to Missouri in the spring will not be absolutely final. What the grounds for this pleasing hope actually are we do not feel at this moment at liberty to disclose to the public. It is enough to say at present that we do not believe we shall lose him yet a while. But if it turns out that we are mistaken; if his anger at the Convention is so overwhelming that he will not be reconciled, but will insist, at all hazards, upon involving the whole State in the consequences of his wrath, we shall yield with the pleasing consolation that if it is a loss to us it will be a gain to Missouri.

We make the following interesting extract from the testimony of Mrs. Cappola, while on trial charged with the murder of her husband: "Mr. Cappola's feelings toward my children were bad. He has said that he could cut and quarter them, and eat their hearts out." The judicious adult having a knowledge of literary and rhetorical methods, and understanding that artistic exaggeration is an essential element of style, will discern in this only the late Mr. Cappola's impressive manner of denoting a mild and natural dislike to the children—they were unpleasant, or disagreeable, that is all; one does not pick and choose one's words with a view to exactness when fatigued of one's wife's offspring. But the children, in the uninstructed innocence of their hearts, appear to have interpreted this literally as a threat against their blood and bones; for Mrs. Cappola explains that "two of them were in so much fear of him that they dared not come to the table when he was there." The implied boldness of the others is not accounted for; perhaps they were old enough to have been at the sand-lots and heard the harangues of the horny-handed Dictator, and had thus learned to rightly estimate the relation between language that "bears on hard" and the actions it is designed to foreshadow. Anyhow, it does not appear that the late Mr. Cappola ever enacted the part of Chronos, by devouring his babes.

"It is rare that on the morrow of the day on which a woman has given some one the key to her heart, she does not regret the impossibility of changing the key-hole."

SUBURBAN SAUCE.—FOR GOOSE AND GANDER.

OAKLAND, February 6, 1879.

DEAR JUNO:—After a lapse of years they have opened a skating rink here. Bob and I went the other night, and oh! what a jolly time I had. It surprised me quite as much as if my baby gusto for rattles, rubber rings, and a jumper should suddenly return to me. Do you remember the fun we girls had years ago in the Twelfth Street Rink? I thought I had outgrown that girlish love for rollers, but the other evening, by the time I was fairly started on my feet, I found the enthusiasm in the sport had returned, and the old fascinating spell was once again about me as closely as ever. The evening Bob and I were there not many of the ultra-fashionables attended; but, Bob tells me, a few evenings after the place was crowded with "our set." Mr. and Mrs. John Perine, Mr. and Mrs. George Perine, Mr. and Mrs. Marwedel, and Mrs. Marwedel's charming sister, Miss Brett; Mr. and Mrs. Robert Crockett, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Holderness, Miss Cobb, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Fitch were in the rink, but did not essay a plunge into the sea of participants. Pretty Mrs. Joe Cook, Mrs. Al. Redding, Mrs. Willard Barton, Mrs. Charles Havens, accompanied by their husbands, sped over the floor. Miss Miller, Miss Johnson, and Miss Sinton, supported by Messrs. Johnson and Sinton (twins, in dead gold suits), struggled laboriously and conscientiously in the rear of the flying experts. Mr. Will Hamilton, Mr. Allen Knight, and Mr. Tom Prather, unshackled by partners, were an ornament to the floor, a reward that their exclusiveness, says Bob, made undeserved. You know, Juno, our Bobby is very gallant to the ladies, and does not easily pardon any dereliction in that respect in any other gentleman.

A propos of gentlemen, why is it that so many of them, after they have been safely launched into society—have had their "coming out party," as it were—do not stay out? How repeatedly have certain of the Oakland young ladies, who have taken upon themselves the somewhat thankless task of entertainer and hostess, been left to wonder where Mr. So-and-so is? Later, they may be told that that gentleman is not going into society this season. This reminds me of the perverse capers of our pet squirrels when we were children. You had yours, I know, Juno. Do you recollect how exasperating they always were—invariably retiring to their little inner room whenever we wanted to enjoy them ourselves or show them off to others? Ah! I remember well the bang and noise we made to bring them out again. What a nice idea it would be for some respectable man to advertise himself as "Cannonader to the Oakland Elite," his stock in trade to be a movable cannon and some good ammunition. Thus equipped, this man's services, for a small consideration, could be engaged by any lady giving an entertainment—it being understood that he is to proceed, the evening of her fête, to the residence of any gentleman suspected by her of wavering in his allegiance to society. In very stubborn cases it would perhaps be well to authorize the Cannonader to employ the additional help of a chimney sweep, as the stopping of flues, I think, would be found to be a wonderfully successful accessory to the bombardment. If this combination does not avail, a lady having any self respect will instantly withdraw from the contest. No true lady will ever be willing to press her suit to an unseemly extent. There is no doubt in my mind that in rine cases out of ten the plan will work and they will become an easy prey to us.

Last Saturday Bob came from the city early, and a party of us went out to Berkeley to attend the opening hop in the elegant new gymnasium, just finished and presented to the State by Mr. A. K. P. Harmon. There was quite a San Francisco delegation over, and many Oakland people attended. Among the number I noticed our friends, Miss McHenry, Miss Roe, Mr. Seward Cole, Miss Fox, Mr. Hewston Daniels, Miss Lohman, Miss Sinton, Miss Crane, Mr. Williams, Miss Irwin, Dr. Dale, Mr. Prather, Mr. Carneal, Mrs. Wetherbee, Miss Henderson, and Mr. Hastings. Just here, in connection with gymnasiums, I have a protest to offer. Certain data have been sent in to me bearing upon the character and excellent work of one of my townsmen. In consequence I have prepared a slight biographical sketch, to be entitled "The Modern Young Noah," relating to his humane work on Grand Island during the terrible floods last winter. Now I wish to warn this young gentleman that this sketch is in no manner of an obituary nature, and that unless he modify his athletic feats—the wildest rumors being afloat concerning them—I fear a fatality may occur that will prevent my publishing it.

Miss Ivy Wandesforde arrived home last night. Eastern advices in musical circles state that the rigors of this cold winter have told severely upon her, and that near Chicago Miss Jenny Sargent, of Boston, was obliged to come on and take her place as soprano in the Camilla Urso Troupe. It is felt to be a great pity that our lovely singer should meet with this drawback at the beginning of her career.

Novelty, Juno, once more stalks rampant about Oakland. Our old schoolmasters, "The Inseparable Trio," have introduced a new and highly original phaeton act. Broadway is reserved for the spectacle afterwards, between the hours of four and five. I shan't tell you anything more about it. If you did your duty, and came to see me, you could see for yourself all these highly interesting things I write you of.

Your own offended

MAID OF ATHENS.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

There will be found in the current number of the Atlantic a short essay by Mr. William F. Apthorp, entitled "Musicians and Music-lovers," that distinguishes itself from whatever I have hitherto read about music (written by non-musicians, I mean; musicians seldom can, and still more seldom will, write about their art) by a certain delicacy of perception of the relation in which the musician (musician not musicant) and amateur stand respectively toward the art, a perception at once more refined and accurate than anything that I remember to have seen in our language. Mr. Apthorp is evidently the fortunate possessor of a dual set of sympathies; he seems to feel music—that is, receive the mere transient impression from it—with the amateur who hears with his ears alone, while at the same time he has the inward (intellectual) ear of the musician, accompanied by the exquisitely developed sense of harmony—or fitness of things in an artistic sense—that can exist only as a result of the thorough culture in art generally of a mind at once refined, receptive, and appreciative. The possession of this happy aggregate of qualities is precisely what constitutes the genuine art critic—in a higher sense. A just fulfillment of his duty toward the public requires that he should be ready to sympathize not only with its appreciativeness, but also with its short-comings, while at the same time I maintain that no person is fully competent to judge of a work of art without being the conscious possessor of at least some what of the quality and feeling out of which that work originated. I do not mean to infer that I consider it to be absolutely essential that each and every musical critic should play perfectly upon some instrument, or have a thorough knowledge of counterpoint and instrumentation (although the latter are very important), or that every one who writes about pictures should be able to draw accurately from the life or be a good painter in oils. But I do think that the word of authority of the critic concerning any work of art should be the privilege only of such as have made that art their life's study, and who are thus, if not upon the plane of the artist himself in their relation to his work, at least living in the same atmosphere with him, conscious of the difficulties as well as the facile tricks, the disappointments as well as successes, the penalties as well as the rewards of an artist's life, and whose sympathies are, above all, not likely to be affected by the mere superficialities that are mostly the stone wall beyond which the vision of the great public can not penetrate, but can follow the artist into that higher intellectual domain in which he lives, in which his works are conceived and brought forth, and where alone it is his right that he should be judged. I have always felt strongly that in music the line of separation between the artist and the amateur (that is, one who does not think in music) was wider, and presented a more formidable barrier than in any of the other arts. The others have mostly a something to be delineated or described of which the beholder or reader is, in some dim sense at least, conscious, and to some sort of conception of which this consciousness will afford him a clue, the following up of which is likely to evolve light from what may have been dark enough at the outset, and bring him into at least partial sympathy with the aim and the intention of the artist. But in music, it seems to me that there is no sort of help to be found excepting it come from within—no light to be had but that which is evolved either from an exquisite artistic sensibility or through long and patient study. This Mr. Apthorp has recognized with the delicate intuition of an artist, and set forth with a clearness and certainty of touch that I am the more delighted to see in the Atlantic since its pages have several times of late been lent to the coarse and materialistic theories of Mr. Richard Grant White, who, out of a palpably superficial knowledge of music—very evidently of all art—and with the arrogance of one whose conception of all things is circumscribed within his own limited line of sight, treats of music as though it were accurately as high as Mr. Grant White and no higher, and as though he could without the least inconvenience place his hand approvingly on the head of Beethoven himself, and say to him: "Go on, my boy; you are doing very nicely indeed; I like your Ninth Symphony, and understood it thoroughly the first time I heard it, when I was about six years old!" There are, indeed, some minor points with regard to which I should take issue with Mr. Apthorp, but they are minor matters, and do not affect the general drift of his valuable essay. So, for instance, when he says, speaking of Mozart and Wagner: "The difference in special musical culture between the two men is very great, and all in Mozart's favor," I can not agree with him, and wonder whether the preponderance of the dramatic quality in Wagner has not caused him to lose sight of his (W.'s) astounding musical culture; and when he classes melody as the element in our modern music that appeals most directly to the majority of music-lovers, I fancy that he does not distinguish with sufficient accuracy the melody pure and simple from the rhythmic form in which it is clothed, and which, I believe, is the real spirit of attractiveness to the general ear. But these, as I said, are points of lesser importance; the important one is that Mr. Apthorp has the true aesthetic sense, together with some accurate knowledge of music, and that what he has written is of the highest value to the real music-lover—i. e., the one who finds in music something more than a mere ear-tickling dissipation.

The Orchestral Matinée of last Wednesday was a special performance in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the first appearance in this city, as a conductor, of Mr. Rudolph Herold, and was such a tribute as may well be accepted in proof of the great respect and esteem in which that gentleman is held. There was an immense audience—all that Platt's Hall would hold—the presentation of a silver brick, and quite a delightful little gush of sentiment, enthusiasm, etc., all of which was pleasant to behold, and goes far to prove that if we do turn rather a cold shoulder on the symphony concerts, our community has a warm corner left in its heart for Mr. Herold himself, and gladly welcomes the opportunity to prove itself grateful for the valuable services that he has rendered in the past.

The orchestral portion of the programme at this matinee calls for no especial mention, all of the pieces having been previously performed and commented on. They were played about as usual. The vocalist was Mrs. Henry Norton, who, although apparently a trifle nervous in her first song—I believe that she had never before sung with an orchestra, and one has to become habituated to the situation, which is very trying to a novice, on account of a certain diffuseness, as it were, of the sound that one who has sung only with piano forte is accustomed to hear coming compactly from a single instrument—fully redeemed herself in the Canzonetta of Haydn, which she sang with great purity of style and refinement, and a little German song, Auf Wiedersehen, as an encore, that was simply delightful. Somebody had requested Mr. Henry Heyman to play the Cavatina of Raff on the violin (at least the programme so stated), and I fancy it must have been some one who had never heard him do it, for a more stupidly unmusical rendering of this beautiful piece I never heard, even from a bad amateur. Not only that there was absolutely no conception of it, at all—not even a wrong one—but this easy thing, that any respectable violinist ought to play clearly at sight, was full of false intonation and the sickly, greasy sort of sliding up into, and down from, the positions that one is accustomed to hear from none but bad fiddlers. The little song of Pergolesi, as an encore (I was desperately afraid that he would repeat the Cavatina) was much more neatly done.

Announcements of concerts come in thick and fast just now, and critics are jubilant. "Our nights shall be filled with music" (more or less), and there will be no end of things to be endured (one gets even by "going for" them) and, I hope, much to be enjoyed. In the latter category we may unquestionably assign the first place to the farewell series of Recitals by the Schmidt Quintet, which, beginning on the 18th instant, gives us four more of its delightful performances, and then betakes itself to what I hope may prove a better market for its wares. Not but that there is a discriminating and appreciative audience for good music to be found in this city; but it is too feeble in numbers to support an ensemble which, like this one, is fully qualified to cope with the best in the East, and which, under skilful management, ought to earn a great deal of money. This—the amount of money earned—is really a very important consideration even in musical matters; one plays quartets much the better with a comfortable bank account at one's back. I dread to think of the musical darkness to which we shall be relegated when our Quintet shall have gone. The Recitals have been the only thoroughly good thing we have had for years past—that is, with good programmes really well played—and even if we had the material out of which to form another quartet (which we have not), I fear that the lack of support that has discouraged Mr. Schmidt will deter any who might think of such a thing from attempting it. This farewell season promises to be the most interesting that we have had, and ought to attract our music-lovers en masse.

Then we are promised an opportunity of hearing Wilhelmj, although probably not very soon, as I learn from Eastern sources that he is to come here after his tour of the Southern States, which has but begun. So we may possess our souls in patient anticipation for a further six or eight weeks, and, probably, after his coming as well, for I find very little that is soul-stirring in the programme that he seems to be playing everywhere. A Concerto of Paganini and two or three Fantasies of Ernst is a rather light musical diet for a musical stomach.

Of especially local interest there are announced, firstly, a Soirée by the choir of Trinity Church, to be given in the school room of the church building, on the 19th instant, which brings—besides a rather promising miscellaneous first part—Romberg's somewhat Philistine, but musical, setting of Schiller's Lay of the Bell for chorus and solo voices. (I find on the programme a quotation from a "Mr. Dodd," to the effect that "the most original and beautiful, perhaps, of all Schiller's poems, unequaled by anything of Goethe's, is called The Lay of the Bell." Now, it may be none of my business, and perhaps does not matter much in any case, but I should like to ascertain where this Mr. Dodd found out that Schiller's poem is "unequaled by anything of Goethe's.") Mr. Ferrer, our excellent guitarist, who, it will be remembered, met with a severe and painful accident on the occasion of his late concert at Sacramento, and who has since then been shelved professionally, has been tendered a benefit, which is to take place on the 23d instant, and which, from the many excellent artists who have proffered their services, promises to be an excellent concert. Mr. Ferrer has a host of friends—it includes the entire public and all his fellow-artists—and will undoubtedly have a good house. Madame Jaffa, also, announces a concert for the 22d; there be still rumors of opera; a public performance of Mr. Le Jeal's new Mass is among the possibilities, and, altogether, there is something to look forward to.

An old soldier, long since pensioned off, enjoys his leisure in rearing rabbits.

One of the little creatures bites his thumb, and, trifling as the wound seems, gangrene sets in and extends, and amputation is resorted to too late.

An old companion in the 99th Light Infantry, who had marched shoulder to shoulder with him in a hundred well-fought fields, undertakes to deliver his comrade's funeral oration:

"Adieu," the honest soldier cries, in a voice fairly choked with emotion, "adieu, brave and gentle heart, thou that hast fought so well in Africa, the Crimea, Italy! An hundred times didst thou with impunity brave the leaden hail that hurtles over the battle-field, and survive—survive to be killed by a ——— long-eared, cat-skinned, kangaroo-hammed, pink-eyed, parsley-munching, two-penny-half-penny rabbit!"

On the last steamer four Chickering grand pianos went out to Tokio, Japan. This fact has a double significance: it indicates a growth of musical taste in Japan, and a sharp appreciation of the excellence of American musical instruments.

The Italians say that he who offends never forgives. Tacitus gives the reason for it. It is, he says, because the causes of hatred are the more violent the more unjust they are.

ORTHODOXY.*

As I walked through the pleasant Valley of Liberty, admiring the beauty of the flowers, listening to the singing of the birds, and thinking upon the wondrous adaptations of structure by which each plant and animal became suited to the conditions around it, I came to a mountain, up the side of which ran a narrow and difficult pathway, beset with brambles and obstructed by rocks that had fallen from above.

This pathway led to a terrace of no great width, winding along the mountain side in a direction almost parallel to the pleasant valley below.

Upon the terrace were a number of people clad in thin, white garments, which were rudely blown about by the wind; yet these people heeded not the cold nor the roughness of their way, but with faces and hands uplifted toward the sky, stumbled over the sharp rocks, yet rose again, torn and bleeding, and with upturned eyes still staggered on.

At the commencement of the pathway was a gate, over which was printed in large red letters the word "Orthodoxy."

Though curious to know why so many had climbed to this terrace, and why they paid so little heed to their steps, yet, as my way was pleasant, and I knew that both their way and mine led alike to the Ocean of Death, from the other side of which no news ever reaches Earth, I thought it was a pity to spoil my pleasure by scrambling over so rough a road.

So I cast about for some one to inform me. And I had not taken many steps before I perceived a troop of men clad in sable robes, each holding in his left hand a small black book, and in his right a bludgeon.

The name of the book, as I was afterward told, was "Bible," while that of the bludgeon was "Pulpit Rhetoric."

And two of these men, whose names, marked upon their foreheads, were Guard and Hemphill, approached me, holding their books before my face, and shouted: "Thou shalt go no further, by this book!" Whereat I was astonished and displeased, and answered: "Am I not free, and is not this the Valley of Liberty?" And they answered: "Yea, but the end is Destruction." "Tis Death, I know, for all of us," said I, "but I see not Destruction."

Then said they: "Come with us, and we will show thee." And they led me into a cave, where many people were assembled, where the air was impure from the breath of the multitude, and where the light of day penetrated only through a rift in the roof. All besides was as dark as a total eclipse, save on the wall opposite to the entrance, where there was a screen, illuminated by the lurid light of Emotion.

And he that was named Guard cried out "Damnation," and upon the screen was projected a wildness of blazing fires, full of the burning bodies of men, and women, and little children, and their moans rent the air. And I said: "What is this?"

And they answered me: "This is Hell; this is where those who walk along the Valley of Liberty will suffer eternally after crossing the Ocean of Death."

And I answered them: "I believe it not, yet how can I escape this awful doom?"

Then roared Hemphill: "Heaven!"

And the scene changed to a Golden City, with emerald streets and amethyst walls. In the centre was a great white throne, and upon the throne sat a great King, but his face could not be seen. Round about the throne stood bearded men, and beauteous women, and little children, with wings growing out of their shoulders. Each had a crown upon the forehead, and a harp in the hand, and they all sang, "Glory, glory!" And I said: "What is this?"

Then answered they: "This is the estate of the Blessed; this is the Eternity of those who follow the path of Orthodoxy."

Then said I: "Who, then, are those who scramble along the rock terrace high up the mountain?"

To which Hemphill answered: "They are the saints, the salt of the earth; they look to Heaven for guidance along the rugged pathway of a religious life."

"Now choose," said they, "between the two: rest, and peace, and love in heaven, or never-ending torture in the fires of hell." But I answered: "I like not either; the one is too hot, the other is too cold." For I perceived that there was no fire in the Golden City, and their dresses were glory only.

Then Guard and Hemphill, together with several others, rushed upon me, and mauled with their bludgeons—even with Pulpit Rhetoric.

And I said: "I would like to get out of this." So with great difficulty, and with the loss of some odd coins (which were taken from me to aid in patching up the rift in the cave through which a ray of sunlight penetrated), I got clear of my assailants, and stood once more in the open air.

Then I resolved henceforth to continue to walk in the pleasant sunlight till I reached the Ocean of Death.

And soon after I overtook a party of my friends, who told me that I had had a narrow escape, for that these brigands in black, usually called Clergy, do waylay all who pass by, and do seek to turn them from the safe path of Virtue by a show of False Religion.

Their habit is to entice their victims into their cave, where they exhibit to them a series of dissolving views, of hell and its tortures, contrasted with others of heaven and its blessedness; and, after robbing them of their money to "keep up the church" (as they call repairing their cave—which has been broken into several times by the police), to strip them of all clothing save a white shirt, and then force them to climb with bare feet along the rough path of Orthodoxy, till they reach the cold and rugged terrace of Conversion, where they must sing "I'd like to be an Angel," till they fall at last into the Ocean of Death, without having ever enjoyed life.

JOHN BUNYANSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

*The editors of the ARGONAUT disclaim all responsibility for the peculiar views of their contributor, and as the "brigands" have other weapons than "pulpit rhetoric" cheerfully invite them to again belabor him, in these columns, to the end that he may be converted.

The scene is before a judge, who is inquiring into an application for separation.

"But, madame, I do not see in your complaint a sufficient reason. You say that your husband is a tanner. That is an honorable business."

"Yes, sir; but it is I that he tans."

A MODERN ROBE OF NESSUS.

By Robert Duncan Milne.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

I had hitherto acted without thinking, and purely on the impulse of the moment. Now, the blood rushed through my head like a torrent, as I at last took time to consider. What had I done? Had I not rendered myself a party, in some manner, to this horrible machination? I had introduced a new combination into the event, the consequences of which appalled me. Was I not responsible for something? But what? My brain reeled. I could not collect my thoughts. I rushed into the boudoir determined to destroy the horrible garments, fraught with I knew not what deadly peril to the household. I resolved to destroy the dress instantly. I approached the ottoman on which they lay. My cowardice got the better of me, and I feared to touch them. If I did take them, how shall I account for their disappearance? Madame would miss them instantly on her return. Lisette, who alone had the privilege of entering the boudoir, would be questioned, and she, poor, simple girl, would confess the whole. How should I account for my possession of the terrible secret? My fear of the personal consequences to myself and her was too great to permit of my taking action. I heard a step outside, which caused me to retreat in precipitate alarm to the conservatory. It was merely one of the workmen coming to complete the adjustment of the hangings in the salon. Once out of the boudoir I dared not return, and, by that action, or want of action, the event was sealed. Then I determined to go at once to the Marquis and tell him all that I had seen and heard. I hastened to his study. It was empty. To the billiard-room. He was not there. I questioned the concierge. He informed me that the Marquis had gone to his club. I jumped into a carriage and drove thither, but to find that he had gone with a party to Versailles. I returned to the house, and again sought Lisette and confided all to her. It was with difficulty I could make her understand the situation. When she did so, the effect was different from what I had anticipated. She laughed at my fears, and tried to persuade me that all I had heard merely related to some ingenious tableau—some mechanical surprise—which Madame was going to inaugurate for the pleasure of her guests. But the Abbé? I urged. Lisette laughed. Why should not the Abbé come to the masque? He was a very pleasant, courtly gentleman, and she could see nothing wrong if he did admire the Madame. I was in despair at her stupidity.

"Let us fly, Lisette," cried I; "let us go back to Béarn at once, where we can live happily and away from these distracting scenes."

"What?" she exclaimed, "and forfeit our wages? Ma foi, Philippe, but you are mad. Besides, if the terrible denouement you apprehend should really occur, would not our flight be construed into an acknowledgment of guilt, and should we not be arrested and brought back to answer for anything which might happen?"

My reason told me that this was only too true, and was, in fact, an unanswerable argument. I therefore determined to trust to circumstances, and await the event, telling all to the Marquis at the earliest possible moment.

At four the Marquis returned from her drive, and summoned Lisette to the boudoir. I made pretense of doing something in the salon, and observed them come out and retire to the apartments of the Marquis, Lisette carrying in her hands the two dresses. The guests would not begin to arrive before ten, and the long hours seemed ages as they passed slowly by, while I awaited the return of the Marquis. Seven—the dinner hour—arrived without the Marquis, and Madame dined alone. My excitement increased as the evening wore on, till I was absolutely in a fever. How should I approach the Marquis when he did arrive? How break to him the terrible news, the possession of which was so important, yet so sinister? I tormented myself as to the manner in which I should begin, and the way in which he was likely to receive my communication. I knew well the ungovernable nature of his passion when it was once fairly aroused—which, to do him justice, seldom happened. He was usually débonnaire and familiar with me, and I flattered myself that I could even broach an unpleasant topic with a certain degree of security and confidence. But this—I trembled to think of what might happen. It was then with feelings of trepidation akin to guilt that I at last saw the carriage draw up before the portico, and the Marquis alight and retire to his apartments. I was summoned to attend him almost immediately. The private suite of the Marquis consisted of three chambers: the first, or outermost, being an antechamber; the second, a lounging room; and the third, a bed-chamber. The Marquis usually occupied the second of these, and was there when I entered. He seemed in capital spirits and good humor.

"Well, Philippe," said he, "is everything ready? Paris expects me to play the fool for an hour or two, and I suppose I must get in trim to do it. You have got the Mephistopheles, eh?" and he yawned, stretching himself on a sofa, and puffing a cigarette.

"If Monsieur the Marquis will permit me to say," I began, and then hesitated, nervously arranging things about the room, and unable to proceed.

Monsieur took no notice of my words, but puffed away abstractedly at his cigarette.

"Something has happened which Monsieur—that is the Marquis," stammered I in a manner utterly bête and unlike myself, which attracted the wandering attention of the Marquis.

"Eh, Philippe? You have a message from Madame!" "Pardon, Monsieur. I was about to relate a matter of great importance. I was in the conservatory at the time. The Abbé—"

"What!" thundered the Marquis, springing up from the lounge. "What did you say? The Abbé R. in my house—in the conservatory? Villain!" advancing and seizing me violently by the collar, "quick! explain yourself; or by—"

"Do but hear me, Monsieur," entreated I, struggling in his grasp, "it was not my fault. If Monsieur will but listen to me I will explain—"

"You lie!" he shouted; "the concierge and the servants had strict orders not to admit that person. If I find you have deceived me, or are practicing on my credulity, to serve your own ends—whatever they may be—by God, I will!"—and he tightened his grasp on my collar.

He was physically much more powerful than myself, and I shuddered at the thought of a hand to hand contest. I thought the best thing I could do was to keep silence. In a few seconds he released his grip on my collar. He was evidently collecting himself. Curiosity and interest were getting the better of passion. Presently he let me go, and commenced striding up and down the room. I had succeeded so badly in my attempt to introduce my story that, come what would, I determined to let him lead the conversation this time.

"You say the Abbé R. was in my house to-day," he said at length—"be careful how you answer—how did he get in?"

"In the disguise of a costumier, if it please Monsieur."

"Where did you see him?"

"In the boudoir of Madame."

He stopped short in his walk, faced round, looked at me with an expression fierce as that of a wild beast, his frame shuddering violently. He made a move toward me; then restrained himself; I meanwhile standing still near the dressing table. He essayed to speak, but failed. He resumed his mechanical walk. In a minute he stopped again.

"Philippe," he hissed out, "whatever you may have heard or witnessed, I charge you to tell me everything, without fear or reserve; but beware of concealing or garbling the facts. Proceed."

He remained standing, and I began to tell him the interview of the Marquis and the doctor, as I have told you; and as I proceeded I could see his face harden, his teeth set, and a ghastly pallor spread itself over his whole features. Sometimes he would walk up and down during my narration, sometimes pause—but his actions were mechanical. I went on to tell him of the interview between Madame and the Abbé, expecting another ebullition of passion every moment; but none came. Instead, there was a coldness and rigidity of countenance, expressive of some unalterable determination. After thinking a little he spoke.

"Philippe," he said calmly, "you have rendered me a great service; I shall not be forgetful of it. There is yet another service which you must do me—the last one. You love Lisette. You are engaged to be married. You have been in my service a long time. To-night that service ends. Between you I owe you about eight thousand francs. I will make it fifty thousand on condition that you start off for America to-night."

"But, Monsieur," I began, taken quite aback, "consider the time—besides we are not married."

The Marquis pulled out his watch, and rang a bell.

"It is already nine o'clock." Then to the servant who answered the summons: "Take a carriage and bring M. Lavoisier, the Notary, here immediately. Make haste."

The servant bowed and retired.

"Go," continued the Marquis, "and present my compliments to Madame the Marquise, and say that I should like to see Lisette for a few moments, if she can spare her. I presume you accept my conditions? Events may occur to-night of such a character as to necessitate your arrest and detention as witnesses. It is for your interest as well as for mine that you should leave France. You must be aware of this."

I was completely bewildered. All my plans of life scattered to the winds in a moment! No going back to Béarn now! The superior will of the Marquis mastered me. Had I reflected, I might have hesitated. As it was—America? I had heard a great deal of that country. And fifty thousand francs! It was a fortune I had never dreamed of.

I went to the apartments of Madame le Marquise, and, by one of the attendants in the ante-chamber, sent in the message of the Marquis. Lisette came out.

"Lisette," whispered I, "come with me at once to the apartments of the Marquis. We are to be married and go to America with fifty thousand francs to-night."

Lisette looked at me as she had done when I made her change the ribbons on the dresses, as if she suspected my sanity. She made a movement to escape back into the chambers of Madame, but I was too quick for her. I caught her by the wrist; and, while conducting her to the apartments of the Marquis, tried to get her to understand what was required of her. The suddenness and strangeness of late events had been too much for her, and she obeyed mechanically. I told her to remain in the ante-chamber while I went in. The Marquis was seated at a table writing. He had become cool—preternaturally cool; not a trace remained of his late excitement. He did not look up as I entered, but continued writing. I stood waiting in silence.

Presently a knock was heard at the door, which I hastened to answer. It was the Notary, whom I at once ushered into the presence of the Marquis.

"Good evening, Monsieur Lavoisier," said the Marquis, "pray be seated. Is Lisette here?" addressing me.

"She waits, if it please Monsieur," replied I.

"Call her."

I brought her in, and we stood before the Marquis and the Notary, who were seated at opposite sides of the centre table.

"These young people wish to be married, Monsieur Lavoisier. Please draw up the necessary papers at once, as we have no time to lose."

The Notary did as he was bid; and, the questions and formalities having been gone through, I and Lisette were man and wife; and the Notary, pocketing his fee, retired.

"I have instructed my bankers," resumed the Marquis, tapping with his hand the letter he had written, "to place to your credit at New York the sum I have mentioned. You will leave Havre by the Belgique to-morrow. A carriage will be in waiting to-night at the north door to convey you to the terminus," he added, looking significantly at me. "Lisette is now at liberty to return to her duties until then, but must not breathe to anyone the slightest hint of what has passed. Make her comprehend this, Philippe, and then return immediately."

I accompanied Lisette back to the apartments of Madame, impressing upon her the necessity of preserving absolute secrecy on what had passed, and told her to be ready to leave at any moment. I then kissed her and returned to the Marquis.

The noise of carriages in the court, and the subdued hum of voices in the salons below, were sufficient evidence that the guests were arriving in force, for it was already past ten o'clock. It did not take long to attire the Marquis in the red silken tunic and trunk hose which Madame had intended for the Abbé; and, with the addition of the short cloak, sword, and feathered hat, together with the mask (counterparts of all of which had been furnished to the Abbé), it must be confessed he bore a very striking resemblance to the conventional Mephistopheles of the stage. While dressing he gave me commands as to what I should do in respect to Madame and the Abbé, the purport and effect of which the sequel will show. He then descended to the salons, leaving me alone.

The excitement I had gone through, so unusual to my mode of life, had acted as a powerful stimulus to my brain and nerves; and I now felt like a man under the influence of strong intoxicants, having all my energies strung up to do or dare whatever acts circumstances might lead to, but without that blunting of the mental faculties which liquor usually imparts. My perceptions were strangely acute, but I would not allow myself to reflect. I saw clearly into what perilous complications I had suffered myself to be drawn, but I consoled myself with the idea that I was serving my master faithfully, and that a few short hours would put Lisette and myself beyond the reach of danger.

My first command had been to put myself as much as possible in the way of Madame, so that she might employ me as the bearer of any message she wished to send. With this object I descended to the salons and mixed with the revelers. Everything was as brilliant and attractive as unlimited expense and faultless taste could make it. The beau monde of France was there enjoying itself as only the beau monde of France can. The bluest blood of the ancien régime was disporting itself with an abandon which can only be arrived at in the masque. It was rumored that the Emperor himself would grace the fête with his presence; and, indeed, from what I know of the foibles of royal personages—for I have attended the Marquis at all the courts of Europe—he may have been at that very moment on the floor, as merry as the maddest of them all.

I pushed through the dazzling and ever changing throng of knights flirting with shepherdesses, and Greek goddesses languishing with blackamoors, and espied the Marquis, attired as an odalisque, in the conservatory salon, next the boudoir, where I had expected to find her. She seemed preoccupied until her eyes lighted on me, when she instantly beckoned me to her.

"Philippe," said she, "go at once and find the Marquis, and tell him that I have something important to say to him if he will meet me in the boudoir. After you have accompanied him thither, go to the blue room au troisième and say that Madame la Marquise wishes to see Monsieur Croix-Blanc, the costumier, for a few moments in the north corridor."

I bowed and hastened to find the Marquis by appointment in the furthest end of the five salons, and acquainted him with the message of Madame. He accompanied me to the north corridor, where at his request I detached with my pocket-knife the little white crosses of ribbon from his dress, and leaving him proceeded to the room of the Abbé au troisième. I knocked at the door, and was answered from within in a disguised voice requesting to know what I wanted; but the door was not opened, from which I inferred that the Abbé had not yet completed his toilet.

"Madame la Marquise," said I, "desires to see Monsieur Croix-Blanc immediately in her boudoir."

"In her boudoir, did you say?" queried the voice.

"Assuredly, Monsieur," replied I. "Madame told me to say that an unforeseen occurrence necessitates the presence of Monsieur Croix-Blanc in her boudoir immediately."

"Tell Madame that I hasten to obey her commands," returned the voice. "The way is known to me; I shall not trouble you to conduct me thither."

I felt perfectly confident on this point, but was well aware that the Abbé did not wish to appear to me in the exact costume of the Marquis, as such a step would be likely to arouse my suspicions, so I ostentatiously withdrew in order to give him an opportunity to gain the salons without risk of detection. Once there he had nothing to fear, except a personal rencontre with the Marquis, which he, of course, trusted to the Madame to guard against.

It was now my rôle to time my return to the Marquise with such nicety as to draw her away from the vicinity of the boudoir before the approach of the Abbé, but yet not incur the chance of her seeing him as he descended the stairs. A gesture of recognition from him would have ruined all, should he chance to see her, while on the other hand a glimpse of Mephistopheles on the stair-case would have equally revealed the identity which it was now the object of the Marquis to obscure. I accordingly loitered near the bottom of the stair-case until I heard footsteps in the story above, and then speedily presenting myself to Madame, informed her that the Marquis was then approaching the boudoir, and that Monsieur Croix-Blanc was waiting in the north corridor.

"Reflecting upon my conduct of that night," here interposed the Basque shepherd, addressing me, "even at this interval of time, I feel deep shame for my duplicity, however well meant. I was carried away by the feelings and interests of the moment, and truly, bitterly have I paid for it!" He resumed the narrative.]

It was the object of Madame not to meet the Marquis, but to entice him into her boudoir there to wait. She, therefore, avoided the nearer salons and passed into the conservatories. I presently followed her, having been instructed by the Marquis to take up my position behind the vase, and give him notice by a preconceived sign when the influence of the medicated dress should have reduced the Abbé to helplessness.

The night was warm, and one of the windows of the boudoir had been left with a leaf partially open, through which, from the position I was in, the interior was visible. In a few moments the door from the salon opened, and there entered a Mephistopheles, whom by height, figure, carriage, and dress I could not have distinguished from the Marquis had I not known it was the Abbé, so well had art assisted nature in effecting the resemblance.

He stood as if in thought for a moment or two, and then began pacing the floor in a restless manner. The bijou clock of the boudoir tinkled out eleven. The Abbé paused, turned, looked irresolute, and finally with a gesture of impatience threw himself at full length upon a sofa, his cheek resting on his hand. I watched him intently. The clock ticked on for five minutes, for ten, but the figure never altered its position. Nothing could be gathered from the features, which were masked, but the pose of the limbs indicated complete repose. It seemed that the dress was evidently doing its work; the only question was whether the moment had arrived to apprise the Marquis. After five minutes more of watching I determined to ascertain the condition of the Abbé, and accordingly coughed and made a rustling noise where I was. The figure did not move. Emboldened, I approached the open window, and called in low, distinct tones: "Monsieur Croix-blanc! Monsieur Croix-Blanc!" The head made no effort to raise itself, the body moved slightly, but no response came. The time had evidently arrived. The prostrate figure before me had apparently reached the second, or speechless and helpless stage which the doctor had described to Madame, so it was clearly my duty to apprise the Marquis.

I regained the salons, and was not long in discovering a Mephistopheles promenading arm in arm with an odalisque. I passed in front of the pair without seeming to notice them—the sign previously agreed upon with the Marquis. On turning I perceived that they were moving in the direction of the boudoir, and, as soon as I could do so without attracting notice, I reentered the conservatories and resumed my old position behind the vase, the Marquis having bidden me to do so in order that I might be within call if wanted.

On looking through the half-open window a strange scene met my gaze. There in the boudoir upon the sofa, just as I had left him, lay the masked Mephistopheles whom I knew to be the Abbé, and in front of him stood the odalisque—otherwise Madame la Marquise—leaning on the arm of another Mephistopheles whom she thought to be the Abbé, but who was in reality the Marquis.

"François," said the odalisque, looking up at her partner, "you can at least speak without reserve. You have not opened your lips to-night. Pray do not be so discourteous to Monsieur le Marquis as not even to bid him adieu. I am sure he would never forgive us if we were so far lacking in politeness."

The standing Mephistopheles remained immovable, betraying by neither speech nor action that he had heard the odalisque. Through the frame of the recumbent Mephistopheles there ran a shiver, which showed that he heard and appreciated the words of Madame. His hand was partially raised, but fell back powerless by his side, while a movement of the mask seemed to indicate an attempt at speech proved abortive.

"What can possibly be the matter with Monsieur le Marquis," continued the odalisque, banteringly, "that he does not rise to receive us? Perhaps a little too much wine—who knows? I think we had better loosen his mask and admit the air. It may help to revive him," and she made a movement toward the couch. Her Mephistopheles restrained her by compressing her engaged arm tightly with his own. She seemed surprised, but for a moment or two said nothing.

"Well, François," she at length remarked, "it seems useless to prolong this interview. If neither of you will say anything, what can I do? I will ring for Lisette, who will summon Philippe. He will undress him and put him to bed, while we take our little drive; is it not so, mon cher?" and she made a step toward the bell.

Still the standing Mephistopheles, impassable and speechless as before, held her close bound by his side, and again did the recumbent Mephistopheles writhe impotently upon the couch.

Now, for the first time, did the odalisque show signs of uneasiness.

"François," murmured she, "François, let us end this scene. A strange apprehension fills me. It may be carried too far. Let us desist before it is too late. Let us summon Philippe, and depart at once."

Still the rigid and sinister figure by her side said nothing and held her fast, and still did his masked counterpart quiver on the couch. I crouched, horror-stricken and breathless, trembling with unknown fear of what might happen.

All of a sudden, with the speed of light, the odalisque disengaged herself from the arm of her partner, and darting to the couch snatched the mask from the recumbent figure, disclosing the well-known features of the Abbé, which were passing through the most hideous contortions, and seemingly in the throes of death.

With a wild and prolonged shriek the odalisque threw up her arms and fell back motionless into the arms of the Mephistopheles. By this action she upset a wax candle from the candelabrum pendant from the ceiling, which falling against one of the light hangings of the boudoir instantly enveloped the whole chamber in a blaze. I sprang through the open window and assisted the Marquis to pull Madame through a side door into the corridor, in time to save her from the flames. As I leapt back toward the boudoir to rescue the Abbé I was intercepted by the Marquis, who pushed me forcibly back, saying:

"Fly at once. I will attend to that. Get Lisette and go."

I needed no second command, but flew up the staircase only to meet Lisette running down. She had on her traveling dress, and carried a small bag.

After this I have no distinct recollection of events. All is confused. I remember the shoutings of "Fire! Fire!" The frantic hurrying of a motley crowd through corridors and down staircases. Two carriages standing at a portico, into one of which four cloaked and hooded men bore the motionless form of an odalisque, and in the other of which Lisette and I were whirled away. I remember, as we drove off, the gallop of the fire-engines, the swish of water, the crackling of the flames, the falling of timbers, and the lurid glare of a burning building. I remember, confusedly, a trip by rail, the bustle of a departing steamship and having a stateroom assigned, and being addressed as Monsieur Dubois; but it was not till we were three days out from Havre that I regained the equilibrium of my senses.

When we reached New York I eagerly sought the Parisian papers. They recounted the burning of the mansion of the Marquis de B— during a bal masque, and as Madame la Marquise was never seen or heard of again, and as the Abbé R— had mysteriously disappeared on the same night, and as the engagement of staterooms on board the Belgique was traced to him by an employé of the steamship company, and as these staterooms were proved to have been occupied by a lady and gentleman on the passage to America, popular opinion naturally decided that the Abbé had eloped with the Marquise. A single charred and unrecognizable corpse had been discovered in the ruins, supposed to be one of the servants. Whose corpse that was I leave you to judge for yourself. As regards the Marquise, my impression is that the Marquis had laid his plans to have her privately conveyed away and immured in a nunnery or madhouse, and that the carriage into which I saw borne the body of the odalisque was there for this purpose. I remember seeing the death of the Marquis recorded three years later.

As for myself, the money of the Marquis did me no good. I entered into business two or three times in New York and failed. Lisette died two years ago. I then came to California, and here I am. I see you are dozing, so you had better spread your blanket in that corner by the fire and turn in.

Cora Pearl.

A Paris correspondent writes of this famous cocotte as follows: Cora is a moody creature, and very inconsistent in speech. She talks in different strains at different hours of the day. She has her Monday morning and Monday evening tune, her Tuesday's aria, her Wednesday's cavatina. She tells all sorts of stories of herself and her antecedents, being anxious apparently to surround her past life with mystery, and so augment public curiosity respecting her. She has done much more of this thing within the last five or six years than ever before, and it is not improbable that she now hopes to compensate for decay of her charms by becoming an enigma. My impression is that she is ignorant of the author of her being, though there is little doubt of her illegitimacy. She appears to have been reared until she was fifteen or sixteen by an old woman who had been paid to take care of her in the market-town of Tuam, Ireland. She had been tolerably well educated, and was a girl of vivacity and intelligence, and noticeably passionate.

She went upon the stage as a ballet-girl, and attempted to act; but her accent, though she had studied French from childhood, interfered with her success, and caused her to relinquish the theatre.

At eighteen she captured a Russian prince—princes are, as you are aware, abundant in Russia, and in Paris, too—and he had so much money, and was so eager to spend it, that she indulged his humor to the fullest. He placed her in luxurious lodgings, furnished her with carriages, jewels, servants—everything that unnumbered coins could purchase. He gave dinners and parties to artists, journalists, actors, and litterateurs, and soon grew to be the fashion. The Prince had a choice assortment of vices. He drank, gambled, and did everything he ought not to have done. It was not possible for his wealth to last at such a pace. Cora spent 100,000 francs a month; and, discovering that he was immensely in debt, and must soon reach his financial end, she secured still another friend, and had the comfort in a few weeks of seeing all his effects sold at auction. He upbraided her for perfidy, but she laughed at him, and when he called again refused to receive him.

From that time until six years ago she continued in the same course. She would have no lovers who were not rich, and she scattered their funds with a recklessness savoring of malignity. She has always had a passion for display, and display of the costliest. Her toilets were pronounced ravishing; she set many of the modes that were followed on both sides of the sea; her name crept into paragraphs in Boston, New York, and Chicago. Every dissipated man of fortune, whether old or young, who came here, was desirous to meet Cora Pearl; and many of them paid enormously for her acquaintance. Several young fellows committed suicide on her account, and this vastly increased her vogue. Paris is inclined to go mad over cocottes who drive men to self-destruction, as this cyprian very well knew. I have been told that Cora was partially induced to enter upon her career of a lorette by the example of Lola Montez, many years her senior, who was born at Limerick, County Galway. Cora never secured, as her fellow-Irishwoman did, a king for a lover, and never made revolutions in Bavaria, or anywhere else; but she has created a commotion for twenty odd years, and advertised herself in two worlds.

The strangest thing about Cora is the source of her attraction. She is not and never has been handsome. She is and always has been very plain. Her features are large, not well formed, and inclined to coarseness. Her figure is not bad, nor very good, either. She is not noticeable for grace. She is not strictly intellectual; albeit, she has acquired by dint of close observation and retentive memory a quantity of bright ways and speeches that pass for style and wit. She is beyond forty now, and looks older. When she was twenty-five she did not seem very young; and, indeed, there is nothing in or about her that can explain her unquestionable power.

Persons who have known Cora for many years say that she never does any good and never has done any. She may bestow benefits sometimes, but it is by accident. She admits that she is selfish to the core; that it would be no satisfaction to her to render the whole world happy. Her desires, her aims, her aspirations begin and end with herself. The evil she has wrought gives her undisguised pleasure. How can any man love, like, or even endure such an unwomanly woman? Yet men have adored her for more than twenty years. What can be the secret?

A Wisconsin girl put on trousers and started through the deep snow to walk six miles to a village for provisions, the family larder being empty. She soon became tired out, besides losing her way, and the cold was intense. A big Newfoundland dog which accompanied her was the means of saving her life. She scooped out a hollow in the snow, lay down in it, and made the warm dog lie on her, shifting him about so as to successively cover the coldest parts of her body. In that way she passed a whole night, and was not very severely frostbitten. "With two or three more dogs," she says, "I would have got along very comfortably."

Suppose the hangman does bungle when he hangs a murderer. Did it ever occur to these sentimental howlers that the murderer is not at all careful, and tender, and gentel when cutting some woman's throat, or smashing some old man's skull?

Were not curiosity so over-busy, detraction would soon be starved to death.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERBS

Little People.

I stole so gently on their dance;
Their pygmy dance in red sunrise;
I caught the warm and tender glance
Each gallant gave his dear one's eyes.

Wee ladies, clad in fine bat's wing,
With plumed lordlings stamp the heel;
Behind them swords and fans they fling
And foot it blithely down the reel.

They sighed and ogled, whispered, kissed,
In meetings of the swaying dance—
Then fled not, but were swiftly missed,
Like love from out a well known glance.

I sprang—the flashing swords were grown
Mere blossom—stalks from tulips tossed,
The fans that sparkled on the stone
Were turned to sprays of glittering frost.

CHARLES DE KAY, in February Scribner.

Life and Death.

If I had chosen, my tears had all been dew;
I would have drawn a bird's or blossom's breath,
Nor outdone yonder dove. I did not choose—
And here is Life for me and here is Death.

Ay, here is Life. Bloom for me, violet;
Whisper me, Love, all things that are not true;
Sing, nightingale and lark, till I forget—
For here is Life, and I have need of you.

So, there is death. Fade, violet, from the land;
Cease from your singing, nightingale and lark;
Forsake me, Love, for I without your hand
Can find my way more surely in the dark.

MRS. S. M. B. PIATT, in February Atlantic.

The Ermine.

I read of the ermine to-day,
Of the ermine who will not step
By the faint of a step in the mire,
The creature who will not stain
Her garment of wild white fire,

Of the dumb, flying, soulless thing
(So we with our souls dare to say),
The being of sense and of sod,
That will not, that will not defile
The nature she took from her God.

And we with the souls that we have Go cheering the hunters on
To a prey with that pleading eye.
She can not go into the mud!
She can stay, like the snow, and die!

The hunters come leaping on,
She turns like a hart at bay,
They do with her as they will. . . .
O thou who thinkest on this!
Stand like a star, and be still.

Where the soil oozes under thy feet,
Better, ah! better to die
Than to take one step in the mire.
Oh, blessed to die or to live
With garments of holy fire!

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, in Independent.

Dandelion Ghosts.

The common flower that children love
All other common flowers above,
The dandelion bloom, alas!
No longer stars the wayside grass,
But folds away its yellow robes;
And now a myriad gauzy globes,
Gray gossamer ghosts, float everywhere,
Like bubbles blown along the air.

Dear home-like flower, which cheers away
The dusty path of every day,
Even death is kind to thee, and brings
Twin gifts of liberty and wings.
O peer of butterflies and bees,
Fair playmate of the wandering breeze,
Methinks I would rejoice to be
A free and fetterless ghost like thee!

No ghastly phantom, pale and stark,
Stalking reproachfully through the dark,
To fright the souls which held me dear,
And mourned my loss with tear on tear;
And yet, at last—so hard to bear
Are loneliness and dull despair—
Their pain of sore bereavement healed
With love more warm than ghosts can yield.

No spectre, bringing woe and dread,
To blanch from timid lips the red,
But such a gentle ghost as might
Unchallenged come in fair daylight,
Unsoiled by dust, unwet by dew,
In fearless freedom strange and new,
To sail serenely through the air
Uncaught, unlied, everywhere.

No fate were happier than to be
An evanescent ghost like thee,
A mild returner from the dead,
Which few could note and none would dread;
To visit, not in grief or gloom,
The scenes which saw my early bloom,
And mark how perfect and how fair
The world could be—and I not there!

Ah, happy flower, that smilest through
Thy three bright days of sun and dew,
And then, when time decrees thy doom,
Risest anew in rarer bloom,
A perfect sphere of daintiest white,
As soft as air, as still as light,
Leaving these earthly damps of ours
To seek, perhaps, the heaven of flowers!

ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN, in Sunday Afternoon.

There's a Justice in London named Cockburn,
And a street that's denominated Holborn,
And according to rules
Of the best English schools,
These rhyme to a Place that's called Woburn.

Indiana spends nine millions annually on her schools, has school property worth twelve millions, and knows the least of any State in the Union.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } - - - - - Editors.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1879.

We have no very high opinion of President Hayes as a statesman. He certainly could not have been considered a great warrior save in Ohio, and in Ohio, judging by what has been done, a reputation can be made in almost any line upon a very small capital. Yet the very qualities (or lack of quality) that have been characteristic of this President were precisely the qualities wanted at this juncture to produce a successful administration. The administration of President Hayes has been beyond question the most successful we have had for years, and the reason lies directly upon the surface, and is easy to see. What the nation wanted above all things at that time was absolute peace, and peace could only be had by leaving the South to take care of its own affairs without interference. A strong man in the presidential chair, no matter of what party, could not have done this. Any Republican President, with enough brains and force to maintain the respect of his party, would have interfered to some extent. He could not have avoided doing so if he had desired it; and whether he desired it or not the party would have compelled him. Any Democratic President letting the South alone, as Hayes has done, would have alarmed the North, and all parties in self-defense would have done something to disturb matters. In other words, the time had come when a weak man was wanted, and Providence or something else furnished him at the right moment. There are evils that sometimes beset a nation that nothing but time can cure. The bad effects of African slavery in the Southern States can not be remedied by any administration. They are grown into and are part of the every-day life and habits of the people. No legislation can do more than to put them into the way of being cured. Time must do the rest. And any administration that can bridge over even so short a period as four years, so that time can go on with its healing influence uninterrupted, is a useful administration, and confers a benefit upon the world at large, and this country in particular. And whether such a result is brought about by the strength or weakness of the Chief Magistrate is of no consequence. It is enough that it is brought about, and that we have four years elapse in which the South is made no worse—no harder to cure. If Mr. Hayes could be re-elected for a second term it would be a positive blessing to the country. This we suppose, however, is impossible, but let us pray that we may have one who at least will do as little harm as he.

In 1872 a great national party was created and kept together for a considerable season almost upon the sole issue of a single term for the Presidency. And at one time it looked as if Mr. Greeley would be elected to the Presidency upon that question. The Democrats, we believe, still hold to that doctrine; and Mr. Hayes, when the Republican candidate in 1876, thought so highly of it as a principle and as a popular party cry that he made his personal platform to embrace it, and was elected upon the single term pledge. Yet, in spite of these facts, there are certain influences in the Republican party apparently resolved not only to put aside the one-term principle, but to even abolish all restrictions upon the continuance of the Chief Magistracy in any named individual, and to make the effort to elect the same citizen to that office at least for a third term. Of course if they succeed in this movement there is an end to the long-established rule that two terms are the limit beyond which no citizen is to hold the office. Is the Republican party in favor of this change in the unwritten law of the land? Or is the clamor for the nomination of General Grant confined to his personal following, consisting of those who have held office under him? Can it be that the Republican party has fallen so completely under the domination of the mere place-hunter that the of its voting masses are stifled and those of contractors and office-holders alone can be heard? Is this party prepared to admit that it has been reduced to the condition of having but one man capable of administering the affairs of the nation; or, to take the other view, has it but one available candidate? And is it willing to overthrow a cherished tradition of the nation, proceeding from the lips of Washington himself, in order to elect its favorite? This may all be; but we, at least, do not believe that matters have come to such desperate straits with the party that has elected every President for twenty years. We do not believe the Republican party is reduced to a single candidate for the Presidency, or even to a choice between a few named individuals. It has good men by the hundreds capable of polling the party strength, and that is all any man should be expected to do. The Republican party is not so attached to General Grant or any other man that it is willing for his sake to abolish the rule that no man is to be President more than twice. All of this is, we hold, assuming that the administration of Grant was creditable to him and beneficial to the nation, which many Republicans do not think. The point we make is that the people of the United States (and the Republican party make up the best part of that) do not want, and, at least in our time, will not have any man elected President three times. And we serve notice upon the office-holders, contractors, and distillers, who we believe are making this cry, that while it is easy enough for them, holding the party machinery as they do, to nominate General Grant for a third time, when the election comes around the result will be quite the other way. He will be defeated, and what is more they will learn that in putting up a candidate for a third term they had insured defeat in advance. We have no unkindly feeling toward General Grant. On the contrary, we pay and always have paid our full proportion of the debt of gratitude this nation owes him, besides other taxes not always so pleasant to pay going in the same direction, but the time has not come, and we hope it never will come, when, for any reason, any citizen must be elected to a third term as President; and, above all things, the time has not come when any particular citizen must be elected because no other fit person can be found. We do not pretend at this time to say whether the Republicans can elect the next President or not, but they certainly can not elect any body who has been President twice before.

The steady descent of politics in California, with the certainty that the government is going to the bad as fast as it can, should put this over-taxed community at least upon inquiry for a remedy. It seems to us that matters can only be improved by bringing over to the side of good government the wealthy men of the community. And these can only be induced to favor reforms by first making them secure in their acquisitions. There seems to be not the least doubt that our government has grown rapidly worse from the time when the corporations were first attacked through the Legislature. And the philosophy of this is easily enough understood by a little examination. From the moment that the Legislature began its attack upon corporations those aggregations of wealth were placed upon the defensive. They then put forth all their force to obtain control of the law-making power. The general interest they had in common with their fellow-citizens, for economical government and low taxation, was swallowed up in the face of the great peril that threatened their very existence. They have captured the government, and now hold it. But the effort to maintain the status quo absorbs all their energy, and leaves no balance to be applied in the direction of cheap administration and low taxes. Now it seems to us only too obvious that this fight of the people against corporations should be speedily brought to an end. If the people can not win it—and it is very apparent they can not—they had better either make an absolute peace, or at least agree to an armistice long enough to enable both parties to unite their forces against the thieves and tax-eaters now hanging about the public Treasury. We propose a truce to last five years, during which time the corporations, feeling secure in their existing franchises and privileges, are to turn their influence entirely to the securing of a sound, honest, and economical administration of State and municipal affairs. Let the people agree that for five years the rates of freight and fare on railroads shall not be interfered with; that water rates and the price of gas shall not be touched, or if changed they shall be raised; and that these corporations, in return for the advantages of peace, contribute a corruption fund of a certain agreed amount—not less, say, than $250,000 a year—to elect good men to office where possible, and failing in that then to bribe the bad ones to act honestly during the then current term. A second fund might be made up in the same way to be used in keeping the press on the side of the people and good government. Of course, the organization of the lobby need not be interfered with materially. The same staff would be kept up; the rank and file could be put on half pay till the end of the truce. In a word, the lobby would be put on a peace footing, the regimental cadre would be maintained by having full sets of officers all the time in service and under full pay, but temporarily on the side of good government; the common soldiers, being on half pay, would be kept in sight and really under control of the chiefs, so that the entire lobby could be mobilized at a day's notice, in event of the truce coming to an unexpected end, and ready to be massed and moved wherever needed to protect the corporations the same as now. This scheme would be far better for the corporations than the present system, as it makes them secure of their regular earnings. It would be better for the poor devils in office, who are now watched so sharply that it is becoming exceedingly difficult to steal anything of much value without being caught at it. Besides, it would be better for the people, who would have this advantage, that all the bribing and corrupting would be done in their interest instead of, as now, to their detriment. And we are inclined to think that the average office-holder—say, for example, a member of the Legislature—would vote for an honest measure for as small a sum, possibly for something less, than he would demand as an inducement to vote for a bad one. And again, if all the bribes were on the side of honesty and good government, what reason could arise for any man voting or acting badly? From $250,000 to $500,000 a year put into the hands of a judicious lobby would, in our judgment, make the people of the State almost irresistible. We, therefore, propose to the two parties to the struggle that a truce be called and this system be tried, satisfied as we are that a cessation of hostilities once had on the plan we have named will ripen into a perpetual peace.

It is with pleasure that we observe the changing attitude of Denis Kearney upon the question of capital and capitalists. A year ago he was roaring like a very Numidian lion about the "bloated and lecherous bondholders" and monopolists that were oppressing the people. Since a certain famous interview with a leading citizen, President of the Railroad, his roar has grown steadily less vociferous, and now, when he roars about capital and monopolies and corporations at all, he roars as mildly as any "sucking dove." He apparently desires the capitalists to know that, although he appears to be a lion, he is, as to them at least, not a lion, "but only Bottom, the weaver." We shall only say that we are glad to find the hero of the sand-lots so tractable. So long as he is on our side we shall not inquire into his motives. It is enough that he is with us. One year ago he waged war upon capital in every form, but especially upon capital invested in railroads and gas and water companies. He even threatened to lead his crowd of workmen up the sides of Nob Hill, and to destroy the elegant mansions that crown its aristocratic summit. The railroads were robbing labor of its earnings; the water and gas companies were oppressing the poor—all were enemies of the people, and should be visited with dire vengeance. The situation was alarming. We, as friends of all these interests, trembled for their very existence. But all this is changed, greatly to our relief. It is now pretty evident that the dominion of San Francisco has been divided between Kearney and the corporations. They are to be left alone, and he is to spend his force in capturing the City Hall. His war is directed against the Board of Supervisors and the city government. The only enemies labor now has prove to be those awfully bad fellows who keep the municipal offices away from Kearney, Wellock, and the Ward Vice-Presidents. Capital is no longer oppressing labor; labor has no more complaint to make against capital. Peace is declared between them. Murphy is now the people's foe because he draws $5,000 a year that otherwise might come to that son of toil, Clitus Barbour. Bryant is far more wicked than any lecherous bondholder, for he keeps the horny-handed Wellock out of a $7,000 or $8,000 salary. The twelve Supervisors are more hateful than the water and gas companies both put together, for so long as they stay in office twelve patriots now laying brick or shoveling sand will continue to lay brick and to shovel sand—things not a little disagreeable to these twelve patriots. The monopolists that Kearney now rants about are Burnett, who monopolizes an office worth $5,000 a year; and Maynard, who monopolizes another worth $4,000; Mitchell, another monopolist of the same sort, and Taylor, also a monopolist, are specially odious at the sand-lot just about this time. But the Railroad, the Water Company, and the Gas Company have ceased to be subject to vituperation. We are glad to see this great change, because it is in the interest of true conservatism, and we are not disposed to look too sharply after the cause. Let Kearney carry the city and put his hungry pack into the offices made vacant by the defeat of the present incumbents, and we venture to say that the voice of Kearney howling against high salaries and official corruption will cease and be heard no more. Let us, then, support the Kearney ticket, for we are tired of hearing him. Let us give him office and stop his mouth.

Too late for any detailed description of our trip we returned from the railroad front in Arizona. Half way between Yuma and the Maricopa Wells, in the midst of a great desert, two thousand men are busy laying rails at the rate of two miles per day, pressing on for we know not where. The present objective point is Maricopa Wells, 160 miles east of Fort Yuma, and 408 miles from Los Angeles. As Maricopa Wells is a mere watering spot in the great desert of Arizona, we assume that the work is to be pushed further eastward, at first to Tucson, and then, we believe, to the Gulf of Mexico, thus giving us another transcontinental railroad.

AFTERMATH.

Another evidence that the pulpit is an obstructionist in the way of every practical reform that depends upon common sense for its success, are the sermons now being delivered in Boston by the Reverend Joseph Cook. The Reverend Joseph is a lineal descendant from the Joseph that escaped with torn garments from the seductive allurements of the wife of Potiphar. He very purposely resides in Boston, where there are no kindred temptations. His views, as expressed on the Chinese question, betray such profound and utter ignorance of the subject, such an amazing and stupid disregard of facts, and are such egotistical exhibitions of his own shallow self-complacency, that we cannot consent to attempt to seriously reply to them. If the Reverend Joseph Cook could be shut up in the house of the Reverend Otis Gibson with some of the Boston mission reformed Chinese women and converted Chinese men, it is our opinion that, while his virtue would be strengthened and his religious views encouraged, his estimate of Chinese virtue would undergo a serious modification, and he might be brought to the belief that other than moneyed considerations are involved in the Chinese question. Boston first had commerce in Africa, importing slaves. Public opinion in Boston re-manded negroes back to slavery. Mammon is God in Boston, and the Reverend Joseph Cook is one of Mammon's preachers. Boston is full of them.

In a monograph in the Quarterly Journal of Inebriety, Dr. Geo. M. Beard asks: "Are drunkards automatons?" Dr. Beard is clearly of the opinion that they are. Some men, he says, are habitually drunk when near or on the sea, habitually sober when living inland. We know of similar instances of automatic inebriety. Smith is always drunk when he has money, sober when he has not. Jones drinks like a fish when he is out of jail, but when he is in, why, bless him! he would delight the soul of a Temperance crusader, but doesn't delight his own, for Jones prefers himself as drunk as he can get. Then there is Robinson who, when he is full of ice-water, is as steady as a head-stone, but fill him up with whiskey and he is just beastly! Yes, it is clear that drunkards are automatic; their condition is determined not altogether by their surroundings, but by those and the things which they surround.

Baron Liebig thought to gauge a nation's civilization by its consumption of soap per head of population, but it is now held that its consumption of paper is the better test, and in this respect the United States lead the world. We can not remember from day to day the amount of paper which Mr. Pickering says is used in printing the Morning Call, but whatever it is, it and the amount consumed in making kites ought to be deducted from our total. It is plain that neither kite-flying nor Call-reading does anything for civilization.

The counsel employed by the man who tried to kill King Umberto will make strenuous endeavors to prove him insane. This is the usual course also in England; several people have attempted to assassinate Queen Victoria, but they have all been adjudged insane; and, describing them as "harmless lunatics," the Government has commonly sent them in chains to some remote colony whence they never return. The Germans and Spaniards are not "educated up" to this practice, as yet. When a political opponent of the Emperor William fills the imperial body with duck shot, or a Spanish workingman, dissatisfied with his wages, and having a view to bettering his condition, spins a slug at King Alfonso, they take the fellow and kill him. At first blush this appears as wise as it is natural; but the other system has a distinct advantage in affirming as a political fact that only lunatics have an aversion to the sovereign.

We believe, as a rule, in the taste, judgment, tact, and literary skill of the men who make the emotional head-lines for the daily newspapers, but must protest that he of the Call is in error when he calls the death of a "late litigant" by strychnia a "Bloody Culmination of a Remarkable Suit!" It recalls the fate of the overthrown enemy of the merciless Irishman—who "put him to the sword wid me shillelah."

"When bad men combine," said Mr. Kearney, quoting from his fellow-statesman, the late Edmund Burke, "the good must associate; else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice, in a contemptible struggle"—and the great man, staggering in between Wellock and Carl Browne, threw an arm round each and defied a couple of newly painted wooden Indians, which the manufacturer had set outside to dry, to do their worst.

In all the countless "reminiscences" of the late Mr. Bayard Taylor with which the newspapers and magazines are teeming, we note a disposition to regard him as a great poet. Even so competent a judge as Mr. R. H. Stoddard has permitted his personal esteem to affect his literary sanity as to take this view of the matter. Now, Mr. Taylor was obviously not a great poet; less obviously, but not less truly, he was hardly a poet at all. He had all the poet's faculties but one—the poetic. He had a happy knack at versification—that is to say, a true ear and an obedient vocabulary—a fancy that was three parts ingenuity, sound literary health, an artist's sense of the beautiful, and a notable adroitness in walking pretty close to the dead-line between sentiment and sentimentality without getting across. A fine example of his skill in this respect are his not unjustly celebrated lines entitled "The Song of the Camp." He is here actually on the line from beginning to end, but preserves his equilibrium with the skill of a trained wire-walker—an amazing and amusing performance.

If Mr. Taylor's own pen had not supplied abundant evidence of his lurking and evasive disability—to denote an idea incapable of expression by a phrase incapable of definition—and given us pretty constantly recurring glimpses of its nature, we should perhaps receive from Mr. Dan O'Connell the impression that the great traveler did not quite write poetry because he did not quite know what poetry is. If the lines of Præd, which Mr. Taylor assured Mr. O'Connell (vide a late ARGONAUT) were his favorite poem, commanded even his temperate admiration (it does not follow; there seems to have been a good deal of "drink before judgment"), he had a frank and forthright incapacity to distinguish poetry from the baser sorts of nonsense. Granting that Mr. Taylor really enjoyed that kind of things it was most imprudent of him to die before he had the happiness of reading Messrs. Stuart and Pollock, and Mesdames Windle and Corlett.

We should dislike to be understood as affirming an equality of merit between the work of these illustrious persons and that of Præd. Intrinsically those of Præd are no doubt a shade the better, but looked at in another way, the case is different. Considering who wrote them, the best of his are bad, and, considering who wrote them, the worst of theirs are astonishingly good! There is really no reason why a monkey should not manage a peanut as well as a man, but did any one ever fail to be surprised to see him do it? We confess it seems to us a sacred mystery and a heavenly miracle that these people can even write their names.

A receiver has been appointed for the Bodie Standard, on the application of the editor, Mr. Satan, who could not get on well with the business manager, Mr. Mammon. The former says that whenever he writes a beautifully malignant lie, which he loves for its intrinsic value as a work of art, the latter goes rustling round town with that gem in his hand, trying to make sordid souls believe it is a puff of their business, cunningly disguised to allure the unwary patron. One day the editor wrote: "Old Jabe Stetson, the knuckle-backed scare-crow of the mountain, was kicked out of the Missouri penitentiary for stealing, before he had served half his term." The business manager held that this was a veiled advertisement of Swelpmeggott & Co.'s ready-made clothing—wearing which, no man can appear either knuckle-backed or a scare-crow—and worried them for $10. This coming to the knowledge of the editor, that gentleman publicly announced that he would have no more to do with "a cock-eyed and screw-mouthed miscreant whose wife founded the first hurdy-gurdy bell in Red Dog, and lost all her customers by the blind infatuation of dancing with them."

If the new Constitution is adopted, our foreign militia companies will no longer be permitted to carry the flags of the foreign countries against which they may some day be called upon to serve, alongside the flag of the country which now so profitably serves them. We regard this provision as eminently just and decent. Let our foreign-born population cherish for their native lands as much love as they will; but flags are not the insignia of love, but of loyalty.

There will be also an end of the Tax Collector thrusting his hand into the pockets of the native-born citizen for money to teach the foreign-born citizen his mother speech in the public schools, for if no State tax is levied for this pretty purpose it is hardly credible that any county will tax itself. San Francisco may do so in deference to the corner groceries, but we think not. The provision of the Constitution alone will bring the outrage into discredit, and hereafter Herr Fritz Schneddeker will have to instruct his callow brood at his own fireside by speaking less bad English and more bad German.

The New York World makes what it rightly calls a novel offer—namely, to publish a story in its columns by whomsoever among living American writers its subscribers may select by ballot. "No expense," says our contemporary, "will be spared in this matter, and our readers may feel assured that they will have a story from any American author whom they may select." The World promises, moreover, to keep everybody advised as to the state of the ballot from week to week. Well, we don't believe anything will come of it unless the writer of this paragraph should be the man selected. Any other famous novelist having such a "corner" as that would put up the price out of all proportion to the merit or value of the work. For example, should the choice fall upon the author of that surprising romance, "A Jew Boy Inverted" (which, appearing in the columns of a local daily, attracted such a favorable criticism from the trained literary censors that cluster about the foot of Mt. Shasta (see bees about Hymettus), she would probably demand the head of this present writer on a charger. After all, we do not know if it would be an extraordinary demand: the head hasn't been worth much since the wreck of its faculties upon the unyielding mystery of that story.

We see it stated that when Sierra Nevada began to go up, Mr. Mackay bought a block of it for General Sheridan's twins, intending to surprise their papa with a gift to his darlings that would make his eyes protrude. The stock, unfortunately, went down before Mr. Mackay's information justified him in selling; and now the twins exalt their dimpled fists, and, in a thin infantile falsetto, swear that the deal was a dead open and shut swindle. "Out of the mouths of babes—" some rascally infidel has misplaced all those Bibles, and we can not complete the quotation.

Will our correspondents do us the favor when writing letters for publication to omit the customary compliment to the ARGONAUT, putting it in a separate letter. It can not possibly affect the fate of the contribution, in any case, and if the other matter is printed it will itself be assuredly cut out. Compliments which seem disinterested are as pleasant to us as to any one, but it surpasses our comprehension how an editor can not only be persuaded by them into publishing what he does not want, but can have the blind effrontery to display his shame, by printing the flattery along with the matter for which it "greases the slide." That it is a "custom of the press" is not sufficient; so is lying.

In California—a long remove from the original Thirteen Colonies—the traditions of the revolutionary war have not the vitality that characterizes them along the Atlantic seaboard, and on the whole it is perhaps as well that they have not; for, truth to say, they are of a somewhat narrow and reasonless nature. In Philadelphia, where the bell first rang for Independence, and where the world has not moved much since, it is natural that "the spirit of '76" should survive with scarcely diminished energy; but it is amusing to note particular methods of its manifestation which would seem ridiculous anachronisms here, and which are really not very dignified there.

The foregoing remarks were suggested by Colonel Foreney's new weekly paper, Progress. Up to the present time its mission seems to have been the overthrowing of the tottering thrones and effete dynasties of Europe, and the exaltation of the American eagle out of sight. Every department of the journal is religiously devoted to these certainly most patriotic objects, but with a zeal that seems to us out here more amusing than effective. In the issue before us, for example, the "crowned heads" are soundly and editorially beaten. In the European letter it is gravely complained that in London "the grocers label all their poorest cheese 'American.'" In another part of the paper an indignant patriot avers that in Paris the shopkeepers get unmounted American photographs "and paste them on cards bearing on their backs the names of Paris artists." A short time ago Progress attributed the failure of American ceramics to "British gold," employed in bribing the workmen to spoil the wares in baking.

All this is very amusing, but it has its value in marking the distinction between Eastern and Western modes of regarding outlying civilizations. According to the Eastern patriot the Old World, of whose culture, civilization, and progress ours is but a faint and glimmering reflection, is a land of darkness, where bandits conspire against the altar-fires of Western liberty. We of California are disposed to let them conspire in peace, while we turn our eyes, not backward to the sins of crazy old King George, but forward to the machinations of that fellow the Emperor of China. Our attitude, we protest, is the more dignified and business-like.

The sand-lot has bloomed and borne fruit. From its fertile soil there has issued a daily journal under the editorial control and management of William Wellock & Co. The first and only number that we have seen gives promises of being an important rival to the other established organs of the new party. The Chronicle, the Post, and the Open Letter must look to their laurels.

More than twenty persons in Verzegnes, Italy, have gone stark, staring mad, owing to sermons and pictures relating to hell, incident to a recent "revival." An Italian revival has another name than ours, and is not altogether the same in character, but in its results would seem to be about as satisfactory as those which Mr. Morse, author of the Passion Play, has had the happiness to attend.

General Howard, of Los Angeles, explains in the Constitutional Convention that he is not a bigot, although one of his ancestors was a hard-shell Baptist who believed hell was full of infants. What a revolting doctrine! Fancy a poor, innocent infant writhing and twisting in eternal flame, deprived of milk and paregoric, and forever disabled from becoming an ancestor of General Howard!

THE GIRLS' CHRISTMAS.

Time, December, 1868. Place, Valley of the Santa Clara, in what was then Santa Barbara, but is now Ventura County. Scene, a large room, in a rough, unfinished house; said apartment answering the various purposes of parlor, kitchen, dining-room, bed-room, living-room, store-room, and granary to the Jones family. Just now it is in possession of a group of merry girls, all talking at once, and making sufficient noise for four times their number.

There were the three Jones girls—Maude, Jennie, and Nettie—with Kate Crawford and Mary Wallace, representing the entire force of young ladies of the "Valley," and at this moment eagerly discussing the possibility of a Christmas tree in their colony.

"I tell you girls, it must be done," cried Nettie at last; it will never do to let our very first Christmas in this Valley pass unnoticed."

"I second your motion," exclaimed Mary, eagerly, "and here's my hand on any and every plan of yours;" whereupon the two friends vigorously shook hands.

"But, girls," interrupted Maude, the elder and one of the more cautious of the quintet, "you know we have so little material with which to work. Think of having a tree, and nothing to put on it. You know there will be nothing in the line of Christmas goods at the Mission; Santa Barbara is forty miles from us; and we have literally nothing."

"Maude is right," said Kate. "I am sure we would fail in any such enterprise."

"Fail!" chorused Nettie and Mary, spiritedly. "We have stricken that cowardly word from our vocabulary."

"But screw your courage to the sticking point and you'll not fail," quoted Jennie, dramatically.

"Of course we will not," replied Nettie; "and as for presents, just look here"—standing up on her chair and waving a large piece of scarlet flannel over her head. "Who wants anything nicer for a present than a neat pin cushion? Now, here is material for just thirty-six—the number of bachelors in this Valley by actual count. Now, I propose to make my share of thirty-six red flannel pin cushions, and every lonely bachelor heart in this Valley shall be gladdened with one on Christmas night!"

Here she was interrupted by shouts of applause and approval; and each one, stimulated by Nettie's example, agreed to do her part toward making the tree a success.

Nettie, then producing a pair of scissors and proceeding to dextrously form hearts, diamonds, and other standard forms for a pocket pin cushion, soon had the entire thirty-six ready for thread and needle and bran stuffing.

Three years before the time of which we write, this valley of El Rio de Santa Clara was one unbroken field of mustard, whose acres were traversed by large herds of cattle, and whose stillness was seldom broken, save by the voice of some vaquero as he galloped along swinging his riata and caroling some Spanish love song.

At that time this especial grant was purchased by Mr. G. Briggs, of San Francisco, who divided it into homesteads, and soon sold it to home-seekers from the northern portion of the State. Of course, everything was new and frontier-like. Only the year before the one of which we write had the plow for the first time broken the quiet surface of the virgin soil. But happy homes were giving promise of rapid formation from this chaos; and our small circle of girls desired to do their part toward the sociability of their isolated colony by these Christmas festivities under consideration.

There was no house in the Valley large enough for any gathering of people, therefore our heroines had decided upon a place known as the "Oil Works." This was situated three or four miles from the Valley, up a lovely and romantic cañon. Here had been built, some years before, extensive works for gathering the oil which flows from various springs in the adjacent mountains. The project had been abandoned, and the "works" had fallen into disuse, being occupied only by the overseer. This gentleman had kindly offered our venturesome young ladies the use of any or all of the buildings, and they had graciously accepted his offer. Brothers and bachelor friends were recruited—either by enlistment or draft—into the service of these determined maidens, and everything was going swimmingly toward success. Just "one thing needful"—or the want of it—caused them much inconvenience. There was in all the Valley just one light "spring wagon," which, with a pair of dashing horses, was the property of an extremely modest and diffident bachelor. Aside from this "turn-out" all riding must be in the heavy, jolting, farm wagons.

December 24th found everybody in our colony making eager preparations for this coming event of the year. Many a fair chicken and lordly gobbler had offered his highly-prized head to the sanguinary axe. Golden pumpkin pies by the score smiled and ogled each other upon various pantry shelves in the different farm-houses. Our "committee"—as they had dubbed themselves—had made two or three trips to the "Oil Works" to complete their preparations there, and to-day were en route for San Buenaventura—or the "Mission," as it was called—to make some final arrangements.

"Oh!" groaned Nettie, as they jolted along in their hard, springless wagon, "if we could only be so fortunate as to get a ride in that nice little wagon belonging to that bashful John Stone."

"What nonsense," remonstrated her eldest sister; "why he would faint at the thought of a petticoat in his wonderful wagon."

At this moment the object of their solicitude appeared, with his neat little "turn-out," and drove rapidly past them, never venturing a glance at the owners of the eyes which followed him so enviously.

"Girls," said Kate, quietly, "I have a presentiment that we will ride in that wagon before Christmas night."

"That is some of Kate's Scotch second-sight, let us hope," said Mary.

"Well," said Nettie, after a moment's thought, "I'll register my solemn vow to this effect: We will ride in that wagon before Christmas night."

"How will that happen?" they all questioned eagerly.

"Strategy, me boy," said Nettie, mysteriously.

The girls traveled around all day, visiting the few stores of the Mission, trying to select something desirable from the meagre assortment. Finally, tired and hungry, they were just stowing themselves away in the wagon, ready for the home trip, when there was seen approaching a gentleman friend—with whom, by the way, Nettie had been seen early in the day in close conversation—nearly dragging by the arm our bashful bachelor.

Jennie had but just time to ejaculate: "Girls, there comes Joe Gaylord, as I live, leading John Stone like a lamb to the slaughter," when the pair arrived, one flushed and triumphant, the other covered with blushes.

"Ladies," flourished Gaylord, grandly, "permit me to present Mr. Stone, who most kindly desires to tender you the use of his horses and wagon, and himself as driver, during your Christmas festivities."

Poor Stone blushed and stammered, and seemed to desire above all earthly things only a loophole for escape; but the merciless Gaylord held him relentlessly to the front while the committee bowed its thanks, and Nettie, as chairman, accepted with much formality his unsolicited offer, winding up her speech with: "Then, Mr. Stone, I presume you to expect us to be ready for you bright and early Christmas morning, and we will certainly not keep you waiting."

Stone bowed in speechless misery at thus finding himself "in for it," as he afterward expressed it to Gaylord, while our committee rode off with their mouths crammed full of handkerchiefs, shawl corners, veils, etc.

Christmas morning dawned clear and bright. Eight o'clock found our committee cosily ensconced in the famous little wagon, with poor Stone a martyr to their smiles. Nettie and Mary had managed to seat him next to Kate, who was herself bashful and quiet, and all but the two most interested in the little game testified their appreciation of the situation by smiles and sly glances.

"I wonder if Kate's 'second sight' revealed that our driver would speak on this trip," whispered Jennie, as the pair on the front seat rode silently along the lovely cañon road.

"If she was told any such nonsense I proclaim her familiar spirit a false prophet," answered Maude, "for here we are at our journey's end."

They found the oil works at the base of an almost vertical mountain of rugged rocks, in one of the most romantic little dells in California. There were several buildings, rude, but comfortable, containing from one to two or three rooms apiece. In one large, long room, which they had previously decorated with evergreens and scarlet berries, they had already arranged their table. Another, likewise ornamented, answered the purpose of general sitting room, and in a third was the tree, carefully hidden from prying eyes.

The committee took possession of this last room, and, with locked doors, through which access was gained only by mysterious knocks and whispers, proceeded to decorate the tree. Ere long wagons began to arrive, bringing the Valley dwellers almost en masse, for a regular "day of it," as they joyously expressed it.

A committee of matrons arranged the dinner, which was finally announced about three o'clock. The Rev. Mr. Elton led the procession that filed in, and took his assigned place at the head of the table, while the company arranged themselves up and down the long tables. Fully one hundred and fifty persons sat down to the feast, and bowed their heads while Mr. Elton pronounced a "grace" exasperatingly prolonged, to the minds of the hungry ones of the company. Such a dinner as was spread smilingly before them, waving its savory incense to their grateful nostrils! Roasts of turkeys, chickens, ducks, immature pigs, with pies, cakes, puddings, and other things too appetizing to mention to ears of the hungry.

It was quite dark when they finally arose from the table, and were invited by the "committee" into the mysterious room where lurked the tree. Such shouts of delight as went up from the delighted crowd, at this marvel of the skill of Santa Claus, fairly startled the mountain echoes from their hidden lairs.

The tree itself was a lovely little mountain cedar, brought from far up in the mountains by some enthusiastic gentlemen assistants. Nothing could be lovelier than its dark green branches towering far up into the roof-angle of the ceilingless room.

In lieu of tapers candles had been cut up and arranged on the branches. Festoons of snowy pop-corn gleamed and coquetted in the greenness. Home-made candy bags hung in studied negligence. Thirty-six well filled scarlet flannel pin cushions were arranged for the best effect. There were home-made presents, brought in by different ones for their loved ones; home-made dolls, for eager little girls; a rag baby, for one misanthropic old bachelor; two more for a childless and fun-loving pair—the husband having slyly procured one and labeled it for his wife, who had previously secretly done the same thing for her liege. These, and scores of things besides, were all taken from the tree by the committee and delivered to their owners amid screams of laughter and applause. At last the tree was stripped, the pop-corn devoured—when suddenly was heard the squeak of a violin, which instrument was the only music-maker in the colony.

Instantly the bachelors made an attack on the tree, carried it outside, and soon had the floor cleared for dancing. Then an enthusiasm seized upon the crowd. Grave, elderly men clasped the hands of their own, or some other men's, wives, and escorted them to a place in a "set." A staid Presbyterian elder so far forgot himself as to offer his arm to a Methodist sister, and soon had her whirling around after the fashion of giddy youth.

Boots too heavy for dancing were pulled off and put in one corner, while the excited owners "tripped it" in their socks. Such leaps, and capers, and pigeon wings as were made by feet long unused to obey the musician's call. Verily, the sounds wrung from that ancient violin seemed the "music of the spheres" to attendant ears.

As the rain had commenced falling soon after dark the company were really compelled "to make a night of it;" but with the coming of the "wee sma' hours" the enthusiasm began to lag to a degree. One at a time the revelers dropped off, and sought a bench here, a lounge there, a table in some other corner, and converted it into a bed. Adjoining the dancing room was a very cosy little sitting room, furnished with some rude benches, a table, and a cheerful fire. Hither Kate repaired near daylight, and, too tired to be critical, "played" one of the benches was a bed, dropped down upon it, sans pillow or bed-clothes, and in a moment was sound asleep.

She slept heavily until sunrise, when awakening with a start, she found under her head a pillow formed of a gentleman's dress coat, and on her bed a coverlet which was in the habit of doing duty on all other occasions as an overcoat.

Looking up in surprise, she found the only occupant of her improvised bed-room to be their friend John Stone, who sat by the stove, minus coat, his arms folded on the table, and his head on his arms, sound asleep. The fire was nearly out, and the room quite cool; so rising softly, she timidly placed one coat over the sleeper, put the other on the table, and silently withdrew.

The company breakfasted on the fragments of the dinner, with the addition of hot fragrant coffee; then set-out on their homeward trip. One of the last wagons to leave the scene was Stone's with its occupants. Again the fun-loving girls had arranged Kate's seat next to the driver's, and, a heavy shower overtaking them, she found herself the holder of an umbrella for their mutual protection, while the others sheltered themselves under two more in the back seat and bottom of the wagon. The "first seat" again made the trip in silence, but those in the rear amply atoned for it with their sleepy jokin'.

Time passed, and the first Christmas tree had passed into a happy memory. The thirty-six grateful recipients of scarlet pin cushions were drawn out of their shells as it were to mingle more in general society. Surprise parties gradually assumed size and regularity. The farm wagons were brought into requisition, and moonlight drives and serenades instituted. And thus was fulfilled the mission of Nettie's piece of red flannel. It was noticed by the more observing ones that the only spring wagon in the valley was seen oftener than mere courtesy demanded wending its way toward Kate's home. It became a regular thing for the span of shining bays to stand every Sunday afternoon tied to Father Crawford's hitching-post, while their reticent owner and Kate were exchanging a silent communion in the house. Or she was seen riding behind them—not alone, either—to meeting, or a mere drive that had no definite point.

No one could ever imagine how it came about with this quiet pair, for they were never heard to address each other save in the merest monosyllables or briefest sentences. But it did come about in some way, without doubt, for when the next Christmas night arrived John and Kate were missing from the valley festivities. In fact, they were quietly married in the morning and started on a bridal tour to San Francisco.

"What a fortunate pair," said Joe Gaylord, when the wedding was announced; "there will never be any quarreling in their family. But how did they manage to ride into matrimony?"

"Oh! Kate talked him into it," replied Nettie.

SAN JOSE, January 27, 1879.

INGLE.

The Dead Student.

One of the most remarkable funerals ever seen anywhere was that of a student who was shot a few weeks ago in Wurzburg, Bavaria, by an officer of the City Guard. He was arrested while on a lark, and, attempting to run from his captors, was deliberately shot in the back at close quarters. Great public commotion followed, the general aversion of the German people to the insolence of the military being stimulated by this act to the highest pitch. A mass meeting was called, at which a petition and address to the Government were adopted, demanding the severest punishment for the "frivolous and brutal assassination." The funeral was attended by nearly one thousand students and by the entire faculty of the university. The body had been lying in state in the hospital during the day, and as darkness set in it was borne forth with funeral music, followed by the long procession of students, bearing torches and flags draped in mourning. It was carried slowly through the main streets of the city to the railway depot, where a special train was waiting to convey it to the home of the young man's parents. The return of the procession was through the streets along which the student had taken his way on the fatal night. Opposite the main garrison, to which the officer who had shot the student belonged, the procession came to a halt and formed a hollow square, in the middle of which the standard bearers, with their draped flags, stationed themselves. Then, while the flickering torches cast fantastic shadows over the plaza, the famous song, of which a correspondent at Marysville has kindly sent us the following translation, was sung:

GAUDEAMUS IGITUR.

Come, be gay while yet we may,
Darker days betide us;
Youth goes by with joy and gladness,
Age comes on with care and sadness,
Then the earth will hide us.

Where are they who ere our day
Revealed happy-hearted?
Some to realms of light supernal,
Some to Stygian shades infernal—
All are now departed.

Life as brief as fading leaf
Fast away is fading;
Death comes rapid rushing on us,
Lays his icy hand upon us,
No more mortal sparing.

With the last words of this student song all hurled their torches simultaneously to the ground, and in darkness and silence the multitude dispersed.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, February 9, 1879.

Bean Soup.
Fried White Bait.
Broiled Chicken. Saratoga Potatoes.
Asparagus. Green Peas.
Roast Mutton. Mint Sauce.
French Artichoke Salad.
Whip Cream. Sponge Cake.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Bananas, and Oranges.
To MAKE A FINE WHIP CREAM.—Half a pound of powdered sugar, juice of two lemons, one gill sherry. Mix and add one pint of thick rich cream. Set on ice, whip to a strong froth, and serve in glasses.

To MAKE BEAN SOUP.—See No. 26, Vol. I.

There is nothing to be ashamed of in poverty, except being ashamed of it.

INTAGLIOS.

Asbes of Roses.

Soft on the sunset sky
Bright daylight closes,
Leaving, when light doth die,
Pale hues that mingling lie—
Ashes of roses.

When Love's warm sun is set,
Love's brightness closes;
Eyes with hot tears are wet,
In hearts there linger yet
Ashes of roses.

Lament.

Sleep on, my love, in thy cold bed,
Never to be disquieted;
My last good night! Thou wilt not wake
Till I thy fate shall overtake;
Till age, or grief, or sickness must Marry my body to the dust
It so much loves, and fill the room
My heart keeps empty in thy tomb.

Stay for me there! I shall not fail
To meet thee in that hollow vale.
And think not much of my delay;
I am already on the way,
And follow thee with all the speed
Desire can make or sorrow breed.
Each minute is a short degree,
And every hour a step toward thee.
At night, when I betake to rest,
Next morn I rise, nearer my west
Of life almost by eight hours' sail
Than when sleep breathed her drowsy gale;
Nor labor I to stem the tide
Through which, to thee, I swiftly glide.

'Tis true, with shame and grief I yield;
Thou, like the van, first took'st the field,
And gotten hast the victory
In thus adventuring to die
Before me, whose more years might crave
A just precedence in the grave.
But hark! My pulse, like a soft drum,
Beats my approach, tells thee I come;
And slow however my marches be,
I shall, at last, sit down by thee.

The thought of this bids me go on
And wait my dissolution
With hope and comfort. Dear, forgive
The crime! 'I am content to live
Divided, with but half a heart,
Till we shall meet and never part.

Naughty.

Somebody's lips were close to mine;
Thus tempted I couldn't resist.
Roguish and rosy, a sweet little mouth
Was suddenly softly kissed.

Somebody's eyes looked up and frowned
With such a reproving glance.
"If kisses were wicked?" I asked my pet;
Then the eyes began to dance.

And smiling, the little maid answered,
As I knelt there at her feet:
"They must be a little bit naughty,
Or they never would be so sweet."

The Old Cartoon.

In an ancient church in the city of Rome,
Far up in the grand and lofty dome,
The master hand of an artist had traced
Cartoon, which should never have been defaced.
The sun that stole through the turret blinds
Had faded the colors and marred the designs;
And dust, like a veil, gathered thick and fast,
And hid from the present the work of the past.
And the thronging people who worship below,
And the priests who are wont to come and go,
Ne'er dream, as they gaze on the wall so high,
Of the rare beauties that hidden lie.
But a painter, one day, enwrapped in thought,
On the dingy wall an outline caught,
And guessed that under the dust and mould
Lay the work of some of the artists old.
And when he had swept the dust away,
And freely let in the light of day,
The magic brush in his skillful hand
Retouched into life the pictures so grand;
And they flooded the chapel with radiance bright,
Till it seemed almost like a holy light;
And the people, delighted, laughed and wept,
To think that the walls such a prize had kept.

So all around in this world of ours
Are beautiful characters fairer than flowers,
That need but the touch of a helping hand,
And a pitying love that will understand,
To clear the rubbish and wrong away,
And raise to the life of an endless day.

January.

O Winter! Frozen pulse and heart of fire!
What loss is theirs who from thy kingdom turn
Dismayed, and think thy snow a sculptured urn
Of death! Far sooner in midsummer fire
The streams than under ice. June could not hire
Her roses to forego the strength they learn
In sleeping on thy breast. No fires can burn
The bridges thou dost lay where men desire
In vain to build.

O Heart, when Love's sun goes
To northward, and the sounds of singing cease,
Keep warm by inner fires, and rest in peace;
Sleep on content, as sleeps the patient rose,
Walk boldly on the white, untrodden snows;
The winter is the winter's own release.

Middle Age.

All over! Ay, I look at mine own hand,
That quite has lost the lissom grace of youth,
But, if its living pulse I understand,
Fit yet to hold its own for love or truth;
Scarce meet for pretty pledge or kiss of lover,
Yet fond and firm for clasping in another.

Over and done! I sit before the glass,
Drawn full into the sunshine's ruthless glare;
I see the crowfoot where the soft bloom was,
The silver threads set in the bright brown hair;
My mirror never flashed me beauty back,
So now, perchance, I have the less to lack.

And yet for all it's over, in the face
That gazes sad and patient back on me,
I fancy love might read some quiet grace,
Some touch of matron calm serenity.
The eyes that live on children's life for years
Gain something surely from their smiles and tears.

Must it be over? One by one they flash
To their own place, these cherished stars of ours,
During the storm in courage blind and rash,
Seeing no serpent coiled among the flowers;
Leaving us stranded on the lonely shore,
Where the long waves chant, "Never, never more."

They will not, may not, can not come again;
The bond is snapped, and the great current sweeping
Each little boat on to the mighty main,
Over each barrier in its fury leaping,
Bears them in its resistless might along,
For wreck or haven, gain, loss, prize, or wrong.

For us, t all is over; though sometimes
We feel old power pulse our being yet.
"Past, past!" the voice of Fate around us chimes,
Past, aim and dream, vain struggle, or regret!
Put by the mirror, let the hand alone,
The last card has been dealt, the game is done.

ELITE DIRECTORY

For San Francisco, Oakland, and Vicinity.

*A Private Address, Carriage, and Club Directory and Visiting
Guide, containing the Names and Residence Address
of nearly Six Thousand Society People.*

THE BLUE BOOK OF THE PACIFIC COAST.

The ELITE DIRECTORY is a book of 288 pages, elegantly bound in blue and gold, gilt-edged, and handsome in typography, paper, and general appearance.

JUST PUBLISHED, AND FOR SALE BY THE PRINCIPAL
BOOKSELLERS, AND SPECIAL CANVASSERS.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.
SAN FRANCISCO SOCIETY.
RECEPTION DAYS.
CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
JEWISH ADDRESS LIST.
OAKLAND ADDRESS LIST.
PRIVATE MEMORANDA.
ARMY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
NAVY CALLING AND ADDRESS LIST.
PERMANENT GUESTS AT HOTELS—
Palace.
Grand.
Occidental.
Lick.
Baldwin.
BAR ASSOCIATION.
ART ASSOCIATION.
LORING CLUB.
BERKELEY CLUB.
CHIT-CHAT CLUB.
CLUBS AND CLUB LIFE.
PACIFIC CLUB.
UNION CLUB.
BOHEMIAN CLUB.
OCCIDENTAL CLUB (Oakland).
SAN FRANCISCO VEREIN.
CONCORDIA.
SPANISH-AMERICAN CLUB.

OLYMPIC.
THEATRE DIAGRAMS—
California.
Baldwin.
Bush Street.
Standard.
Grand Opera House.
POINTS OF ETIQUETTE—
Introductions.
Salutations.
Calls and Calling.
Strangers in the City.
Visiting and Visiting Cards for Ladies.
For Gentlemen.
General Directions, Cards, Calling.
The Kettle-drum.
Parties, Balls, and Germans.
Dinners and Dining Out.
Breakfast, Luncheons, and Supper.
Etiquette of Weddings.
Opera and Theatre Parties.
Theatre Etiquette for Gentlemen.
Ladies' Theatre Invitations.
Miscellaneous Rules.
PERSONNEL OF THE PRESS.
CHURCH DIRECTORY.
PUBLIC SCHOOLS.
BUSINESS NOTICES.

BE SURE AND SEE A COPY

BILLINGS,
HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,
Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,
PARTY INVITATIONS
AND VISITING CARDS
Engraved and printed in the latest style.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,
PURE MOCHA COFFEE,
PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,
MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS
welcome to inspect collection.
W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. THE NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.
MARK SHELDON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Wilcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10
each.

Every stage manager should study Hoyle. The amount of common sense which underlies a well-played game of cards might, if bestowed upon other diversions, make our recreations rational. Indifferent players call it luck. The old stagers call it Hoyle. In either case, Hoyle has a clearness of judgment in the matter of trumps from which there is no appeal. A woman will cling to her trumps to the bitter end. So will a stage manager. So will a famous star. He leads off with a big mistake. He (or she) fancies himself to be the biggest trump. (There's a sentence for the Atlantic Monthly to have a spasm over in the interest of the new pronoun.) The public, with singular unanimity, never agree with him. "The play's the thing" to catch the fancy and the favor. People go out of curiosity to see an actor but once. That curiosity is satisfied in half an hour. Then they devote themselves to the play and to the manner of playing it. When they have seen both the man and the play many times, they have not even the original impelling force of curiosity. Why did not Mr. John Raymond produce My Son two weeks ago? He might have spared himself many execrations of California, its people, and their taste. After all, the taste which rejected Risks should not be impugned. We have declined better plays than Risks without thanks. My Son is something altogether different. It is the little heart-history of a plain German household. It is the dramatization of an ideal. It contains in its plot neither bigamy, murder, nor adultery. Hence, it is not French. Neither politics, railroad speculation, nor backwoodsman. Hence, it is not American. Its action is played almost entirely upon the hearthstone. Its major chord is the blind idolatry of a father for his son. It is not a rare thing, excepting that it is generally the mother who loves in this way rather than the father. But women are always at the feet of some idol. It is too ordinary an occurrence to be dramatic without an infinity of accessories. In effect, women are always worshipping. Men are submitting to be worshipped. When they change from passive to active they become dramatic, and are embalmed in works and plays. In the new play "Herr Weigel" is a retired shoemaker. "My son" is a gentleman of elegant leisure, spending the retired shoemaker's money after the fashion of the jeunesse dorée. It is always just such a father who loves just such a son in this mad, unreasonable way. It is ever the ambition of the low-born prosperous man to make a gentleman of his son. When he has venerated him to the full extent of his purse, he admires the vaneer as much as he loves the boy. It is always a pitiful case, for it is always an affection thrust back upon itself.

"Vain love is long the untiring nurse of Faith,
And waits on hope until it starves to death."

Mr. Raymond, the most eccentric of eccentric comedians, has grasped the character of "Herr Weigel;" albeit, that it is far out of his usual line. He has abandoned, for the nonce, his broadest mannerisms. Many who felt themselves in duty bound to laugh have stayed the laugh. If they had wept, his "Herr Weigel" would have been a masterpiece. As it is, it is a gem in the rough. But it is in the rough; it lacks completeness, finish. Even now it is least appreciated where it is best played. The contrasts of the last act are sufficiently striking without the art of the actor. A man is cast from opulence to want. In the first act he is a "Bom-bastes Furioso," and lives in plenty; in the last, he is a weak and bowed old man, withered by time, bent by misery, working on a cobbler's bench by day, sleeping on a straw-pallet by night. An audience never pretends to resist an appeal of this kind. But the best scene for "Herr Weigel" is the little interview with his son at the breakfast-table. Mr. Wells, by the way, as "My boy, my son, my Leopold," comes to the breakfast-table in primrose kids. Later, he calls his sister a "se-gash-us" girl. Yet, for all, he is rather a fair specimen of the spirited prodigal son as he sits in languid disgust opposite the poor old man, whose heart and bank account he is likely to break. Disillusion is the most exquisite pain in the "fever of living." The old shoemaker suffers in silence under the hard, ungrateful words of the son for whom he has done so much. But the heart is full. Mr. Raymond's face is not naturally mobile, but he was at his best in this little bit, however long and loud the applause of the after scene. The company has not before appeared so advantageously. Miss Prescott was relieved from melodrama. The advantage was mutual. As a happy, hearty fraulein singing a pretty song and reveling in a fund of animal spirits, she is an improvement on the Miss Prescott we know. Indeed, the little picture of the German family is quite a happy one. Miss Grace Pierce turned back her long, loose black locks with a "round comb," put on a short frock, and capered around as merrily as a cricket. How they do utilize her. Two weeks ago she stood in the same spot, with whitened locks and wrinkled face, and played the grande dame. Miss Lottie Cobb as the third sister is lackadaisical and romantic. There is always one such in a family of girls. Mr. Felix Morris as the music-master looked as Dutch as a dike. This little man has really a wonderful knack in transforming a face which would seem to be as unchangeable as a ship's figure-head. But his idea of the comedy of the part was rather extraordinary. He constantly appeared and disappeared in a jumping-jack sort of a way, plying an imaginary piano. Fortunately, he played all his melodies in the air. Yet I think I have read somewhere of the "after-air." Music-masters are a queer lot, but they never do anything like this; nothing satisfies them but noise. As for playing in the air, no one does that but spiritualistic humbugs. Also, perhaps, little girls who have not yet made life a misery to those around them with a real piano.

Talking of noise, I had a foreboding the other night at the Bush Street Theatre that the performance would be a fiasco. A terrible and utterly irrelevant clatter was raised at the wings. A prodigious noise is the first, last, and only resort of a bad minstrel. I hoped against fear that Goodwin would sustain his reputation. And he did. He is indisputably a clever comedian. A man must be an extraordinarily clever comedian to shine in such a mass of flatulent nonsense as the "collaborated farrago," and Goodwin does shine. Unhappily he shines alone. There is no one else in the troupe who has any talent for anything whatever. Eliza Weathersby is rather a pretty, bright-faced little woman. She sings a song only fairly. She dances stiff-kneed. She does not compare with Alice Atherton, over the way; nor with little Ella Chapman; while Searle and Singer are both vocalists, which she is not. What made her reputation—which is really enviable? Yet withal she is rather pleasing, being brisk and blithe. Also, she dresses well. That green costume, with its lace and silver pendant, was remarkably pretty. She would be a great favorite if she did anything. Miss Elma Delaro is what the Scotch would call a "sonsie lass." She is a picture of vigorous health. She has a bright, sparkling face, and a weak and partly-cultivated voice. She has an absolute talent for the selection of pretty music. Other talent she has not. But, like Eliza Weathersby, she has a genuine desire to please, and can not, therefore, be displeasing. Miss Jennie Weathersby is a heroine. Judging from her voice and her immature style, she must be a young girl. But she sacrifices all the blushing graces of girlhood—for youth is beautiful—and transforms herself into an old maid, of hideous appearance. Hideous in this instance is a mild word. With her appearance as a ballet girl in yellow calico pantalets the climax of the fun in the "collaborated farrago" is reached. It is funny beyond words to describe. People laughed till they wept, then they stopped and thought about it, and laughed some more. It helped out a great many bad jokes afterward. Every one came out grinning broadly. Every one said it was a fine entertainment. And yet we had all laughed at nothing but the ballet girl and Goodwin. He is indisputably a clever and capital mimic. His imitation of Booth was the worst I have seen. His imitations of Frank Mayo, Joseph Jefferson, and, above all, of John Raymond, are the best. Raymond is particularly difficult to imitate, but Goodwin does it so nearly that he actually looks like the great eye-water man as he speaks. He has a particularly neat way of finishing up his imitations with the characteristic walk of the actor imitated. That queer, dragging step of Jefferson's was wonderfully natural; so, also, was "Davy Crockett's" lounging step. His really best imitation was that of Crane; in voice, gait, action, and frequently in facial expression, he was Crane to the life. This imitation he sustains throughout the entire performance. One is sure to wonder afterward what all the laughing was about. One laughs a great deal after nine o'clock; but they should omit the farce, and cut out the first half of Hobbies, to make the evening thoroughly enjoyable. Is there any one in town who has not been told that Goodwin is only twenty-two? The newspapers have all published a line to tell that he is "only twenty-two." Men button-hole each other in the street to say that Nat Goodwin is "only twenty-two." Knots of maidens emerge from the matinees whispering "only twenty-two." There is a faint echo of "twenty-two" going around the theatre between the acts. Mr. Nat Goodwin committed a very creditable action in having been born only twenty-two years ago; but what is to become of him when he is twenty-three?

Evangeline pursues the even tenor of its way to good houses. The advent of the "Froliques" has shown what really clever people there are in Rice's party, and what a lot of them there are, too. Next week will be their last. The programme will be changed almost nightly. We shall have Robinson Crusoe once more, with Alice Atherton in her beautiful white goat skin; and Willie Edouin shall be "Friday," and will be great again. We shall have the Babes in the Wood, with the pretty little tragedy in bird life. We shall have a chapter or two of Horror, and then good-bye.

Clara Morris! That means big houses and full money boxes. Who else could flit back and forth like a will-o'-the-wisp and draw crowds in a tri-sected engagement. Perhaps we are to have a new play next week, for Miss Morris has gone through her repertoire; but it is not announced.

At the California the tropical, black-eyed Rose Eytonge as "Cleopatra." She imports an "Antony." Now for a season of Egyptian splendor, a scenic revel, a spectacular tragedy.

BETSY B.

Christine Nilsson's winter costume is thus described—we hope incorrectly: "An extra coat made of diagonal cloth by a tailor, in every way (except suitable to a woman's figure) like a man's coat, with cutaway tails, or, as it is called in old-fashioned parlance, the shad-bellied coat. It buttons across the breast, and under is seen the waistcoat to match, with the usual vest pockets, across which the watch chain is slung. Standing shirt collar, plain starched linen shirt front, neck-tie with a horseshoe pin stuck in it—it only needs the neat little side whiskers to make the horsey get-up complete. Naturally the below part presented a difficulty in the matter of assimilation to the masculine model; but Nilsson had found her way out to her own satisfaction. She wears no petticoats whatever, but buckskin breeches; and over this is a plain, untrimmed skirt of plaid, or gray goods, so tightly drawn backward that her lower limbs are almost as clearly defined as a man's are in trousers. A tweed hat, or a beaver, is the headgear. For evening dresses the all-black broadcloth, with white tie, is assumed; for morning and traveling, a rough pea-jacket and a shirt of coarse texture."

Old Ike stood shivering and eyeing the thermometer for a few moments, and then running his head into the door of the store in front of which it hung said: "Boss, dis wedder indicator out heah is liable to force a man to buy a warmer ovahecoat if it hangs upside down much longah. De stuffin' in it done gone down into the cellar, an' ef you don't come out and take it in it'll freeze up an' bust, shuah; case de longah it hangs dar de coler it am gittin' out doahs. I'se a noticin' hit close."

THE GREAT JEW'S-HARP DISPUTE.

TO THE EDITOR—Sir: In a recent issue of a paper published in this city, there appeared the following basely fabricated testimonials:

January 2, 1879.

MY DEAR MR. MOSES:—Your Jew's-harp is the only one that I consider a perfect instrument. I especially admire the Moses Jew's-harp for its thorough bass, its second bass, and short stop. My opinion on this subject is shared by all my musical friends.

Yours most truly,

NAN THE NEWSBOY.

The above certificate speaks for itself, but I think it advisable to append the report of the jury on Jew's-harps at the Philadelphia Exhibition:

MOSES' JEW'S-HARP.

For Overstrungness.....	102
" Dominant qualities.....	102
" Sub-dominant qualities.....	102
" Pink-dominant qualities.....	102
Average, 102 out of a possible 100.

(Signed.) Ed. Hanslick, F. Gevaert, H. Hilton, Klappa, Judges.

KEOKUK, Iowa, December, 29, 1878.

SWEET MR. MOSES:—We could not leave without bearing testimony to the surpassing beauty and exquisite tone of the Moses Jew's-harp. We can say, and we say it boldly, that in the whole course of our lengthened musical experience in Europe, Irup, Orup, and Stirup, we never played on a more charming instrument. We feel assured that Her Royal Nib's Hopera Co. could not have achieved success without the aid of the Moses Jew's-harp, and we may add that the diminuendo of the dominant, sub-dominant, and pink dominant are absolutely unapproachable in their character. The carved legs and overstrungness especially fit it for the tongue and drawing-room; and be assured, Mr. Moses, that no other Jew's-harp but yours shall ever be used by us. Believe us always, beloved Mr. Moses, very sincerely yours, (Signed.) Oliiri, Napoleon Campana, Smith, Sparghetti, Riccadonna, Moretti, Martinelli, Adelina Patti, Bartolo Campobello, A. Ricardo, Eucalyptus Ornithorhynchus, Michelo Mulligani, A. von Beethoven, Guglielmo Bircho, Pazza Bolivar, Muldoono (il solido), Giovanni Cbelli, Georgio Francisco Locomotivo.

Now I wish to say just so much as this. The artists named above always used only my harps in all their performances in front of the leading lager beer saloons, and I can show where they have signed their marks to this effect, and I can also give the signatures of the proprietors of the beer saloons, who will testify that my matchless instruments were alone used in front of their places. Permit me to give the report of the judges at the Philadelphia Exhibition. The judges heard them performed upon in a Lager Bier and Wein Keller, just outside the Exhibition grounds, and immediately agreed to give the following report if the performers would withdraw:

SOLOMON NIBS' JEW'S-HARPS.

For the singing qualities of the aggrafe bar.....	102½
For the durability of the burglar alarm attachment.....	102½
For the extreme sweetness of the cow-bell register.....	102½
For elasticity, pertainacy, and mendacity of the tongue combined.....	102½
Average 102½ out of a possible 100.

Signed by all the judges.

Please publish the above in your valuable paper.

Yours respectfully,

SOLOMON NIBS.

To those of our readers familiar with French literature the following brief private judgments of M. Leon Gozlan on some of his contemporaries may possibly be not unamusing; they are certainly not wanting in point:

Alfred de Musset—Lord Byronet.
Henry Murger—Polyte Musset.
Prosper Mérimée—Stendhal in jelly.
Hugo—Grand and minute, a Michael Angelo Meissonier.
Renan—The sweetest of cruel men: Fénelon Strauss, author of The Life of Jesus.
Mme. de Girardin—The muse of the country set up as a milliner in the Rue Vivienne.
Lamartine—Psalm-singing voluptuary. Will be canonized as St. Alphonse de Parny.
Méry—Marseillais Gascon, who declares that I never was in the East Indies because he (who never was there himself) did not meet me there.
Chateaubriand—Narcissus of the Dead Sea or Jordan; weeping but not blind Homer reading the Iliad in a Bible binding; sort of St. Christopher who makes Christ carry him.
Guizot—Once upon a time I met on a Swiss glacier an eloquent Englishman speaking French. If not Guizot, who could it have been?
Thiers and Scribe—What a great historian Adolphe Scribe is? And what a wonderful vaudevilliste Eugene Thiers is?
Michelet—A woman's voice, a child's voice; complaints, sighs, cries of distress. I am moved, and rush to the sufferer's assistance, when a man, supple and strong, seizes me by the throat and strangles me. It is a thief—it is an assassin—it is Michelet?
Louis Veullot—Fish peddler: "Here's your nice fresh geniusees!" Hold your nose as he passes.

This is the kind of "personal paragraphs" now favored by our Eastern contemporaries with respect to "Genial John." At the time that John's relations with the late Mr. Ralston began Mr. Mackay's "recommendation" would have had less weight than now; and we suspect that Mr. McCullough's pecuniary obligations were assumed, not so much by indorsing the banker's paper as by indorsing his own: "Mackay, of Nevada, the bonanza king, took a liking to John B. McCullough, and recommended him to Ralston, the San Francisco banker; a theatre was placed in McCullough's hands, and made him rich. Ralston, however, in his last desperate days, obtained indorsements from McCullough, and when Ralston died John McCullough was in debt fifty thousand dollars. People told him to repudiate, on the ground of Ralston's fraud. 'No,' said he, 'Ralston was my friend; I'll pay it all.' He is bravely doing it; and under the elevating influence of such a sacrifice is growing as an actor and as a man."

A nearsighted gentleman went to an optician to have his glasses changed, they being no longer strong enough. "After this number," he asked, "what shall I have to get?" "These," replied the optician, showing another pair. "And then?" "These." "And then?" "Well, then you had better buy a little dog and string."

It is not the ability to be idle, but the ability to work, that constitutes happiness.

MATRIMONIAL JARS.

Adapted for the Argonaut from the Spanish.

In bygone times there existed a city where discord was unknown and peace and harmony reigned supreme; where the women did not think of asserting their rights nor the men of abusing theirs; where the civil and military authorities thought of nothing but promoting the welfare of the community at large; where politicians, bankers, lawyers, and tradesmen were scrupulously honest, and clergymen and church members disinterestedly devoted to the poor; where stocks and all other wild speculations were unheard of, and women were all virtuous and industrious and gossiped only occasionally; where even the servants were hard-working and reliable, and the babies, too, seemed to understand that they should not be the ones to disturb this universal quiet, for they seldom got sick and rarely or never cried. In fact, this city seemed to have transported heavenly bliss on earth. It had been observed truly that slight stubbornness was a characteristic trait of both sexes, but till the time when this truthful tale begins it had been productive of no serious trouble. But alas! the state of things above described was not to last forever.

The beadle of the principal church of the city was a young married man named Peter Simple, universally esteemed for his very mild disposition. His wife, Patience, was equally beloved for her gentleness. Although they had been married long enough to have forgotten the honeymoon, they still lived as happily as the married couples live in fairy tales, until one Sunday morning, when, for their misfortune and that of the whole city, as the sequel of this story will prove, their first matrimonial jar occurred. Peter Simple, wishing to dress and go to church, looked in vain in his chest of drawers for a good shirt. Only two clean ones could he find there—one with the bosom torn, the other without any buttons. This naturally displeased him, and he called Patience. She answered him in a slightly ill-humored tone of voice, having just picked up her favorite fan, broken to pieces, from a chair where Peter Simple had just been sitting. A slight skirmish was carried on between the two, but their naturally gentle dispositions and their mutual love prevented things from going very far. At breakfast another incident occurred which slightly affected their domestic peace. Peter Simple rose from the table to get the salt, which was missing. He found the salt-cellar on the sideboard, and upon taking it in his hands involuntarily struck a vase which Patience prized highly. The vase fell on the floor with a crash, and, of course, was broken to pieces.

"Oh, dear me!" exclaimed Patience, rather flushed, "what is the matter with you to-day, Peter? Do try and be more careful."

"I think, Patience, you might be a little more careful yourself. I never before found the buttons off of my shirt, and then your breakfast was poor."

"Buttonless shirts and poor breakfasts can be remedied, but broken vases and fans can only be replaced by money."

"Well, don't I make the money to buy and replace things?"

"But the fan and vase were not bought with the money you made; they were both presents from my relations."

"From your relations? From your family, of course."

"Of course, and why should that displease you? My mother—"

"Never mind what your mother always says or does."

"You don't like mother, I know you don't—"

"And what man does like his mother-in-law?"

But here Peter Simple paused a little; and this allowed him time to recover his self-control. The storm which had threatened a moment blew over, satisfactory explanations were exchanged, and domestic peace remained unaltered. Husband and wife affectionately helped each other in their toilet preparatory to going to church. Unfortunately, at the very moment they were stepping out the front door Patience saw a hair on her husband's coat-collar.

"Wait a moment," said she, officiously; "let me brush that hair from your coat-collar."

"Thanks," said Peter, as he looked at the hair which Patience held at her fingers' ends; "it is a hair of yours, I think."

"I think not; it looks to me like the hair of a man—like yours."

"No, indeed, wife; my hair is much shorter than this one."

"Well, it can not be mine, for this is the whole length of the hair, and mine is much longer than this one."

"But, see, this is exactly the color of your hair; mine is much lighter."

"And mine much darker."

"Stubborn as ever. Why will you deny what is so plain?"

"And why are you so contradictory of late?"

"I contradict you? Why, it is you who are becoming so."

"No, indeed; it is you who are always contradicting me."

"Now, don't make me lose my temper."

"Don't care if you do."

"Let us not quarrel—"

"If you choose to pick a quarrel—"

"Patience!"

"A good dose of it must a woman have to put up with the tyranny of men, for you, like all the rest, are a tyrant."

"You shall repent having said these words."

"No, I never shall; for it is the truth."

"I might make you repent."

"Make me, indeed! Try it, if you dare."

"You defy me."

"I defy you to touch me, unless you are a coward."

"Oh, this is too much; you shall pay for that insult."

Poor Patience! She had never thought for a moment that her infuriated husband could strike her, but he did that, and then more—he gave her a sound beating. She cried bitterly, of course, but soon dried her tears and determined to put on her bonnet and shawl and go to her mother for sympathy. Needless to say she got that from her mother, and was advised by her to submit the case to a lawyer. Off went Patience to an attorney, whose wife happened to be in his office and listened to the complaint of the client, a thing which she certainly ought not to have done; but it was a case of sympathy for woman's rights. So, after hearing the complaint, she stepped forth and ventured to give her opinion. The lawyer remonstrated: a lively discussion ensued; from words he passed to blows, and his poor wife received a drubbing equal to poor Patience's; after which the two women were left alone to lament their sad fate.

The lawyer's wife proposed that they should go together to ask advice of an old notary, who, with his wife, were quoted as models of conjugal union; certainly they could best tell them what ought to be done. So both wives went and exposed their grievances to the new Philomen and Baucis. The old man refused taking any part whatever in the affair. He thought that conjugal squabbles should be settled by the parties interested exclusively, and referred wisely to the old adage: "Never interfere between man and wife." The old lady thought his view was correct in a general sense, but as there are exceptions to all rules, she thought this was an exceptional case, in which examples should be made of husbands who were brutal enough to abuse their superior strength. The discussion was kept up warmly on both sides, angry words were exchanged, insults followed, a cane was lifted, and, lo! a third wife was cruelly beaten.

The three beaten wives now held counsel, and resolved to appeal to the authorities for justice, calling first on the judge's wife, that she might exert her influence in their favor. The sight of three of her sex weeping and sobbing excited the commiseration of the wife, who pleaded their cause warmly with the judge; but he was inflexible, told them that justice must have its course, that when the case came to court justice would surely be done them if they had been wronged. He advised them to go quietly home and make up with their husbands. Indignation of the wife, backed by the other three wives; first result, a quarrel between the judge and his spouse; final result, a fourth wife beaten.

The news of this most strange and complicated affair ran like wildfire through the city, and was the talk at every fireside that night, and, incredible though it may seem, produced an identical result with every couple who argued the question. The beadle, the notary, the lawyer, and the judge had set the example, and taken the lead in this practical case of men's rights; the doctor, the tradesman, the shoemaker—in fact, all the husbands of the city—followed suit. The city, until then the model of conjugal peace, became suddenly the scene of the most frightful matrimonial conflicts, and wife-beating seemed to be a perfect rage there. Still, the innate meekness of its inhabitants was such that, once this frantic spell over, all was forgotten; peace and quiet was restored in every household, and for one whole year there was not even the shadow of a quarrel in the city.

On the day of the first anniversary of the general beating of wives, the angelic Patience was comfortably seated at the breakfast-table, opposite Peter Simple. They had been conversing lovingly; then there was a moment's silence; suddenly a smile flitted over Patience's countenance, and Peter, naturally enough, inquired what had made her smile.

"Oh, nothing," said Patience.

"You certainly could not have smiled without a cause."

"Certainly not, but the cause is so silly."

"Never mind how silly it is. Tell me about it, and we will laugh together."

"Do you remember, dear Peter, what happened just one year ago to-day?"

"No, I do not."

"Why, Peter, it is just one year to-day since you—"

"Sure enough, now you have reminded me of it, for really I had forgotten all about it."

"I am glad you had, because it was a stupid quarrel after all."

"Yes, very stupid, and to think that I so ill-treated my darling little wife without any justifiable cause."

"They say people always do quarrel about straws; we quarreled about a hair."

"Yes, about one little hair, the hair of a woman."

"Remember, it was the hair of a man; it was yours."

"I am positive it was the hair of a woman, and yours, too; but let us not renew this foolish quarrel."

"I do not wish to renew it, but—"

"But you stick to your opinion, woman like."

"Man like, you had better say."

"Not so; we give up when it is proved to us we are wrong."

"So do we women; but in this case I know I was right."

"And I know I was right."

"It is not so."

"It is."

"You do not say the truth."

"It is you who—"

"Peter!"

"Patience!"

"Husband!"

"Wife!"

The blows were not long coming, and poor Patience was mercilessly ill-treated in celebration of the sad anniversary. She could not brook this affront, and again sought for protection from her mother and her lawyers: in consequence of which step the very same and identical scenes of the preceding year were successively repeated at the lawyer's, the notary's, the judge's, and, in fact, in all the households of the city.

This most singular and unheard of state of things caused the rumor to be started by the inhabitants of the surrounding cities, to the effect that the citizens of the model city became on a given day of the year subject to sudden and severe fits of insanity. Measures were proposed and resolutions adopted at a general mass meeting in said cities to stop the evil, lest it should contaminate the whole country. It was unanimously resolved to have the model city occupied by the military on the second anniversary of the ill-fated day.

Scarcely had the sun dawned on that second fatal anniversary when the general quarrel was again renewed in consequence of one of the wives having imprudently referred to its origin. Detachments of cavalry from the surrounding cities penetrated into the model city, and endeavored to restore order by the force of bayonets; but the husbands of the invaded town flew to arms in defense of their independence. The wives, resenting that outsiders should pretend to interfere in their domestic troubles, helped their husbands. The fate of the invaders was the same that always befalls those who attempt to mediate between man and wife—both turn against the mediator. This case was no exception to the old rule; and the wives of our model city not only helped their husbands to drive away the invaders, but even submitted, from sheer spite, to receive a yearly beating at the hands of their husbands on each annual recurrence of the day, to prove to the invaders and to the world at large that they were not to be ruled by outsiders.

And thus the famous anniversary continued for years and years to be kept up in this most curious manner, until a learned man from the East arrived at our model city, and announced that he had made a most wonderful discovery, viz.: that the water of a certain river, which he alone could procure and explain how to use, had the rare virtue of freeing all wives from the anger of their lords. Our yearly-beaten wives flocked to the store of the learned man, and each bought a bottle of the great specific, which in its label directed that a mouthful should be taken immediately whenever any matrimonial squall was threatening, held between the closed teeth, and not swallowed before ten minutes. The experiment was tried and succeeded most admirably; for, in cases where the remedy was called for, the wives with closed and filled mouths could not answer their husbands, whose anger would die away from want of opposition.

As the habit of quarreling between man and wife is not entirely done away with, it has occurred to me that the secret of the learned man might be gratefully received, and perhaps successfully tested, with any other water, even if it were not bottled up and sold at a fabulous price. The remedy might be useful not only to women, but also to many classes of men in society—to politicians, for instance, who, by recurring to it, might be taught to speak only at the proper time and place.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 4, 1879.

St. Louis is tormented (what city is not?) by the noise of church bells, and an ordinance is under discussion prohibiting the ringing of bells over fifty pounds in weight. That would silence several fine churches, and it is likely that a compromise measure will be adopted, restricting the ringing to certain hours.

It is quite likely Missouri will legalize whipping. The common objection that it may be sometimes unjustly awarded, and an innocent sufferer can not be unflogged, does not hold in Missouri.

There are few nations which have a stock of proverbs so extensive and racy as the Spanish. Juan de Yriarte collected 24,000.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The chaplain of the Maine House of Representatives astonished his hearers the other day by praying that the Lord would encourage them "to stop speaking when they got through."

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

A CARD TO THE LADIES.

The success and intrinsic merit of an article are best indicated by the amount of abuse it receives from proprietors of similar articles. For some time past CAMELINE has been the object of malicious attacks under the head of "Cameleon" or "Creme de Lis." The proprietors or agents of "Creme de Lis," with the intention of deceiving the public, have attempted, in these advertisements, to confound CAMELINE with an obscure and rare chemical substance of somewhat similar name, in no way connected with or entering into its composition, and the name of this chemical has in these advertisements been distorted for the purpose of increasing the deception. We have nothing to say in this connection in regard to the comparative merits of CAMELINE and Creme de Lis, concerning which ladies are best competent to judge, but for the purpose of sustaining our assertion that CAMELINE is perfectly free from objectionable or deleterious substances, we herewith append the opinion of a number of prominent physicians of this city.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 1, 1879.

The undersigned, physicians of San Francisco, are familiar with the composition of the principal articles used for the complexion, and freely certify that WAKELEE'S CAMELINE is free from all poisonous or injurious substances:

L. C. Lane, M.D.,	Wm. Hammond, M.D.,
H. H. Toland, M.D.,	W. F. McNutt, M.D.,
R. A. McLean, M.D.,	A. J. Bowie, M.D.,
Chas. B. Brigham, M.D.,	J. C. Shorb, M.D.,
Benj. D. Dean, M.D.,	F. A. Holman, M.D.,
Henry Gibbons, Jr., M.D.,	Jul. Rosenstern, M.D.,
J. J. Clarke, M.D.,	J. D. Whitney, M.D.,
W. H. Bruner, M.D.,	Thomas Boyson, M.D.,
A. M. Loryea, M.D.,	C. C. Kenyon, M.D.,
Cephas L. Bard, M.D.,	Isaac S. Titus, M.D.,
Chas. C. Keeney, M.D.,	Harry L. Sims, M.D.,
A. M. Wilder, M.D.,	H. H. Stallard, M.D.,
Geo. M. Powers, M.D.,	Chas. McQuesten, M.D.,
Benj. R. Swan, M.D.,	James O. Shafter, M.D.,
L. L. Dorr, M.D.,	Wm. Carman, M.D.,
Jas. W. Keeney, M.D.,	Washington Ayer, M.D.,
Gustav Holland, M.D.,	J. L. Beares, M.D.,
Geo. F. Cooper, M.D.,	Chas. F. Frisbie, M.D.,
Samuel W. Dennis, M.D.,	H. Gibbons, M.D.,
J. M. McNulty, M.D.,	Thomas Bennett, M.D.,

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1858, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein. Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22nd day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEPHENS, Deputy Clerk.
JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

Never attempt to convey the impression that you are a genius, by intimating the faults of other men. Because certain great men were poor penmen, wore long hair, or had other peculiarities, it does not follow that you will become great by imitating their eccentricities. Imitate their good qualities, follow the example that so many of them have set, by having your picture taken at Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, No. 26 Montgomery Street.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Every man takes care that his neighbor shall not cheat him. But a day comes when he begins to care that he does not cheat his neighbor.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOW.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, Feb. 10, Brief Engagement of the incomparable artist,

ROSE EYTINGE,

Who will appear as Cleopatra in Shakespeare's tragedy of

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA,

Supported by

MR. CYRIL SEARLE.

The Play carefully produced with new Egyptian Scenery by Voegtlin and Forest Scenery, and the admired classical Roman Scenes by Porter. Elaborate Costumes by Mrs. Walter Smith. Properties and Appointments by G. F. Greenloach. Mechanism by R. Stackpole and Assistants. Appropriate music, selected from "Aida," by Stephen Leach. Charles Schultz, Musical Director. Picou's celebrated painting of Antony and Cleopatra, lately exhibited at Snow & May's Art Gallery, will be realized as a Tableau Vivant, designed by Voegtlin.

N. B.—The public are respectfully notified that, owing to the elaborateness of the stage settings, the Act Drop will be dispensed with, and the Green Curtain employed in its stead.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LÖCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening and every night until further notice,

THE ACME OF REFINED TRAVESTY,

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S

FROLIQUES

AND MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR., IN

HOBBIES!

The "Hit" Absolute.

Indorsed by the Connoisseur.

Panegyricized by the Mass.

Seats now secured at the box office six days in advance.

STANDARD THEATRE,

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

Twelfth week and last but one of the successful engagement of

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

Every evening at 8; Wednesday and Saturday Matinees at 2, the fascinating musical burlesque,

EVANGELINE.
EVANGELINE.

Saturday and Sunday evenings, by particular request, the great burlesque,

HORRORS.

Monday evening, Feb. 10.....LE PETIT CORSAIR.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

FAREWELL ENGAGEMENT OF

CLARA MORRIS,

Supported by the Great Legitimate Company of Baldwin's Theatre.

This (Saturday) afternoon, February 8, only Matinee of ARTICLE 47.

CLARA MORRIS.....AS CORA.

Saturday and Sunday evenings, Feb. 8 and 9, the immensely successful London Eccentricity,

HE WOULD AND HE WOULD NOT

Monday, February 10, Clara Morris as Raymonde Montaigne, in Alex. Dumas' great play,

RAYMONDE.

Saturday, Feb. 15, Benefit of MR. JAMES O'NEILL.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Mining Companies, specialties. No. 600 MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY SAN FRANCISCO.
Successor to F. V. Scudder.

THE BRAVE SENORITA.

During the revolution headed by General Bolivar, which eventually liberated New Granada from the Spanish yoke, the Spanish viceroy was one Zamano, a most cruel and bigoted man, hated and despised alike by royalists and patriots. This tyrant lived in the palace Santa Fe de Bogota, and his rule was a veritable reign of terror. Conspicuous amongst all who fell victims of his cruelty the Columbians will ever reverence the memory of Doña Apollinaria Zalabariatta—better known as La Pola. This young lady was of extremely good family in Bogota, and was distinguished both for her beauty and her accomplishments. She was enthusiastic in the cause of the patriots, even to the extent of devoting herself to the hazardous task of collecting and transmitting to Bolivar secret intelligence concerning the forces, dispositions, and plans of operation of the royalist army, then in the possession of Bogota. She was then at the time betrothed to a young gentleman, who was also, if less openly, an ardent sympathizer with the cause of liberty. Of all the entertainments in Bogota, the tertulias, or evening conversations, at her home were the most sought after. The Spanish officers were only too delighted to be permitted to attend them, to listen to the doña's bright conversation, to be enchanted by her singing to the guitar. Who could suspect so young, so lovely, so brilliant a creature to be a spy? But so it was. In the course of apparently the merest conversation, she would casually inquire of the royalist officers the whereabouts of their absent companions, and would get them to talk of the movements of their respective regiments. Innocent and unconcerned as both question and answer apparently were, the lady was still able to put the information thus gained from different sources into a connected form. And thus having ascertained the position of their advanced posts and other important matters, she regularly transmitted the information by a trusty messenger to Bolivar. But, alas! a day of reckoning came. One of her dispatches was intercepted, and the messenger, in imminent fear of his own life, betrayed her secret. She was at once apprehended and brought before a military court. There could be but one result. She was found guilty and condemned to be shot, together with her lover—although no proof whatever was forthcoming of the complicity of the unfortunate youth. Twelve hours were allowed before the execution should be carried out, during which time the two were placed in the Capilla (a dungeon). On the next day the lovers were led out, and, being bound together on a kind of seat, were securely surrounded with troops. A picket of grenadiers was then told off to shoot them, and marched close up to the spot. When the terrible moment was thus come, when all was in readiness, once more she was offered a pardon if she would confess. But without any fear—with, as it were, a noble contempt—she declared that if she had any accomplices she would scorn to save her life by betraying them; and she added that as Bolivar was fast approaching, they could learn on his arrival who were his accomplices. Here, noticing that her companion was hesitating, as if about to speak—a hesitation very natural on the threshold of death—she implored him, as her last request, that, if he had ever loved her, he would now show by his death that he was worthy of her choice; she reminded him that whatever disclosures he might make, the tyrant Zamano would never spare his life; and she adjured him to take comfort in the knowledge that his death would be shared by her beloved. When this had been said the firer irated, and the firing party made ready. Then and then only she seemed to feel a momentary fear. "You have the heart, brothers, to kill a woman!" she said, addressing herself to the soldiers; and then, immediately recovering her firmness, drew her sacra across her face and awaited death. On the sagra, a sort of shawl used to cover head and neck, when thus displayed, were discovered the words: "Viva la Patria!" embroidered in gold. So much only could be noticed, when the fatal signal was given from the viceroy's balcony, and the two instantly fell dead. Two days afterward Bolivar entered the town, too late to save this noble woman.

The Commune of Samnaune, one of the most remarkable, as it is one of the least known, in all Switzerland, is situated in a mountain valley, 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, and almost cut off from the world. The inhabitants fetch their daily supply of provisions from Martinsbruck, on the other side of the Inn, and for the greater part of the distance, seven hours in all, they have to carry everything on their backs up the steep mountain paths. They get their letters from the Austrian village of Rauders, which involves a walk for the postman of ten hours, four thither and six back. Fifty years ago the members of the commune met together, and, being of opinion that German was on the whole a more desirable language for the ordinary purposes of life than their mother tongue, they resolved thenceforth to speak German only, and to teach it to their children. So thoroughly has this purpose been carried out that, with the exception of a few old people, the Romanish speech, their native tongue, has been completely forgotten by the inhabitants of the valley.

An English musical critic thus describes Liszt's "Dance of Death." The instrumentation is astounding. It is earthquakes and thunder storms set to music. Every extraordinary sound that can be produced from the orchestra is pressed into the service. The Latin hymn, Dies Irae, which, from the sixteenth century until now, has been regarded by the Catholic Church as one of the most solemn chants, is made to play a game of hide-and-seek in this extraordinary composition. It is shrieked upon the highest notes of the scales or growled out from the lowest, while the piano-forte plays a series of grotesque variations upon it, amid the clashing of cymbal, the tinkling of triangles, the blasts of trombones, and tapping fiddle bows, supposed to be in imitation of the rattling of a skeleton's bones. The piano-forte appears to be possessed of seven devils, and the performer seems to be engaged in a fruitless endeavor to exorcise them.

"Try not the pass," the old man cried;
"I'm ordered up," the youth replied.
—Boston Com. Bul.

"Try not the pass," the conductor sneers,
"Because, you see, it is last year's."
—Toledo Blade.

"Try not the pass," the manager hissed,
"For your name's dropped from our free list."

"George, dear, don't you think it rather extravagant of you to eat butter with that delicious jam?"
"No, no, economical; same piece of bread does."

TABLE ETIQUETTE.

Bread should be broken, not cut; but if you don't like bread, "cut it." In "breaking" bread use a curb bit.

Do not fill your mouth too full; rather allow some of the food to get into your moustache.

Split a biscuit with your fingers, instead of opening it with a knife like an oyster. If the biscuit be hard, a beetle and wedge are admissible in the best society.

Salt should never be put on the tablecloth, but on the side of your plate. If, however, you want to pickle the tablecloth in brine, you must put salt on it, of course.

Do not rattle your knife and fork. A knife and spoon will be found more musical.

Eat your soup from the side of your spoon, either inside or outside.

Do not take game in your fingers. This, however, does not apply to a game at cards.

Do not rest your arms on the tablecloth. Stack your arms in a corner of the room before beginning dinner.

When asked what part of the fowl you prefer, answer promptly. If you want the whole of it don't hesitate to say so.

Do not drink with the spoon in your cup; put it in your pocket. Forgetting it, you will be so much ahead. A close regard to this rule has enabled Ben. Butler to accumulate a competency.

Never leave the table until all are through, without sufficient excuse. The sudden entrance of a policeman with a warrant for your arrest, is generally considered sufficient excuse in polite circles.

Never help yourself to articles of food with your knife or fork. Use a harpoon or lasso.

When you have finished your meal lay your knife and fork on your plate, side by side, with the handles toward the right, a little south by south-west, bearing north when the wind is off the side-board quarter. —Every Saturday.

There lately died in Paris a humpbacked man, who for the previous fifty years of his life had given his time to researches upon his humpbacked brethren. His heirs found, instead of a will, a voluminous manuscript of two thousand pages upon humps. He was rich, and traveled in every direction for information. It was in the milder regions of Europe that he found the misfortune the most prevalent. Spain supplied the greatest number, and in a circumscribed locality at the foot of the Sierra Morena there existed one humpbacked individual to every thirteen inhabitants. They were also found very numerous in the valley of the Loire, in France. The writer's conclusion was that for every thousand persons on the globe there was one humpback, or an aggregate of a million against the thousands of millions of the entire earth. The last page of the manuscript contained the will of the deceased, which said nothing regarding the disposition of his property, but simply desired that a hump of marble should be raised upon his tomb, with this inscription: "Here lies a humpback who had a taste for humps, and knew more about them than any other humpback."

Tourists to Paris will find renewed interest in the ever-romantic history of Abelard and Heloise, in consequence of the recent restoration of the celebrated tomb. Abelard dying first, was buried by Heloise at the Abbey of the Paraclete, of which she was Abbess, and upon her death the remains of the lovers were not separated. In 1792 the Paraclete was sold and the bodies were removed to the Church of Nogent-sur-Seine. Eight years later they were exhumed and placed in the Garden of the Musée Français in Paris, and in 1817 were deposited in the cemetery of Père la Chaise, at Paris, beneath a canopy which had been erected over the remains of Abelard at the priory of St. Marcel, shortly after his death in 1142. The reclining statues were made from casts taken from the skulls. It is scarcely possible that one out of ten pleasure travelers has visited Paris since 1817 without making a pilgrimage to the celebrated tomb. In its restored condition it will be more attractive than ever.

They have a curious custom in Cabul in selling a horse. A man wanting to dispose of one is desirous that the horse should not know of his wish to part with him, the fear being that if the beast knew that his master wished to get rid of him he would take it to heart and lose flesh, and consequently decrease in value. From this strange idea the sale of a horse is carried on in silence, so that the animal may not hear. The two men put their hands under their kummurbunds, and the price in rupees is indicated by repeated pressure of the fingers, but not a word is spoken during the bargain.

Figaro gives the version of the attempt to assassinate the King of Italy which will probably be given in the socialist histories of the future: "A crowd was promenading quietly in the streets of Naples when a certain King—Humbert I.—penetrated violently into it in a carriage, and, in a fit of criminal fury, seeing an inoffensive citizen, Passavanti, drew his sword and made a blow at him, which the unhappy man had scarcely time to parry with a knife which he had fortunately had the precaution to buy only the day before."

A colored clergyman within the limits of our fair city stepped into a grocery store on Third Street recently, and, according to the proprietor, said: "Our church is out of communion wine." "Very well," said the accommodating dealer, "about what are you going to want?" "Well," responded the colored wearer of the white neckcloth, "we habn't got 'nuff communion wine to las' de year fur, and some of de ladies ob de congregashun hab expressed a preefrunce for gin."

Gortschakoff, on being asked by one of his subordinates the secret to success, replied: "Be civil to everybody. Ignore casual affronts, and reciprocate courtesies. Maintain your independence before the great, and be generous and just to those who are beneath you in rank and fortune."

A Texas journalist telegraphed to another to meet him with pistols in the usual way, and, having shot his man, wrote the duel up for his victim's paper, assuring the surviving editor that it was the true account of the affair, hoping that it would suit, and asking him to remit.

The lady whose dress was too dirty to wear, and not dirty enough to be washed, had a matter of serious import to decide.

In the days of Rochow, my predecessor as Prussian member of the Diet (says Bismarck), the Austrian presiding member had adopted the habit of smoking at the sittings of the military special commission. Rochow, passionately fond of smoking, would have given his little finger to do the like, but did not dare. Now, when I came to Frankfurt I longed for my cigar at military commission sittings, and, seeing no reason why I should not have it, politely asked the presiding power to give me a light. This demand was received with universal astonishment and disgust. It evidently was an event in the eyes of all present. However, I got the light, and Austria and Prussia smoked. The other members present thought the incident momentous enough to report to their respective courts. But the question was too grave to be decided in a hurry, so for six months running no one smoked but Austria and Prussia. At the expiration of that period the Bavarian envoy took to asserting the dignity of his sovereign by lighting the first cigar in assembled conclave. We all noticed that Herr von Nostitz, the Saxon representative, envied the Bavarian Schrenckh his delicious weed. But his court had not authorized the deed, so he had to abstain. When, however, at the next sitting we witnessed the Hanover man, Bothmer, indulging in tobacco, we knew that a special understanding had been entered into between Guelph and Hapsburg. Bothmer was very Austrian in his sentiments, and had a couple of sons in the Austrian army. Upon this Saxony would not be left behind, and boldly kindled the audacious spark. Now there were only two members left who did not make chimneys of their mouths—Württemberg and Darmstadt. These unfortunates, not being addicted to the vice, could not join in. But the honor and independence of their states imperatively required a sacrifice. Accordingly, the next time we met, the Württemberg gentleman took out a cigar—I see it before me now, a long, thin, straw-like confefacon—and smoked it half as a holocaust made to Fatherland.

The law condemns the man or woman
Who steals the goose from off the common;
But lets the greater felon loose
Who steals the common from the goose.

LITTLE BELMONT
FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms. The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements. It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds underlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont; water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table, range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted, rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

CALABASAS
LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND

Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.

For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus, or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange, San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

YELLOW JACKET SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada. Principal place of business, Main St., Gold Hill, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of said Company, held on the fifteenth day of January, A. D. 1879, an assessment (No. 31) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon each and every share of the capital stock of said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Main Street, Gold Hill, Nevada, or to James Newlands, Transfer Secretary, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, shall be deemed delinquent, and will be duly advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
MERCER OTEY, Secretary.
Gold Hill, Nevada, January 15, 1879.

BEST & BELCHER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, State of Nevada.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Thursday, the sixth (6th) day of February, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the twenty-sixth day of February, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

WILLIAM WILLIS, Secretary.
Office—Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLICATION OF THE BROOKLYN LAND COMPANY TO BE DISINCORPORATED.—Notice is hereby given, that the application of the Brooklyn Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, to be disincorporated, has been presented and filed in the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that Monday, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1879, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, at the court room of said court, in said City and County of San Francisco, has been fixed and appointed as the time and place for hearing the said application. THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

(SEAL.) By JOHN H. HARVEY, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARTIN A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A. SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL.) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
SAVNER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELANGER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY BELANGER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought, to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL.) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 605 Clay Street.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

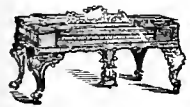

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

KNABE
PIANOS

Grand, Square, and Upright.

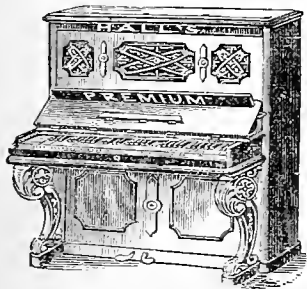

BEST STOCK OF SHEET MUSIC.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHONACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND
Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail. J. W. EVANS, 29 Post StreetFOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.THE
Automatic
SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,
124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begg to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

Genuine 6 X

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE
INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 69.—The monthly dividend for January, 1878, will be paid on February 10, 1879, at their offices, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.
CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
San Francisco, February 5, 1879.R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,Nos. 2, 3 and 4. SHERMAN & BUILDING, Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco.
(P. O. Box 770.)

NEW STORE

McDONALD
& WILLIAMS

MERCHANT

TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worsted, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Ouatines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, full lines of all the materials necessary to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose offering to the public at the following low prices:

Pants, from $5
Suits, from 20
Overcoats, from 15
Usters, from 15
Dress Coats, from 20
White Vests, from 3
Silk and Wool Vests, from 6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Samples and Self-measurement Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARGOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,
3822 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,

On THURSDAY, Feb. 20, at 12 o'clock M.

Steorage Passage $2 00

Cabin Passage 7 00

In Bridal Rooms 10 00

Freight at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.
P. B. CORNWALL.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 7.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 15, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We have just returned from a trip over all the railroads of Southern California. We traveled in royal style—as travel monarchs, rich men, and railroad kings—in a special car. Better than this, we took a special train, engine No. 96, engineer Henry Small, familiarly known as "Hank"—he who brought across the continent by rail at lightning speed the theatrical managers, Messrs. Jarrett & Palmer; he wears a golden badge of the achievement. We took as officer of first importance and chief minister to our creature comforts, William the cook. We took a kitchen, dining-room, parlor, bed chamber, a larder well supplied. We took comfortable beds. We took our shot gun and tooth brush. We took along some pleasant companions. We took $40,000 in money to pay expenses; in fact we took the pay-car, with Messrs. Redington, Bowen, and Watt of the railroad company to disburse our money, and both ends of the firm of Sisson, Wallace & Co. for companions of our trip. From San Francisco to Los Angeles—stopping at night—stopping to pay train hands, road builders, track keepers, men at depots, all the way down the valley of the San Joaquin, over the Tehachepe Pass, across the desert, like following the great bent arm of a giant from his shoulder to his wrist, and then out upon each of his four fingers, to Arizona, to Wilmington, to Santa Ana, and to Santa Monica; back to his palm, the great, beautiful, fruitful, orange-bearing, grain-growing valley of Los Angeles—all by daylight. And such a country! Such a God-forsaken, dreary waste of barren, brown, and dreadful desolation as is the greater portion of the unfenced wilderness through which we pass. To the uneducated eye, the grim, hard, verdureless valleys, the barren mountain ranges, the broad, dry plains, destitute of water and of trees, are truly a land of little promise. Whence come our wine and wool, our gold and grain? Certainly not from this region through which even the iron horse seems impatient to pass; a country without farms, without villages, without enterprise, without energy, without taste. Villages? yes; here and there beside the rail uninteresting, untidy, unthrifty rows of cheap houses, every other one of which is a gin hell. Farms? yes, if unfenced fields with board huts, shabby corral, disconsolate barn, dreary, draggled-tailed, pale-faced, weary wife, with ragged, tow-headed urchins—if such may be styled farm and family, then once in several miles may it be said that this part of California has farms and families. If an unintelligent and unenterprising man who plows an inch deep, and never plants a tree, is a farmer, then Southern California has farmers—but not such villages, farms, homes, and toiling, thrifty, enterprising, industrious workingmen as have built up New England, subdued Western forests, and made prairies to bloom with beauty.

The valley of the upper San Joaquin, the dreary stretch through Tehachepe Pass, Soledad Cañon, across the desert of the Mojave, with its weird skeleton cactus shrubs, the desert of the Colorado, the desert of the trans-Colorado, as far as we went into Arizona, seem to us to be cursed with two curses—one of God and one of man. No water we charge as an act of unskillful creation, or water running useless to the sea, while the parched earth is praying for it. This blunder may be corrected by irrigation, for there is a wealth of water that may be stored in hills and natural reservoirs, be directed from lakes and river beds, and distributed over valleys, plains, and deserts, that, under its influence, would respond by golden harvests. And the other curse is man's cupidity—the men who steal land, and hoard it away for sheep and cattle; land bandits, who have stolen this heritage of acres; felons, who have forged grants, jumped springs, bribed courts, lobbied legislatures, and by all the arts and artifices of the criminal, filched God's acres, and now hold them in an iron grasp from cultivation and settlement. We do not mean Haggin and Carr, who, by the expenditure of capital and brains, are making a great garden in the desert county of Kern; not Generals Williams and Naglee, who are building great dykes for reclamation; not Governor Downey, who has subdivided and sold his lands to small farmers; not the colonies of Lompoc, and Riverside, and Central, where it is demonstrated that twenty acres of this seemingly desert land can furnish maintenance for a family; but the speculative fiends who are paper squatters, and who, by lies, perjury, and subornation of perjury, acquired properties they have not the brains nor the capital to utilize. These men are a curse to California—they are a hindrance to its prosperity; they retard its growth, and stay immigration; and they ought to be taxed to death, to confiscation, to ruin. It is right to rob them; it is a duty to despoil them. The valley of the San Joaquin ought to be irrigated at the expense of this land, and for the benefit of it; and if the cormorants who have stolen it have not the strength of talons to hold it against taxation, it should be confiscated, and given over to men who would gladly cultivate it. It should be taxed, taxed, taxed, and every dollar should be expended for water. Then there would be villages, farms, homes, schools, wealth, prosperity, culture, intelligence, all through this broad, fertile Lombardy of California, in the place of shabby villages, huts, and corrals; farmers, instead of land-lappers and sheep-herders; troops of children, instead of swine and sheep. There would be trade and commerce, enterprise, thrift, and taste, homes, gardens, and schools, where is now a strange and voiceless desolation.

We must get down from our hobby and back to the pay-car. Los Angeles, the rich fruit lands of San Gabriel, the rich corn lands of the Monte, are too well known to need description; and yet in going to Santa Monica, to Wilmington, to Santa Ana, we pass for miles through unfenced lands—sheep feeding where people should live and cultivate. These valleys, divided into forty-acre farms, would support a million or two of people in comfort. They, too, are mostly grasped and held by greedy monopolists. We would like to be assessor of the county of Los Angeles. Here is a cottage home, with groves of orange, lemon, walnut, and the vine; across the fence, or ditch, or hedge, there stretches a great uncultivated domain; it belongs to the estate of the dead Reese, or the dead Stearns, or the dead Workman, or some other of the grasping dead, who are rotting in four by seven, six feet deep. We would make these dead monopolists turn over in their graves, and their living heirs groan at our estimate of their wealth as indicated by their tax bills. We hope the Workingmen's party of Los Angeles will elect an assessor who will tax lands equally, and not discriminate against the industrious owners of small acres that are highly improved.

We went to the front—the railroad front—where in the midst of a great desert two thousand men are at work track-laying. On our way we cross the Colorado Desert. For what purpose God made it is one of those mysteries which have so far proved past finding out: so utterly barren, so apparently worthless, so dreary and desolate, so scorched with a blazing sun, so blistered with burning winds. The rocky hills that bound it are more forbidding than the dreary desolation of the sandy plains. The hills are absolutely destitute of verdure—treeless, soilless, colorless. Through the centre of the plain, and parallel with the railroad, runs a mountain range of shifting sand, like snows piled up in banks, drifting and moving with the winds. The plain is not entirely destitute of vegetation, but the vegetation is as worthless as the sand in which it grows. There runs midway between San Bernardino and Yuma one small, beautiful stream of clear sweet water, properly named the "White-water," but along its pebbly margin there grows not a flower, shrub, nor tree. This beautiful stream in the desert suggests the irreverent reflection that this part of creation is a badly planned and badly executed work, reflecting but little credit upon the Divine Mechanic who spake it into existence. The mountains should have been clothed in primal forests; the plains should have been grassy meadows. Along the hillsides should be leaping cascades of sparkling water; brooks winding amid flowers and grassy banks, a fruitful land, where fat kine, lowing herds, bleating flocks, and singing birds, mingling their voices with the thanksgiving of well fed humanity, should be a constant psalm of adoration to Him who must ever lack an altar in the desert of the Colorado.

The distance by rail from Los Angeles to Yuma, upon the Colorado River, is 248 miles. The distance from Yuma to Maricopa Wells, in Arizona, is 160 miles. The rail is now within 25 miles of Maricopa Wells, and track is being laid at the rate of ten miles each week. Two and one-quarter miles were laid the day we were at the front. The land is level and hard, requiring only the removal of chaparral and shrubs and the smoothing down of small hillocks for the iron. It is an inspiring scene to witness this moving camp of railroad builders in the desert, disciplined like an army, and marching slowly eastward at the rate of ten miles a week, leaving behind them the iron highway that is to bear upon its roadbed a vast commerce in the future. Two thousand men, with their camps and equipages, their tools, implements of labor; great engines bearing trains heavily laden with ties, rails, straps, and spikes; a blacksmith shop, a boarding house, Sisson, Wallace & Co.'s store, the private car of Mr. Strowbridge, all on wheels; great structures piled with forage for the cattle, great tanks filled with water for the horses and men—for there is no water in the vicinity of the present work—great wagons hauling forward supplies, great plows with six-horse teams, scrapers with two horses, axe-men cutting shrubs, bias-eyed barbarians with shovels, Briarean-armed, pitching the sand in and out as cut and fill demand. In advance, fifteen miles from the track, men are grading the road, and gangs, under the direction of Seth Green, with his steam pile-driver, are building bridges and culverts of solid timbers. Little groups of amazed Indians—bucks and squaws—look on as interested spectators of the novel work that invades the privacy of their desert homes, enjoying the up and down rides upon the construction trains, upon all of which they are deadheads, in spite of the law against passes. At the front is a village of tents, and at the last point of accepted work there springs up a temporary village with its saloons and boarding-houses, its board and canvass hells for gin and dice. It is a marvelous scene, this caravan crossing the desert. It is a busy one by day. It is a romantic one upon a moonlight night, when sleep and silence cover the tired workers, and all, save Strowbridge, the constructor, lay them down to rest. He never sleeps. No idlers in his camp; no whisky, no noisy disputes. Every man has something to do, and every man does it or is passed to the rear. The telegraph pole and electric wire keep pace with the rail, and the front talks with the home office in San Francisco every night and morning.

Where this road is going and what is its objective point, is a secret of headquarters. Not Maricopa Wells, for that is nowhere; not Tucson, for that is nowhere; not for the Arizona trade, we think. Perhaps to join the Topeka (Kansas) road; perhaps to the Gulf of Mexico, to give us another trans-continental steam highway. Wherever it leads, it is out into a virgin territory, a land of undeveloped wealth, of untried resources; it is extending the commercial and trade jurisdiction of San Francisco; it is broadening our business empire; it is destined to bring us wealth and prosperity. It is being built without Government aid; it has no lands nor subsidies, no bonds nor Government credit. The trade jurisdiction of San Francisco is continuous with its control of trade highways. It would be a calamity if Tom Scott could build a road to San Diego; he would steal from us the business of our merchants and mechanics. The idea of railroad competition is a maggot that only squirms in the brain editorial and wiggles under the tongues of demagogues. The men who are building this Southern Pacific Railroad are doing more for the direct advantage and future welfare of San Francisco and California than all the other business men of the State. To rail at them, to question their motives, to decry the honesty of their intentions, to endeavor to hinder them by vexatious legislation, evidences narrow minds, selfish motives, and dishonest purpose. This railroad is being built that its owners may make money. They can only make it by promoting the interest of our city and State; their interests and ours run parallel. By opposing them we are biting our own noses.

Tom Scott is a railroad humbug. We saw his tracks in Soledad Cañon, where he undertook to preempt and jump a highway that God had made through the mountains, by picking holes in the hill sides, thus affixing his mark to the lying promise of a railroad that he had neither money nor credit to build. He squatted upon a rocky bluff at Yuma, thinking to steal the only crossing of the Colorado; dug some holes and removed some boulders, that he might rob a legitimate enterprise of the natural abutments of a railroad bridge. He swapped his lying promises for lands at San Diego for the terminus of a railroad he knew he could never build. He made speeches and drew diagrams to show that there was some other nearer and better highway for oriental commerce than through the port of San Francisco. And yet the Chronicle is endeavoring to burn incense before the altar of this false railroad god. We are unwell of Tom Scott.

The following lines by a lady, received just in time, we filched from the poetical editor to append to our brief sketch of a hasty trip through desert regions. They seem appropriate, and as "olla-podrida" signifies a mixed dish, and as it never could have any poetry in it unless we either steal or borrow some, we have given these pretty verses a position out of place:

IN EXILE—ARIZONA, 1879.

O barren lands, whose yellow sands
Face over-bending skies so far and blue,
No touch of green, nor flowers' sheen,
Brings knowledge of the Spring-time unto you;
But leagues away the breezes play
O'er flowing streams, and valleys flower-sweet,
While faint, yet clear, I seem to hear
The Easter bells ring out the Spring to greet.

O star-lit heights, in dewless nights
My spirit pants your cloud-kissed tops to scale;
But, fettered here, the desert drear
Holds soul and body, weary, faint, and pale.
The mountains brown, whose sullen frown
The sunlight strives to touch with softening grace,
Bend down to-day, as if to say,
"Be still, impatient soul, and know thy place."

O western wind, blow soft and kind,
Till my faint spirit leaps to meet your breath;
Your low voice tells of Easter bells,
And resurrection coming after death.

Then, heart of mine, no more repine,
Unconquered still, a happier day await;
What though so drear the desert here?
The flowers still blossom by the Golden Gate!

J. H. R.

After all our exertions, all our long dissertations, all our strong language, all our huge mass meetings, the united expression of all political parties, the united opinions of all respectable and intelligent business men, the uniform writing of all our journals, the cooperation of nearly all our clergy, resolutions of our legislatures and Constitutional Convention, we are about to have congressional action on the question of Chinese immigration. And yet all our agitation has done no good. We are indebted to a simple political accident for the fact that we secure legislation by Congress. Our Senators have been very zealous, our members of the House have all done their duty, but had it not been for the possibility of a Presidential election turning upon the California vote in Congress, by reason whereof it became necessary for both parties to bid for it, nothing would have been done to relieve us of our burden. But because the party that shall not favor such legislation will lose the electoral vote of California, and because all the Presidential candidates see this thing, we are likely to have the matter favorably considered.

The State of Indiana is a progressive commonwealth: it has tried an editor for murder. We should like to be present at the hanging of an editor—if he was the right editor.

SHUT IN A MEXICAN VILLAGE.

She had been there now for six months, and her heart was sick within her. Her eyes climbed the beetling mountains, standing in circle grimly around, then wearily drooped to the parched and crackling earth which had dried and crumbled under the blaze of the brazen sky. She was scorched, suffocated, mummied, in the hot, unmoistened air. The very water sprang blood-warm from the cleft in a rock up yonder on the hill, where she had often been with the women who were carrying their bundles of soiled clothes on their heads to cleanse them in their own peculiar way. She, Laura Wilsey, hated the way in which they splashed the garments up and down upon the stones, making the dirt to lie in streaks, instead of rubbing and rinsing them thoroughly as a white woman would. She hated the free glances of these Mexican women, the loose way they had of letting expressions drop from their tongues, their chemises which slipped so often, as if by design, off their shoulders, furnishing a glimpse of the dark, swelling bosoms beneath.

"I will get up out of this place," she said between her teeth, "if I die for it."

Between her and the civilization behind her lay mountains, rivers, plains, and Indians, and the same cut her off from the civilization that lay beyond. Traveling in the train of her brother—the only woman in it—among the tossing horns, the weary moings, the not infrequent threatening bellows of his blooded cattle, she had shuddered, even while her spirit rose, as night after night the wagons were drawn into a ring, and the two men upon watch passed each other before the shut curtain of her tent, cautiously listening for a sound that might tell of Indians abroad.

"But I am not afraid; I will fight, too, Theodore," she had remonstrated, when she knew that she was to be left at this little Mexican town near to the warm spring.

"All nonsense, Laura, all nonsense. You would be dreadfully in the way; a woman always is when it comes to danger. It's only a matter of something like a few months till I can have the cattle off my hands and come back after you, ready then to see you safely through. And the Indians will be peaceable and friendly by that time. Well you'd look without a scalp, wouldn't you, my girl? And yet you long to put your brown hair where an Indian's fingers can wind themselves in it, don't you?"

So she stayed, and six months, half a year of impatience had dragged along, and she, with her blood leaping in her veins, had held her heart down with her clasped hands and endured this soft Mexican language, that sounded on her ears like a chant, till she hated it, it was so sweet and so soft. The hot peppers in their dishes burned her lips, the grease their dinners were heavy with formed a lining to the roof of her mouth, the indolent ways of the men filled her with contempt, the easy ways of the women repelled her. She would have liked to spurn it all under her foot. She thought till she loathed the spot and the people. "Bah!" she exclaimed aloud in disgust, and threw up her hands in the restless way she had, walking off to look from her small window under the low brows of the house. There, beyond these hills, an immeasurable distance off, lay home and friends she had left; over there, beyond those hills and burning plains, the home and friends she longed to make. Oh, for one or the other! This spot midway was tantalizing.

It was hot noon, and the air was like a breath from a flame when a long-drawn inspiration entered the nostril. A distant murmur of laugh and talk came up the little street. Ah! la-la! It seemed to say, like a very little song that wandered on and on, trickling and gentle and soft in modulation. Well, it was the women going out with the washing, and others were waiting to join them as they came along, each with her white bundle like a great turban on her head. Even her own slipshod girl, who mixed the tortillas and set the dishes away to dry of themselves after washing, even Maria was going, too, and waiting for the rest, standing on the doorstep with hand raised to steady the weight on her head. La-la-la they chorused together, with a bubble of a laugh floating to the surface and bursting now and then. "Marreeya! Marreeya!" one called, liquidly, as they came into view of the careless Maria. Erect they walked; their heads and heels joined with an arrow line, shoulders round and dark and bare to the sun, black hair gleaming now and again at a turn like a mass of silver, elbows dimpling with plumpness, teeth short and even and flashing white. This was their gala day, the excitement that came once in a month, and surely it was better to go with them than to stifle in a close room, the very plastering of which was warm to the hot hand.

And what a cart it was she was invited to sit in! A chariot-like bed, surmounted by an open top, the occupants entering at the back, the last happy to swing their feet almost to the ground, to and fro, to and fro, as they rolled their sweet cigarritos, cut from the dry husks of corn a lazy cultivation had grown, the blue smoke curling languid and spiral about their dark fingers. Slow moving oxen, mild-eyed and snail-stepping, drew the lumbering vehicle, which creaked as it rolled upon its two great, solid, wooden wheels, sawed from a log, tired, and put upon an axle.

"Ah-la-la," the women murmured as they went over the hill, lifting their arms and smiling as they turned their morsels of words upon their tongues; and so they came to the warm spring, and, lowering their bundles, laid their soiled linen in the running water.

A great rock buried on every side but one in the hard, baked earth on the slope of the hill, cleft in the heart and hollowed out by the wearing rush, rush of the water, cast a warm shadow down upon the busy group. Deep within there was the plash of tumbling water, the plaint of a small cascade that made its hidden moan in the dark recess, and then from three fissures it sprang clear, so clear that it was like a thin white veil spread over the rock. And it fell into a great basin and lay still for a time, yellowing here and there like an old kiss as the sun touched it. Little black bugs clung to the rocks, deep down, and high upon the shelving approaches to the bank, and walked slowly about as though their tiny veins were filled with a dull, sluggish blood, and they afflicted with an idle melancholy. So glass-like the water, so colorless and transparent, the sedate wiggling of their small legs seemed close to the eye. And then it was like one's own blood, it was so sickeningly warm—al-

—it put a nausea under the tongue to dabble the hand

Down upon their knees the women were, chatting and calling, splashing their linen and patting it, as if it were a baby's cheek, upon the slanting rocks that were their washboards. High in air they tossed it, lowered it again, patted it a bit more, then sank it to soak with a stone atop to keep it from going afloat. And finally it was rinsed again; half squeezed and dripping, it was put to dry.

Then, with a bird-cry of relief, they flung away their clothing and plunged into the soothing water, which could pull the weariness from tired limbs, put a drowsy heaviness into the eyes, and charge the senses with a luxuriant languor. Their long hair, black and serpent-like behind them, they floated like tawny fish about the basin, or swam with lazy fin-like strokes, or sat half in and half out with the fragrant smoke twisting like incense into their dreamy eyes. Truly, the water was a heated wine that clogged the brain and brought a sweet heaviness to hands and feet. And the sun, a red-hot saucer in the mid-day sky, burned and burned, and seemed to crisp the skin, deadening the air and filling it with a sleepy, droning silence, while afar off the golden heat-mist swayed, and danced, and wavered, and hung in shreds upon the near trees and shrubs, and covered the rocks with tiny threads and wavelets of running water.

Ah! but would Theodore never come back! Perhaps away off somewhere his bones were bleaching under this same sun, and perched upon by buzzards astray in search of food for their gnawing beaks. Ah! what horrid fancies will creep into a lone woman's thoughts! A shrill cry came up the winding path; a force of fifty men on their own lazy legs, or weighting down, three to a load, the hardy little donkeys hidden under their burdens except ears, honest faces, and slow, sure feet.

Then there was a sudden awakening from the torpor of the bath, little cries which the bathers murmured, the petticoat and chemise were hurriedly snatched over the head, the full-dried linen was hastily caught together. It was Manuel, it was Pedro, it was Luis, and the rest, and Padre Paul in the midst of them striding along with great steps.

Ah, yes, yes; some one had seen the scalp-lock of an Indian behind a bush, and had run through the street with the tidings, whereat all these brave fellows had come out to rescue their women sporting in the bath. Danger, danger, imminent, threatening, soul-disturbing! Oh, what gratitude too great to show their rescuers! Maria fell into the arms of Pedro, who opened them to receive her, the head of Marines was taken upon the shoulder of Luis, and Manuel embraced all within reach, the good Padre standing below with the heat-mist quivering about him.

And off they went, the ridiculous great wheels shrieking on their axles, the mild oxen with wild horns stumbling over the rolling stones, and the feet of the men swinging close to the ground on either side the little donkeys. The women ate piñole, a paste of flour made from the parched corn they had themselves ground upon the rocks of lava, uttering little outcries of fear, and expressions in admiration of the brave, brave men.

And then the Padre Paul! What condescension! But then, it was like him. Did not the señorita hear of him from every one? And the child the other day sick of the fever that would have died but for him! To fear, also, a stranger, since he walked abroad on a morning with no company but his knotted stick, and in among the hills he stayed till night, perhaps—ah, yes!—no doubt thinking of holy things, and buried in a meditation. So handsome, too; much too handsome to be a priest! A thousand pities!

And Padre Paul walked ahead, stalking like a black spirit among the shaking heat-mists, tall and straight, and every inch a man by contrast with the wiry and scrubby Mexicans, who lagged even in their speed.

When it came the next Sabbath the town lay as if in a dream. A sleepy buzz filled the air, as of a great bee shaking his wings in the hills. Through it a rhythm seemed to flow in and out the ears, to shyly beat upon the lips, to breathe across the cheek, to measure itself in the glance, whichever way it was turned. The women wrapped in their gay scarfs, with one dark eye exposed, stepped softly along the street. The men lounged carelessly in the same direction, but their musical tongues were still. The hundreds of dogs that filled the houses lay, nose upon paw, here, there, and everywhere. The house doors were open, and the grandmother of all the village, the oldest woman for miles and miles, sat on her stool in the shadow.

"It is the old flutter back again, and I thought it was gone forever," said Miss Wilsey, and she threw back her head, and walked back and forth across the room with her hands upon her temples, and the droning went on in the dry air, and seemed to rest like a locust on the window sill.

"I shall die in this place; O Theodore! will you never come?" she cried aloud. "What are dollars, and what are cattle, and bargains, and gain to me, who suffer from the old thoughts here alone? I must have life, and merry words, and books, and music, and change, change, change, or I can not bear it, I tell you!"

A bell crashed in cheery tones upon the heat that had almost taken voice. It might have been a silver bell, it was so sweet. It crept up through the small valley into the hills, and the ringing tones, thrust back, intermingled with those just borne to the ear, and the echo came so clear, as if each new note had thrown its shadow behind it as it passed up the valley.

The old grandmother on the stool slipped her rosary through her fingers, and her sunken lips moved mechanically, and her chin wagged over them. The women kept gliding so stilly by, slender, and tall, and luminous of eye. A haze over the hill-tops, white and milky, caught in it here and there the fire of the sun, till it all seemed like the shimmer of an opal.

It was a dream—a dream; and she, Laura, by and by would wake from it, and leave it in her memory, shadowy and mist-like, to drag into shape again in the future as the other old visions dragged into shape now.

There, now, was the tall form of the priest, stalking somberly up the village, and her heart leaped to her lips as she noted him. It surely was an idle fancy and a wandering brain that could make him, in his priestly garb, carry himself like one of old. But in a dream surely she might indulge herself as she would please a child, if the little one were so weary of this heat and this strange people.

Yes, yes! it was something the same carriage, though not quite—no, not quite—so manly and commanding. But that swing of the hands, now! That was the same trick she had known. And that turn of the head!—ah! how like! as though to toss away the straying lock that would fall out of its place.

She stretched her hands appealingly, and snatched them away again. "I am a fool!" she cried bitterly. "I live over those days every day in the year, and I say I will forget. I will not be mastered by flimsy memories of smiles and words that are covered up with years as these are." She walked bravely away from the window, and looked about her to occupy herself. "Nothing to read, nothing to see, nothing at all to do; I will—I will—I will go to church; why, yes, to church!"

She was not very old—perhaps thirty—but her face inside her bonnet had a worn look—a deep-eyed, weakened look. She went out of her door, Maria following with the buffalo robe, and made her way to the small adobe church.

The bell was silent now, and no worshippers came up the street; they were all inside at their prayers. She entered, and made her way, half-contemptuously, through the devout sinners whose knees pressed the floor of bare earth. The air was stifling, and the light was that of the dusk. Maria spread the robe and humbly knelt on one corner of it, mumbling her lips and telling over her beads. Here were the people—this stupid people!—saying their prayers, jumbling them up together in Spanish-Latin, never making a word of sense, but jabbering away there to themselves, on their knees, with their eyes fixed on the altar. How queer it was about their eyes. They winked slowly and at long intervals, and she might have stumbled over them—as, indeed, she came near doing, in the dim light—and they would never one of them have taken their staring eyes off the great gilt cross. What a mass of gaud and shabby tinsel the altar was; and, as she lived, the Virgin—she supposed it was the Virgin—was dressed in a breadth of cambric. And the flaring candles, how they sputtered and fought against their own wicks, and filled the place with their religious odor. Well, if this was the Church of Rome!—and here the worshippers crossed themselves and bent lower; and she looked curiously at them, and wondered she had never thought to amuse herself in this way before.

But gradually, sitting there in the strange silence, a hush stole over her own face—a look of repose that seemed like a rest to her drawn features. The place was small and mean, and its floor was the hard earth; but within its low, plastered walls there reigned a still solemnity, which was increased by the prayer that escaped in a whisper, or the rustle of a dress as some one's position changed.

And then from a little gallery over the door a chant fell. A male voice when lifted out of its natural key is ever more startling than a woman's. A man's cry of pain, how it will shock the hearer and ring in his ears; and when he opens his strong lips and gives out one of the weird chants in the minor thought which clings to the music of Rome, it sometimes seems deep and wide as if it sought to drown out complaint, and fret, and care.

And so this man's voice came out of the gallery as though something with wings had beaten away its bars. Deep and calm it hovered over the heads of those at prayer, and stooped like a spirit and poured its comfort into each ear.

A light broke over the pale face below, a light that shone so, it was as though the face had been washed in sunshine. Its wan, worn look left it; its mouth, hard and drooping at the corners, quivered; almost a radiant dimple played in the thin cheek.

Her chin sank upon her breast and her hands, lightly clasped, drooped before her. The color rushed in waves over her forehead as the proud Laura bent her head. "Paul, Paul," she murmured, "it is never you, Paul."

When she rose and walked away, it seemed to Maria, following respectfully with the buffalo robe, that the señorita staggered once or twice, as her own Pedro did on holidays; but then it might have been a mistake of the vision.

The air was heavy and strange and of a dead clearness, like the warm water out at the spring. You could see things far off, and you could imagine the baked leaves hanging on the trees among the hills. The ear strained itself to catch a sound of something, anything, and when it came, if it was near, it sounded miles away, and if it was distant it came sharp and clear and hugged close. Oh! if the bell should ring now! One shuddered to think how loud it would seem. And then it was so stifling that almost another nausea clave the tongue to the roof of the mouth, and the air grew to feel such a weight as though a pool of stagnant water were pressing from above.

Then the spring on the hill began to bubble and hiss, and the water steamed and foamed and ran about its little basin like a hundred snakes, and little flecks of spume-like saliva were cast up on the rocks. Who was it but Pedro that saw it all and came riding down to tell the tale, digging his heels into the sides of his donkey at every jolt!

A cloud as black as an inky wave rolled up the sky in a scroll, till it rested above the heart of the little plain, and then it began to fall, and to drop lower and lower and to unroll, and all the time there was that same dead clearness of the atmosphere and that same dull sense of hearing. The dogs whined uneasily and slunk away; the chickens, with necks stretched and wings loose, ran to roost, and, through the village, one felt that they were shutting doors. And then the cloud opened and fell apart, and the heavens were covered with its sooty flakes. A swirl of leaves, hardened and dried long ago by the sun, went up the little street and tapped at the small squares of glass set in the windows. The air suddenly became murky and opaque, as with a fog, and then two mighty winds rushed into war, one bellowing from the east and one cast out from the west. They set their heels upon the flat roofs of the houses, and the clash of their weapons went abroad among the hills that sat in stately empire round about. The bell in the little church tower clanged once and twice, and the mighty powers caught the appealing sounds, tore them into shreds, and flung them like little shrieks into the women's ears. And all the time the sun was staring through the black pieces of broken cloud like the hot eye of a fish.

Maria was crossing herself amidst her pans, and making half pious ejaculations of fear when the rude door was pushed so violently that it opened and struck the wall back of it. The Americano stood within the entrance, a step or two above the kitchen floor, and a great look of scorn was on her face. She struck her breast with her closed hand, and her eyes were flashing. She made a sort of moan, and her forehead was very white.

"If he should kneel before me I would step on him," she cried. "I would grind him in the dust, and then I would look at him as I would look at a worm."

She came one step lower and put out her hand. "If it was twice five years I would never forget his words. They are like drops of burning lead in my heart, and I will take his heart in my hands and I will mould it and toss it about and press it between my palms as though they were iron; and as my fingers wind around it and cut into it like threads, the blood will ooze like tears from it, and I will say to him piercing words like these: 'I love to see you writhe, Paul, for that is how I suffered. You are a cheat, and a coward, and a knave, and I spurn you as you lie there, for the very villainess of you.'"

Her features worked and trembled, and great, dry sobs formed in her heaving chest, shook her shoulders, and escaped her white lips.

The Mexican girl rose out of her pans and strove to understand—though it was very hard when one knew the language so little. Was it the storm of the winds now, and was it the fright the lady suffered? O yes! to be sure Padre Paul would come, should she want him, when the winds were gone. And to fear not the winds, for by and by they would die of themselves; though, to be sure, she herself felt them to be dreadful. But the Child Jesus was whom she prayed to.

As night came the earth drew down the winds and buried them, and a sweet freshness, like the morning dew, stole into the air. The dry heat was sucked away, and breath was balm to the lips.

A certain little adobe house was filled with women. Their nursing was not the nursing of soft touch and murmured word; but they laughed a little bit, and sympathized a little bit, and then they talked some, and bathed the sick woman's head and looked at her, and by and by they came and looked again. She lay with closed eyes and burning cheeks, and her hands were very restless, and her fingers continually passing over upon each other.

Ah-la-la, the little talk bubbled on. The Padre Paul was expected each moment, and her brains were boiling—boiling with the fever. Sad, sad!

"Paul! Paul!" came in low tones from the little bed; but she was scarce heeded, and wandered on: "I will forgive it all. Indeed they told me truly, and it never was fault of yours. It has been death to me—my own heart—but now I live again."

Hush, hush! st! among the women, for the good Padre was at the door.

She never opened her eyes, but the tears were stealing out between her lashes. Her hands were moving about and about, and her long brown hair, in its shining abundance, bathed the pillow. She began to murmur again:

"Religion never was meant for strife, it was meant for peace, Paul. We can each follow our own and reach the same heaven at last. In the old days I never thought it, and I hated yours. But my spirit is broken, and you may take me now, Paul; though I never thought I could forgive your going away, and never leaving a word, like that. It was cruel, cruel!"

A little tremulous quiver shook her chin, and a sound like a child's heart-broken sob died away behind her lips. Then something like a blush crept over the fever in her cheeks, and a look of ashamed girlishness shaped her mouth.

"I am five years older, Paul, but my prettiness is not gone from me yet in spite of the grieving. That little curl behind my ear is just as it was, and my feet and hands—why, I don't know but they're smaller. I always knew I should meet you sometime down by the old path or coming it at the gate, and I've kept myself just for you—for you, dear Paul. For five years I've heard you calling, 'Laura! Laura!' and I've just longed to go to you, Paul."

The women huddled round and bent their eyes upon the priest to explain it all, for was not he of the same language? Oh! to be sure; and yes, he would tell them.

The priest's own face was very white, and a lock of hair was separated in willfulness a bit from its fellows, though it was clipped short and pulled back with the rest. His smooth cheeks were of a fine, manly blue, with frequent shaving, and his countenance was severe, reserved, and serious. He looked at the sick woman long and fixedly, never taking his eyes from her face for minutes and minutes of time. Once he put his hand toward her as if to touch her, but took it back again.

"We'll be very, very happy, Paul," she murmured quietly, and then he left her and went over to the small-paned window.

By and by he returned to the bedside and said to the chattering women: "It is the fever that makes her fancy me some friend. I will not deceive the poor lady, since among strangers it may be a comfort to think she has one friend."

And they tinkled to each other among themselves: "Ah! the Padre, good next to God!" And then, with his own firm, white hand, he put the water to her smiling lips and laid it on her forehead.

But when the brother Theodore returned, having bargained his cattle and filled his purse, he found but a grave outside the town, round which some thoughtful one had put a fence to keep the dogs of coyotes away.

And the tinted hills stood round about like a wall, and the women looked up with their dark eyes while their chemises slipped from their shoulders, and smiled at the stranger; and he went up to see the wonderful warm spring gushing from its cleft in the rock, and so away again out of the little Mexican town to his affairs that would suffer no neglect.

KATE HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

Let men tremble to win the hand of woman, unless they win along with it the utmost passion of heart! Else it may be their miserable fortune, as it was Roger Chillingworth's, when some mightier touch than their own may have awakened all her sensibilities, to be reproached even for the calm content, the marble image of happiness, which they will have imposed upon her as the warm reality.

The virtue of prosperity is temperance; the virtue of adversity is fortitude

A DAY WITH THE SNIPE.

To the matin song of the meadow-lark
Through the stubble-fields we had made our way,
While the capering dogs in their glee did bark,
Till we neared the ground where the jacksnipe lay—

Where the willow tops, in a line of red,
Mark the sluggish stream as it winds about
By the level swamp, fringed with mustard dead,
And the burdock fields through the vale spread out.

There the long-bill feeds through the sunny day
In a hidden nook from the gunner's eye,
Till the careful dogs in their ranging stay,
And their steady point shows the game is nigh.

For a whimsical bird is the brown jacksnipe
As he drills away in the slimy ooze,
Or he takes to wing with his rasping pipe,
And he zigzags off till his form you lose.

Through the green wire-grass where the cresses grow
By the muddy pools and the tussocks brown,
With a cautious tread o'er the fens we go,
Till the last bird falls or the sun goes down.

Then the weary dogs at the whistle-calls
To the heel come in, and we plod along
On our homeward way, while the twilight falls
And the frogs are shrilling their vesper song.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

GEORGE CHISMORE.

An Address by the Demos.

"Das Volk steht auf den Sturm bricht los."—KORNER.
Ye have had a brave time of it, kings of the earth!
Since Gog first put purple to clay,
And, dying, transmitted his wisdom and worth
To Magog, entitled by virtue and birth
To lord it the right royal way.

And by craft ye've maintained what bluff daring began—
Your grasp on the fairest and best—
Consuming the cates, and commend'g the bran
To your equals in all that is noblest in man,
As your consciences needs must attest.

We are told that of old there was one of your line
So proud of his pomp in the East
That he deemed himself worthy of homage divine,
Till the Lord turned him out to eat grass with the kine
And grow a respectable beast.

Perhaps, by the year nineteen hundred or so,
We Demos may come to such pass
As to rise and bid Messieurs Divine Right and Co.,
Czar, Empress, Braganza, Guelph, Hapsburg, all go—
Like the great king aforesaid—to grass.

Then "l'état c'est moi" shall be "l'état c'est nous,"
The dictum reversed for the nonce;
Having had quite enough of grand units like you
We fain would just see how King Million will do,
As both sovereign and subject at once.

MARYSVILLE, February, 1879.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

Afterward.

The flower lies crushed,
The winds are hushed;
Silence is everywhere.
The casket lies low
Where ivies grow;
Silence is everywhere.

O God! must it be that the flower crushed be
That its perfume be wafted over the lea?
O God! must it be that the body dead be
That the soul may fly from its clay-house to thee?

Took'st Thou the young life in the fullness of youth
That its budding should never be blighted forsooth?
Sent'st Thou the white frost to cut down the flower
That a hand pluck it not in an idle hour?

Soft o'er the grave the light breezes bound,
Pausing to whisper the requiem sound:

"Low lieth the child
Whose spirit is flown;
Here flowers are piled
Whose fragrance is sown."

SONOMA COUNTY, February, 1879.

E.

At Last.

How her heart did soften
As she said, Good-bye!
Said before so often
And so carelessly;
Said with smile or laughter,
Seldom with a sigh;
Now 'twas with emotion,
Telling of Love's pain—
Symbol of devotion
Sought before in vain.

WESTERLY, R. I., January, 1879.

E. R. CHAMPLIN.

Little Elise.

When the star-jewels flash out in the skies,
Which of them sees
The flower-sweet face and glorious eyes
Of little Elise?

Somewhere she watches their glittering beams
Shine through the trees;
Somewhere upon the world's darkness there gleams
Little Elise.

When the dear Summer comes out of the South,
With blossoms and bees,
Always she kisses the darling red mouth
Of little Elise.

Though in such haste the roses to seek,
Ever the breeze
Stops to caress, on her berry-brown cheek,
Little Elise.

Ah! there fade out of life, day by day,
Sweet melodies;
Yet in my memory singeth away
Little Elise.

Jesus, dear Shepherd, who lovest Thy sheep,
Thou may it please
Out of all evil for ever to keep
Little Elise!

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879.

JULIA H. S. BUGEIA.

THOSE WOMEN.

"What," says an inquisitive young lady, "is the most popular color for a bride?" We prefer 'em white.

A Hartford beau has just made the startling discovery that a girl's ribs run up and down. Of course, it's so.

A Paris letter says ex-Queen Isabella of Spain looks like a large watermelon in a dress of bright yellow and green.

"There! that explains where my clothes-lines went to!" exclaimed an Iowa woman, as she found her husband hanging in the stable.

Lilia asks us: "Would a man smoke cigars if he could not see the smoke?" Lilia, would a girl chew gum if she couldn't see what she was chewing?

A New Haven woman has petitioned for a divorce from her husband because he has no style about him. It is to be hoped for his sake she will get it.

Haidee Heller, sister of the dead magician, who used to assist him in his second-sight performance, is at present living in the family of Stephen Fiske, but has not yet the honor of enrollment among his creditors.

Wishing to pay his friend a compliment, a gentleman remarked: "I hear you have a very industrious wife." "Yes," replied the friend, with a melancholy smile, "she's never idle; she's always finding something for me to do."

The Louisville News is responsible for this ambiguous paragraph: "Lotta Crabtree is the real name of the little actress who plays here this week. Her first appearance in Louisville was at the old Fuller Opera House in 1866. She was then seventeen years old. She is now about eighteen."

Susan Zentmeyer was a milkmaid in Lebanon, Pa. A cow kicked a boy off a stool, and the sight struck her as so funny that she laughed her jaw out of joint, and had to remain all day with her mouth wide open, until a physician could be brought. The boy's jaw was not affected by laughter.

Mrs. Elizabeth Reutter, who died at Baltimore Wednesday, was 113 years old. Her extraordinary longevity is said to be well authenticated. She was a native of Luxemburg, and was peculiarly sensitive regarding her age, which she requested should not be published in her obituary. We scrupulously observe her wishes—there were some odd months.

The Empress Eugenie is described as leading the quietest and most monotonous of lives at Chiselhurst. She prays, she drives, she embroiders, sometimes she plays whist in the evening; one day is almost exactly like another. Her food is simple, and she talks little at table, but always looks pleasant and interested. She is still handsome, her beautiful golden hair shining royally above her plain black dress.

And still the missionary cause waxes stronger. New Bedford has a clever young lady worth a million dollars, and "of a rather pious turn of mind," who made up that mind that she would be a missionary. Could anything be more beautiful? The church accepted her services, and when asked what field of labor she had in view, she pensively looked down at her lavender gloves and replied: "I think I will go to Paris."

This is Emma Abbott's necklace: "The ornament is composed of 357 diamonds, made first into a plain chain set in square blocks of gold. Through the centre of this runs a large coil of the precious stones, supplemented by other coils diminishing in size, and from their lower edge falls a shower of pendants, long and swinging, giving, when on, the effect of a rope of fire around the throat, radiating in every direction. This is worn with a heavy diamond cross, in which the gems are of unusual size."

The London Figaro prints a long interview with Victoria Woodhull in its issue of January 18. Mrs. Woodhull says circumstances have occurred that will prevent her "ever appearing again on the platform;" that she has spent "several fortunes in the work of social regeneration;" that she intends to "flood the world" with her publications, and that she is "backed by people who represent millions." The interviewer was evidently impressed. He describes "the blue eyes radiant with life and soul; the brow, though not protuberant beyond what a Phidias would desire, instinct with thought; the lips brimming with refined feeling. A face more interfused with spiritual life and fire, I think I never set eyes on."

There was a church wedding in New York the other day, as large and fashionable as could be desired, but at the door—and only one door of the church was allowed to be open—was stationed a detective for the purpose of preventing the entrance of a certain undesired individual, while near the officiating clergyman was posted a lawyer, armed with all the legal documents needed to show, if anyone raised the question, there was no good reason why the marriage should be stayed. The cause of all these preparations was due to the inconsiderateness of a young lady, who had, a year or two before, been "rock-married" to some other one than her present husband, by a man who turned out to be a judge, or a justice of the peace, or some other authority, and in consequence of this fact her life had been made miserable by the assertion of the temporary bridegroom that he would not permit her to be married to anyone else. As it turned out no attempt at interference was made, and the precautions taken were, therefore, needless; but that they were even thought to be necessary indicates an amount of uneasiness which no one would care to lightly assume; hence the very obvious moral is, that the best way to avoid entanglements of this kind is to refuse to participate in any of them.

In loyal performance of his duty as Poet Laureate, Mr. Tennyson is adding a horror to the grave by a poem on the death of the Princess Alice. That on the death of the Queen has been completed for some years, and is filed away pending her majesty's demise; but the younger lady took him by surprise.

Mr. Whistler, the artist, has put into book form his quarrel with Mr. Ruskin, the critic. He calls it a caterwaul in black and white.

The "Contributor's Club" of the Atlantic is a stuffed one.

George Eliot's widow's weeds are spinster's flax.

Thirteen of the daily newspapers started in the United States in 1878 are living; the rest are in that brighter and better land where the wicked cease from troubling—where they are troubled.

It is clear that Mr. William Winter's Trip to England would have given the reader a truer idea of the country had the author not unfortunately arrived at his destination. He got on nicely till he came to Liverpool.

The author of Helen's Babies has received a high compliment from Turgeneff, who said he would be proud to translate Mr. Habberton's great work into Russian if he were able to read English.

Shakespearean literature has received another valuable and characteristic addition: a person named Ellacombe has produced a volume entitled Plant-Lore of Shakespeare, "in which a dictionary of every plant or tree named in the plays and poems is illustrated by the passages in which it is mentioned." There are also copious literary and botanical notes. The author is still at large.

The poem Nadeschda, by Johan Ludvig Runeberg, the eminent Swedish poet, has been translated into Bostonese by Miss Marie A. Brown.

The American Book Exchange has begun the publication of a cheap edition of Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature, in eight handy volumes. The first volume has just been published and presents a neat appearance. Those who desire to possess this useful and valuable work can procure it from the Exchange at a remarkably low price, for it is a straight steal.

Mrs. Julia A. Moore, the Sweet Singer of Michigan, says she has not suffered flattery to turn her head, for she knows that the critics which praises her the loudest is the same ones as praises Longfellow; and 'taint likely there is two poets to once.

In the Bulletins of Dr. Hayden's Geological Survey, the "Bibliography of North American Invertebrate Palæontology" has kindled the envy and animosity of the invertebrate palæontologists of South America. Yet it seems to have been written in good faith and without any sinister motive.

Ah! it has actually been done into French, and is entitled Les Bébés d'Hélène.

In the Magazin für die Literatur des Auslandes, Leipzig—formerly published at Berlin—the Gothic letter has been abandoned. The Gothic type is responsible for every other pair of spectacles bestriding the German nose.

The London Academy praises Will Carleton's "Farm Balads" as having "that rare mixture of humor and pathos that never fails to touch all hearts." It fails to touch ours.

Gerald Massey writes of Charles Lamb that he was no teacher of his time, and had no commanding or immediate influence on his contemporaries. "He lifted up no banner, summoned no contending hosts to the conflict, did no battle on the side of faction or party." Of course not; he was a gentleman.

Two volumes of a work which will be of great literary importance have been published in Spain—Balaquer's Historia Política y Literaria de los Trovadores. When completed it will include more than three hundred biographies. The volumes now out treat of the poetry and language of the Troubadours, and their influence on European countries.

A writer in the New York Tribune grieves at the literary inactivity of Dr. W. L. Shoemaker, the poet. We have greater fortune. Ne sutor ultra crepidam—Dr. Shoemaker should be content with his last poem.

The Fine Art of Reading is the title of a neat little volume just published by Roberts Brothers, it being an essay, translated from the French of Ernest Legornée, urging the importance and suggesting the methods of acquiring the accomplishment of reading aloud. The real "fine art of reading" is to read inaudibly, but it would require five hundred volumes to teach it.

FEMININE MYSTERIES.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—Let us be thankful for small favors. Just at this transition season Fashion flings us only an occasional bit of comfort in the shape of a novelty or two to save us from utter despair. Her last contribution has a breezy sound, suggestive of coming spring zephyrs and summer heats. We begin to edge away from the heavy woollen goods of the past three months, and get nearer the light beiges, silks, and grenadines that even the moderate summers here make necessary. We are casting our thoughts forward far enough to discuss cotton fabrics, such as the pretty new cotton sateens that are to form an important part of our coming toilets two months hence. These sateens are of a very fine twill, thick, yet soft to the touch, and come in the most popular colors—blues, grays, browns, creams—and again, stripes of contrasting colors, which last will be used to make Pompadour overdresses with striped vests, to be worn over skirts of a solid color. Some have exquisite bunches of flowers scattered over the groundwork; others are still made odd, being in stripes of two shades of brown, with a border of cardinal red covered with palm leaves. These goods will be made up with basques and vests, undershirts trimmed with one or two plaited flounces, and overshirts most commonly finished by bias bands of striped sateens, below which is a fall of Russian lace put on very full. A jabot of the same lace extends down the whole front of the vest. Pippings of plain colors are to be much used. Percaloes, too, will be favored again this year. They will be in the more delicate shades, and the design almost invariably will be the polka dot and stripes of the same for trimmings. The South Kensington School of Design seems to be interesting itself in our dress goods this year, as the floral designs, on pale grounds, among calicoes, lawns, and organzies, bear that title. The patterns for the body of the goods are scattered over the surface, regardless of any sort of order apparently, but borders which go with them are in rich masses of foliage and flowers. Calicoes in rich colors, warranted to wash, come in rich shades, to be utilized as plaitings, pippings, or bias bands for other goods. Still another novelty is basket woven cotton that has a thick, crinkled appearance, the groundwork being strewn with arabesques, flowers, and grasses. To go back a step: In lighter woollen suitings there are new goods called "flannel finish." They are without lustre, very soft, and come either in plain colors or in narrow stripes of two shades of the same color. The colors are mostly beige brown, gray, and black. A new camel's hair is without a twill, and of such light weight as to nearly resemble bunting, and has the flannel finish. Some few checks will be seen, but the check will be noticed more in the weaving than in any violent contrast in color. The fancy for cashmere seems to be steadily on the increase. It is used now in combination with every other kind of goods than itself, excepting cottons. Nothing is prettier where dresses are being made over, for its own intrinsic elegance seems to entirely overshadow any possible lack of freshness in the material it is put with, very much as one person of distinction will be a voucher for the respectability of a whole party of otherwise questionable people. The East India cashmere is considered the most elegant at present. It is easily distinguished from the French by its softness of texture and slight hairiness of surface. It comes fifty-four inches in width, and varies from $2.50 to $6.00 a yard, while the French goods may be had very much cheaper. Very handsome evening and dinner dresses are made up of combinations of white cashmere and cashmere or silk of the light colors, and white brocaded cashmeres, in the ivory tint, is used for opera cloaks. The present season has brought in many pretty novelties in neckwear—confections they are called nowadays, probably because they are "just too sweet for anything, you know"—chief among them the jabot and the fichu. The latter is the more modern, or rather the latest revival of an old-time favorite. Then there are nests and necklaces of all the choicest laces—Duchesse, Valenciennes, Irish, Genoese, and Venetian points, and a varied assortment of a less expensive grade, among which Breton takes the chief place. Worth is said to use a thousand yards of this last every day. The "Camargo" fichu—so named in honor of Lecoq's latest musical composition—is one of the prettiest. It is made of crêpe lisse and Breton lace, and is to be worn with an open dress; the jabot which terminates it fastens at one side. India mulls can be had in rose color and blue, as well as in white, and are as soft and delicate as crêpe lisse for this purpose, but Canton crape is the most recherché, and its revival in this form is said to indicate a return of the popularity of the Canton crape shawls, that were the pride of old ladies fifty years or so ago. Transparent sleeves are still another pretty and convenient fashion. They can be made of white bobbinet lace and Breton insertion, or of black Brussels net and white or black lace, and are worn with silks, satins, or velvets, irrespectively. New opera scarves are of Spanish or Duchesse laces, three yards long, and are worn wound around the head and neck. It is quite easy to convert them at short notice into opera bonnets, by a little ingenuity in making them up in the form of large Alsatian bows. Black kids are being extensively patronized for evening wear. They are made still more effective by double or triple bands of lace insertion around the arm and a quilling of lace at the top. Either black or white insertion and lace may be used. The same for white, undressed kid; the black, however, are the opera gloves, par excellence. Cream white and maitie are for calling; also the new color, guinea-gold. For mourning, black, undressed kids are "the only wear;" but for persons dressing in colors, contrasts are now chosen, rather than have the gloves of the same color as the suit, as formerly. The "five o'clock tea" may now be said to be a fully established institution in the visiting world, and in Paris ladies vie with each other in producing the most elegant toilets on these occasions; two recently worn at an entertainment are worth reproducing. The first was of the pinkish-gray color known as "pigeon's throat;" the long train had no panniers, but the tablier was turned back with two large revers of terry velvet, and trimmed with silver braid edged with pale blue, the tablier being of soft radziner silk. The casaquin boddice was covered with the same silver and pale blue braiding, and was edged with fine Russian lace, embroidered with pale blue silk, the design traced out with silver thread; the cuffs of the sleeves and the top of the boddice were also trimmed with this embroidered lace. The bracelets and earrings turquoise, the stockings light blue silk, the shoes gray satin with blue bows. The second dress was black satin, capriciously covered with heraldic lace, the design being a coat of arms picked out with gold thread for the front, and tiny dragons worked in fine jet beads bearing thin necklets of gold beads at the sides; the train was black ribbed velvet, and the high boddice likewise—the long, straight waistcoat being of black satin, covered with lace. The neck-tie worn was of antique white lace. During the penitential weeks to come, and while we are making numberless good resolutions for the immediate future, to be carried out more or less according to the amount of temptation we are subjected to, needle-work of all sorts will be the dernier resort with many; it will, therefore, be gratifying to know that curtains of Brussels net embroidered in crewels are considered very elegant, and are sanctioned by so august a body as the Ladies' Dressmaking and Embroidery Association, of London. English ladies are embroidering gun cases for their gentlemen friends; and the more domestically inclined are initialing table cloths and napkins, in both white and colored embroidery. New washstand screens are made of brown linen, a fairy tale in seven scenes being the design. The pictures are contained in seven blocks, four below and three above, the centre block of the upper row containing the name of the story. Persian canvas is the newest material for chair back. I see among the sensible inventions a new patent wireless bustle, said to be made from a material lighter than down, and free from all wire, steel, or whalebone, and so constructed that the wearer can sit with perfect comfort and feel sure that it will spring into place immediately on rising; but I have not yet found them here. From my scrap book of useful information I extract the following excellent recipe for removing a very common and troublesome stain—that of coffee, with cream or milk in it, from silk or wool goods: Brush the spot with a little unperfumed glycerine; wash it out thoroughly with lukewarm water, and iron the fabric on the wrong side until it is perfectly dry. The glycerine absorbs the fatty matter in the cream, as well as the coloring matter of the coffee. A radical remedy.

LILIAS DUBOIS.

Obscure Intimations.

M. A.—We do not know any way in which the gentleman you mention could have discovered your identity except through your own indiscretion. It will be more obvious that he really has done so when he has revealed it.

"HOME JOURNAL."—The old year ended so long ago that the poem would be a trifle out of season just now, and would have to stand on its literary excellence alone. It might be a little unsteady on its "feet."

ESTHER.—We are not quite sure we get the full meaning of your letter. The "Standard" is a club which we do not find mentioned in the Elite Directory.

CHEERYBLE.—Poems, like pretty women, should have nothing to do with one another. "Sequels," "replies," "companion pieces," and the like, behold, they are unpleasant!

TH. VAL.—We don't think the lines very good; do you? As for blank verse, it does not readily lend itself to short sentimental bits. Only a great master can write blank verse anyhow.

J. B.—It does not follow that because we publish a thing we think it good—always; nor is rejection to be understood as condemnation. Merit is but one of the many considerations determining these matters. We would not willfully publish anything that would be fatal to the reader, nor meanly exclude what would tickle him to death. All the same, there are more things in this business than are dreamt of in your philosophy. So cheer up, old man, and try again.

STEVENS.—It is difficult not to have a prejudice against your work when it is accompanied with such gushing letters. Don't gush.

Obituary.

We write this week under the oppression of a great grief. We have been by inexorable death bereaved of a friend, companion, and confidant, to whom, for some years past, we have been most warmly attached. He was honorable, faithful, and devoted. We never knew him to shrink the performance of a duty. He never told a lie. A leading trait of his character was gratitude for favors. He never asked us to indorse his note, never solicited us to support him for office, never refused us a favor within his power to grant. He was temperate in his life, honest and honorable in all his transactions. Not a professor of religion or member of any orthodox church, yet, a Christian in the highest and best sense of the term, he lived an upright, conscientious life, and in all our intimate intercourse with him we never heard him speak unkindly of any one. For industry and economy he had no superior. For a long time he acted as special policeman at our residence, and, although he had no place on the force and drew no pay from the treasury, he performed his duties with fidelity, bravery, and unsleeping vigilance. Although filling but an humble position in society, he was of good family and of superior education. He was high-spirited and would resent a wrong, though never quarrelsome. His association was entirely among gentlemen; he had an instinctive repugnance to tramps. Exceedingly fond of field sports, he was never weary of the gun in pursuit of game. We have spent many a pleasant day with him, rambling over our Californian hills and valleys for quail, and in his society have spent many a delightful hour upon marsh and lake and stream, shooting ducks. His last hours were soothed by every attention; the kindest friends, and the most experienced physicians attended him in his last illness. Our anticipations of pleasure in Abraham's bosom will only be half realized if we do not meet there our faithful friend and loving dog—poor Snyder.

Many a woman objects to Madame Anderson's walking as a species of cruelty, who yet keeps her own tongue running all day.

When a woman takes a pistol in hand it's hard to tell whether she'll commit suicide or murder. And nobody waits to see.

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

The performance within one week of two new overtures for orchestra, by local composers, is, after all, not a bad showing for an out-of-the-world little town like this one, especially when taken in connection with the fact that they are both designed as preludes to operas. The operas themselves we are less likely to hear (our company being engaged at St. Petersburg for the season); but one of them, that of Mr. Hinrichs, I have had the pleasure of reading in score, and find it to be an exceedingly clever composition, graceful, melodic, and quite dramatic in conception. The overture—it is called The Ladies Conspire—was performed at the promenade concert given at the new Olympic Club rooms on the seventh instant, and, as it was a new composition of a resident musician, was attentively listened to by about five persons, the rest of the audience meantime tramping about the rooms, chattering, laughing, and indulging in their own kind of a good time (save the mark!) generally. What are new overtures to us, or resident composers, either, that we should stop for them? The second of the new compositions, by Mr. George W. Koppitz, the excellent flutist, is called simply "Overture to an Operetta," and has been played this week by the California Theatre Orchestra. I have not heard anything of the operetta, but the overture is bright and pretty, and, if not strikingly original, at least well made and instrumented with taste and routine. I hope that some day we shall have the entire work to which this overture is the preface. The performance of an original operetta ought to be possible, even if our company (for Grand opera, I mean) is in St. Petersburg.

Chamber Concerts begin again on next Tuesday with the first of the new series of Quintet Recitals, for which a very interesting programme is announced. There are to be—firstly, I might say, in musical interest—five out of the six Scenes from the Orient by Schumann, in their original form (piano-forte, four hands), played by Miss Schmidt and Miss Alice M. Bacon, a very promising young pianiste, who makes her debut on this occasion. Then, besides songs by Mrs. J. E. Tippet, we are to have the first movement from the new Quintet for piano-forte and strings by Rubenstein, String Quartets by Mozart and Carl Schuberth (three movements from the one in C, a charming work), and, as solo numbers, the Fantaisie Caprice of Vieuxtemps—Mr. Clifford—and a Serenade Orientale for Violoncello, by Popper. The concerts will be at new Dashaway Hall, instead of the Mercantile Library, and it is expected that the effect of the music will be much enhanced by the superior acoustic properties of the new hall. The subscription, I am glad to say, looks promising.

If our opportunities for the study of art are to be restricted to shop windows and dealers' galleries, we have certainly cause to be grateful to those in the trade who have the enterprise to provide occasionally something both fresh and good, in spite of the fact that stale and bad would sell almost as well. I am not at all sure but that dealers—as a class—are rather detrimental to the cause of art, and am inclined to think that both artists and public would be better served without their mediation. Most of them know nothing of art—as such—beyond the scraps and bits of information—gabble—that they are enabled to pick up in course of their dealings with sellers and buyers; they have a vocabulary of the shop that serves a certain purpose (that of expatiating on the merits of a work they do not understand to one who knows no more about it than they themselves) and is liberally applied, on occasion, but that is apt to be as far removed from any real critical quality as the politician's view of a leading question is from statesmanship. I need hardly say that I do not expect one whose business it is to sell pictures to criticise them for the benefit of buyers; this would be somewhat too much to ask of human (commercial) nature, and would imply a degree of ingenuousness not to be looked for in a dealer of any kind, much less one whose wares are of such a character that his customers are almost invariably ignorant of their true value, and are forced to rely very largely, at least, upon his valuation of them. But it is in his selection and purchase of works of art that the critical judgment of the dealer is to be looked for, and in which it is likely to be of no small influence among those with whom he does business. This is especially the case in a community which, like ours, has no recognized standard of authority and none or very little of that familiar intercourse with artists through which a critical insight into the nature—as well as merits and faults—of their work may sometimes be established. Our artists live in an atmosphere into which picture-buyers do not penetrate, and that which surrounds the buyers—or the large majority of them—is one that is apt to prove stifling to the unfortunate artist who is perchance forced to inhale it, either in search of a commission or after having executed one. As a necessary consequence of this condition of affairs our art culture is in reality measured in a great degree by what can be done in the shops; and this, I repeat, is not likely to be conducive to a healthy growth in any direction; the artists are none the better for it, nor, I think, is the public. A taste for pictures is a very good, a very desirable, thing, if it be a taste for good pictures. But good pictures are rare, and necessarily costly. The fact, however, that it is "the thing" to cultivate art renders it obligatory on whoever can afford a Brussels carpet and a piano forte to have pictures, and the market must be supplied. In such a case, what is the dealer to do? Tell the good people who come to him for an invoice of "art" to match their new furniture, that they had better wait until they have learned some little about it and are able to discriminate for themselves; that by keeping together the money that they will inevitably pay out for five or six bad pictures they will eventually be able to have a single good one, which—when their judgment comes—will be worth more to them than all the bad ones in the world? Not he! The market is there, waiting money in hand, and it is his business to supply it. If he happens to be a good critic—or judge—of art, he is like to do no harm, and may do much good. For a few words coming from one "in the business" oftentimes have great weight, and it is part of the picture-dealer's trade to have the right kind of words ready at his tongue's end. But the danger is always that these words and phrases—this glib and exceedingly facile art-talk, that is so cheap to the talker and so entangling and convincing to the ignorant buyer—goes just as much with the poorest art as it does with the better work; it is part of the stock, just the same as the gilt frames and color-tubes; and, having once come into possession of a picture, it is part of the (business) conscience of the dealer to believe in it. Naturally; he thought it good or he would not have bought it. But good for the dealer is one thing, and good for the buyer is another and quite different one. Unless, indeed, the dealer happens to be at once a good judge of art, a man of wide culture, a disinterested, unselfish human being, and a good business man. And such combinations, I fear, are very rare, especially in this part of the world.

The above paragraph is a digression, for which I beg my readers' pardon, but which may, after all, be of more value than the matter itself, which is this: (That is, I should like to be permitted to digress just once more, long enough to say that the picture shops have certainly one great claim on our gratitude, and this because they are the galleries of the poor. Many a picture-hungry boy or girl have I seen at those windows satisfying a craving that must otherwise have gone unstillied. Many a man's only idea of art is founded upon what he learned from shops and shop-windows, and many a lesson have I learned there myself. But as much good can be done, so can also much harm; and it is this that I fear the dealers do not always remember.) And now let me come back to the point from which I started at the beginning of the preceding paragraph—viz.: to Messrs. Morris & Schwab's show-window, where there are at present to be seen some half a dozen flower paintings—water colors—by Theresa Hegg, of Nice, that are at once very beautiful and decidedly interesting. I do not remember to have come across the name before, although from the many admirable qualities in the work I fancy it can not fail to become celebrated in time, if indeed it be not already so, in that better market to which we have unfortunately no access—viz.: where good pictures are not allowed to drag out a weary existence in sales galleries waiting for buyers, but are sought and bought, making reputations for their creators instead of mere notoriety, as with us. These flowers are painted with great breadth and a quite masterly technique. The artist seems to have understood to a nicety just how far she might carry her fondness for detail without detriment to the general pictorial effect, while at the same time she seems never to sacrifice any of those matters of finish that will give point or accuracy to her subject. Her command of color is evidently very great, as is also her skill in grouping. Indeed, of the many meritorious points in her pictures, this seems to me to be the most noteworthy. Flower painting has in our day come to be such a much-abused branch of art that it is particularly refreshing to find an occasional specimen that does not bear the unmistakable brand of the novice, and is neither cheap nor nasty. I wish that it might be possible to keep one or two of these pictures of Hegg (Miss or Mrs.) on exhibition somewhere in town where some of our ambitious, smearing young women might have them constantly before them as a sort of reminder that "fools rush in," etc. Let them look at this work, observing the skillful grouping (composition) and reticent color-scale of which this artist is master, and go back to their work convinced that to paint flowers truthfully and artistically is not child's work, after all.

I have been much interested in observing the close resemblance that these flowers—which, having been painted at Nice, are likely to be the result of studies made thereabouts—bear to those of our own climate, and fancy that this will hardly fail to strike every casual observer. Not only the roses have quite the Californian air—the varieties as well as their habits of growth—but the wild flowers as well. I doubt but that every blossom and leaf in the entire collection can be gathered in our fields and on our hills, and there is in one of the pictures (not in the window, I believe) a spray of eucalyptus leaves, blossoms, and seed-vessels, that might have been gathered in our streets, and suggests the most beautiful quality (most beautiful? The only beautiful one!) of this ugly, this horribly, frightfully ugly tree. If they have taken to planting the eucalyptus at Nice, I'm sure that will be the last of it as a nice town. But Miss (or Mrs.) Hegg has found the picturesque side of the thing, and sends us from Italy a bit of home portraiture that is delightful.

The Concert of Trinity Church Choir—under the leadership of Mr. Geo. J. Gee—takes place Wednesday evening, 19th instant, and promises to be a very interesting entertainment. Mr. Gee has given himself great pains to create an efficient chorus, and deserves the most generous encouragement. The proceeds of the Concert (which will be given in the school-room of the church) are to be expended in additions to the library of the choir.

The programme for Mr. Ferrer's Concert (24th instant) has not yet been announced, but is sure to be good, as many excellent artists have promised their assistance. Mr. Ferrer has so many claims upon our public, that I feel assured it will be happy to honor his draft at sight.

I think I have found one of the funniest apologies for a violinist playing out of tune that has yet been put forward, and one that ought, in common mercy, to be made for all the little unfortunates of fiddle pupils who are bullied into taking lessons. It appeared—à propos of Mr. Heyman's playing of Raff's cavatina, at the Herold concert—in last Saturday's Post, and suggests that a disgusted public condone the false intonation and general slobber with which that young gentleman embellished Raff's composition, because, perforce, "he played it against his own wishes, and because it was impossible to get the orchestra together to rehearse the numbers he had intended." Remember this, gentlemen of the violin: When you play "against your own wishes" it is permitted to you to play out of tune (if the piece be easy, so much the more out of tune, I suppose), and when the orchestra can not be gotten together you may slobber. But be quite sure to do it manfully, and with the grand air, and you shall have bouquets, applause, and encores to your heart's content, and a nice little tuft-hunter to write your apologies afterward. If you have but "hosts of friends who appreciate you, a little occasional bad fiddling will not hurt you, and is probably intended by an inscrutable musical providence" as a penance for the unfortunate critics who have to listen to you, and who are probably only being served right for expecting anything better.

S. E.

SUBURBAN SAUCE.

OAKLAND, February 12, 1879.

DEAR JUNO:—If there is one trait more than another that is distinctive of the Oakland girl, it is a certain plasticity and amiability in agreeing to and giving her active coöperation to any scheme of a social nature that may be proposed. If our gentlemen will but do us justice, they must admit that in all the long years that have gone by we have never once deserted them. When can they cite an instance of a ball-room with a preponderance of their own sex in it? Have we not always conscientiously adorned it with our presence? And when our position has been only decorative, as has often happened, yet even then we have ever accepted our place meekly and resignedly, and have shown ourselves unfeignedly glad that we could do our little toward moulding and consolidating society. I am moved, Juno, to make these remarks by the knowledge of a certain outrage that is about to be perpetrated upon us.

Last week I wrote you of skating. Since then a call was made for lady recruits to join a club. Given by one of "our set," we, of course, all responded with the usual alacrity and loyalty. Now, in secret session, a few days ago, the committee, of which Mr. Jo. Cook is President, passed the following resolutions: "No lady will be admitted to the rink on club evenings (Monday) unless she comes in the costume prescribed by us—to wit: a red skirt, white astrachan zouave jacket, and cap of the same, adorned with a red cockatoo." Doesn't it fairly make you shudder, Juno, and wouldn't you think such an idea the outgrowth of some fearful malevolence felt toward us? Won't we look like a troop of trained monkeys? If the reason for this measure is merely a desire on the part of the President to see himself at the head of a fancy costumed organization, perhaps it can be gratified in a more liberal sense. I, for one, will volunteer any day for his triumphal procession, which he shall lead, hand-organ in hand, down our public thoroughfare. Don't be horrified, dear, for in joining this street pageant I feel I should not be sacrificing an iota of the womanly dignity that I should by appearing within the secluded walls of a skating rink in trappings so manifestly absurd for the place and sport. In this other case I would be consistent, at least. I am aware that several of our President's friends stoutly maintain that this measure never was given the seal of his approbation; that it was carried over his head by the efforts of one of the Committee, a friend and neighbor of his, a gentleman who has long been known as a keen student of decorative art, and who it seems by this last development has gone one step higher and turned into a sort of Worth-less (excuse the pun, Ju.) designer of ladies' attire. If this is true, of course I cheerfully absolve Mr. Cook from all responsibility, but I would suggest here that it is due both to himself and the ladies that he make a public statement of these facts. No gentleman can afford to rest under the stigma of ingratitude, of repaying years of devotion by a measure intolerant and unjust—a measure that saps the very foundation of female independence: the right to do and dress as we please.

Last Monday night the Club opened; the dress regulation was not enforced. We are to be allowed a week's respite, in consequence, like little children on a holiday. Our sport was all the more keenly enjoyed; and the gentlemen, how gleeful and happy they were! I wish you could have seen Mr. Bangs and Mr. Houghton at the end of the "whip lash;" it fairly made one hold one's breath. And little Mac, poor broker, how he crowed; and Mr. Will Peckham, how he tumbled about the floor in sheer delight. Then there was Mr. Will Locke sailing along—a stately frigate; and his friend, Mr. Henry Havens, bobbing about at his side for all the world like one of those dear little tug boats; and Mr. Charles Belden, steadied by his hat, making a fine record. And, too, I saw Mr. Jo. Cook and Mr. Willard Barton sacrificing their pleasure to help the timid ladies about. Oh! the inconsistency of man, helpmate and oppressor in one! Mr. King Goodrich, Mr. Tom Williams, Mr. Charles Eells, Mr. Windsor Brown, Mr. Robert Crockett, Mr. Charles Allen, Mr. Jim Baker, Mr. Tom Carneal, Mr. Jameson, Mr. Schroder, Mr. Fred Tuttle, and Mr. Charles Havens (the next German leader. Pity, sire! grant us thy tolerance for that one evening to adorn ourselves as of old) were all there, valiant and smiling. As to the ladies, there was a perfect galaxy of them. All the beauties and wits of our loved Athens held their court there that night. Ah, me! for the last time, and we love it so—the skating, the attention, and adulation of the brave, handsome men; perhaps when we are gone they will miss us, and by and by may even feel regret for the severity that drove us from them; but if this never comes to pass, they must at least applaud the independent spirit that would brook no interference with what we considered an inalienable right—a spirit that bravely made great sacrifices for the maintaining of a principle.

Your own heroic
MAID OF ATHENS.

One year ago this month there was organized in San Francisco the "Young Woman's Christian Association," the object being to provide employment for destitute women, to give advice, sympathy, and temporal aid to friendless, homeless young women, and to help families needing aid. It is an institution commending itself to all for its common sense effort at a practical work of benevolence and charity. It is properly in the hands of young women—married and single—good women, and great results will be accomplished if it is properly sustained. Poor children, destitute women, girls, strangers, poor and tempted, are aided and rescued by this society. It gives a week of lunches, beginning on Monday, at Platt's Hall. To each of the denominations is assigned a day, as, for instance, Presbyterians on Monday, Episcopalians on Tuesday, and so on. If one day had been set apart for sinners to go and eat in charity to the poor we should most certainly go, and indeed the object is so worthy that we are almost tempted to go in the disguise of a sectarian, that we may contribute our mite to so good a work. We never endeavored to look pious, and never have wrapped the mantle of the church about us, but as we see no objection to whipping the devil around the clerical stump, we will go, and risk the consequences.

Wrong none by doing injuries, or omitting that are your duty.

A CUSTOM OF THE FAMILY.

In what was looked upon as a spirit of peculiar wantonness, and an absence of any justifiable incitement, my great-great-grandfather, Nicholas Brun, murdered a gentleman of the French Court. For so doing he was arrested, speedily condemned, and almost immediately, in all legal form and with circumstances of great severity, broken upon the wheel. Being led to the place of execution, he addressed the assembled spectators, and commented with satisfaction upon the alleged absence of motive; regarding it as the chief redeeming feature of his deed, since thereby he had proved most conclusively that he had not been impelled by sordid or revengeful motives, but had merely acted in a spirit of pure disinterestedness, thus ably performing an ancestral duty, devolved upon him through the undeviating practice and example of a long line of splendid ancestry. This is believed to have been the earliest public acknowledgment of any well digested principle of murder in our family; though in its private traditions, a well considered and æsthetically executed murder had been for many generations regarded as the bounden duty of each successive link in the extended chain of noble descent.

Coming one generation nearer, I find that my great-grandfather, Roget, was a man of less vigorous intellect, and crippled, moreover, with almost total want of imagination, creative power, and grace of execution. It is true that in carrying out the family custom he achieved the main purpose, but in the manner of its performance he shed little glory upon the line. Without proper previous consideration of the subject, and in that hasty spirit with which one so often blunders through a necessary duty as something to be hurriedly performed, and thus set aside forever, he wandered into the open fields, and there, in broad daylight, murdered a Hungarian peddler. Of course he was apprehended and executed—being simply hanged, however, with kind consideration for his well-known condition of mental impoverishment. His family naturally felt somewhat disgraced in his death, for in the public mind there was not wanting a dim, unworthy suspicion that so far from designing merely to carry out a predestined custom of his line, he had cherished unsuitable intentions with reference to the peddler's pack.

My grandfather, Eustace, on the contrary, was a noble-minded and accomplished gentleman. He, too, in proper time, committed his murder and was apprehended; but with surpassing genius and skill he had accomplished the duty with such dexterity, and had woven about the deed such an array of entangling and conflicting collateral circumstances, that the whole matter was confused with mystery, and it was found impossible to fix the act upon him. There was the corpse in his own pantry, indeed, and there was the ancestral dagger projecting from the wound, but for all that the necessary proof failed, and though everybody believed him guilty it was impossible not to acquit. Therefore he was restored in safety to his home and friends, and might have continued there in peace and serenity until his death had it not been for the prejudices of the neighborhood, which, not accepting the verdict of the jury as correct, so teased and tormented his after-life that finally he parted from all his native associations, and forever transferred his allegiance to another land. In my earlier days I saw him often, and can even now faintly recall him—a quiet, calm, white-haired old gentleman, full of grace and dignity, and bearing upon his whole person the impress of life's duties all fulfilled, and the honors of high ancestry not suffered to grow dim.

My father, also, was a quiet, mild-spoken, courtly man. It sometimes seemed to me, however, that he failed to put proper stress upon the prescriptive observances of our line, and that now the gathered centuries having brought new ideas, he considered, perhaps, that the family should assume other interests and practices, and abandon those customs that had heretofore illustrated our history. It is certain that I never heard him more than casually allude to the several murders of our line, nor did I ever see him suddenly become electrified with that alert, erect, noble, and satisfied aspect and demeanor which in bygone times, as I have been told, had been wont to assure the rest of the family that a great and hitherto neglected duty had been performed, and the honor of our family maintained. It was a matter which, as I grew older, often caused me deep distress and perplexity; and many a time did I sit and contemplate his serene and thoughtful face, and wondered whether he had really abandoned all desire for distinction, and every honest regard for our hereditary practices, and whether we must at last sink into the dull level of the commonplace families around us. Serene and unimpassioned, he thus grew older, and at length died, slowly sinking away into unconsciousness. But throughout all the last moments of his still flickering perception, though I anxiously hung over him, there came no open confession to his lips; and so at last the vital spark fled, leaving me despairing and broken-hearted, with the thought that one whom I had loved so much had proved recreant to that great responsibility of hereditary duty.

Year by year thereafter, as I grew older, I deliberated upon the matter; at times feeling a kind of mingled scorn and pity for my father as one who had weakly yielded to circumstances which should not have controlled him, and had thereby betrayed his ancestral trust; and then again wondering whether, after all, he had not been right, and whether it might not be that new generations should naturally bring other ideas, and properly lead to an abandonment of the great principles of the past. This latter thought, however, was only allowed suzerainty in my moments of occasional weakness. Strong in my sense of family pride, I did not often allow myself to question the value or importance of that great custom, which, with only a single treacherous break, had illustrated our annals. The only doubt of any consequence I ever felt was as to whether the deplorable break having once been made, must be considered as remaining open forever, or whether in my own person I could rivet the chain, letting it gain strength with a more brilliant link than might elsewhere be shown, and thereby inaugurating a new career of family glory, to last, under kindly fate, for many generations to come.

I concluded finally, that it could be done; that if there is any virtue in genial sympathy with the traditions of the past, and in a determination to live worthy of ennobled blood, it certainly must no longer be neglected. And then, warm and glowing with the subject, I sought counsel and concurrence from my friend Trevalian. He was the dearest friend I had ever had; a man of wondrous wealth of mental acquirement, and adorned with every courtly grace, and had given his whole heart to me with more of passion and effusion than if he were my twin-brother. I felt, therefore, that I must not advance a single step upon my way without taking him into consultation.

Not that I told him my design in explicit words. That, indeed, would not have been a friendly action, for I had no right to imperil his life with my own. If I should be detected, he might be made to suffer as my accomplice were I to reveal everything to him in advance. And though as my dearest friend he might have been willing to go with me to any extent, yet I, as his loved companion, must not suffer him so to do. But there are ways in which information can be imparted without employing words of actual description—methods by which an idea, though not placed too obtrusively before one, may be so ingeniously advanced as to be apprehended by intuition. Thus I now acted, clouding my observations with sufficient veil of mystery, and yet all the while allowing the real truth to break forth in quiet gleams, as the bright sunlight will for a moment seek passage through the parted folds of a cloud.

"Suppose, my dear Trevalian," I said, "that a man were bound by family tradition and by power of caste to perform a task which none of his ancestors had, to his knowledge, ever neglected—except it might be in one case which makes it more than ever incumbent upon him to repair that single error with more than ordinary effort of his own. Suppose that—"

"I see," Trevalian interrupted, understanding me at once, and fearful, perhaps, lest I might give him too little credit for quickness of apprehension, and therefore might reveal myself too broadly in some unnecessarily vigorous and expressive utterance. "You mean that in case the miller around the corner, or the blacksmith at the cross-roads, were to resolve upon the commission of a murder, how best he could accomplish it?"

"You are a marvel of perspicacity, indeed, Trevalian," I said, not unpleasingly amazed by the earnest appearance of fiction he was giving to the conversation. "Of course, we will understand between ourselves, that we do not actually mean Ernest, the miller."

"No; rather will we say that we mean Iristan, the blacksmith," responded Trevalian, with a quiet smile. "Well, what then? We will suppose that in the family of the blacksmith there has been a pleasant custom whereby, in every generation, the head of the house has been obliged to keep up the dignity of the line by committing a murder. How, then, should the present leader of the line act? Or what should I say to him were he to come to me for advice? That is the question, is it not? Well, I suppose that in the beginning I should have to tell Iristan, the blacksmith, were it only for matter of form, that it was a very wrong thing to think of, indeed, and that the newer code of these later centuries would not admit of such a deed."

"Exactly—for the sake of form—that is all. But when Iristan, the blacksmith, told you—as he certainly would—that childish remonstrance of that kind would be more than useless, would even be indelicate, since it would be implying that at a single word he could ruthlessly cast asunder all the pleasant ties that bound him to the history of the past, then, of course, you would abandon all such feeble and peevish manner of warning, and would give him advice and information of actual value; is it not so?"

"But what advice or information of any real value could be given?" was Trevalian's answer, after a moment of deep reflection. "If Iristan, the blacksmith, were to design the commission of a murder, could he not very readily accomplish it? Men are plenty in this world—nor is the human skull made of boiler iron, or the human heart of alligator-hide. Hammers fashioned to strike a heavy blow are easily to be procured, nor are swords and daggers with sharpened points impossible to be obtained. It really, therefore, seems to me—"

"Exactly; as far as you now go you are perfectly correct, my friend. Men pass to and fro incessantly, and might at any moment be made victims to one lying in wait with sword or axe. But still, do you not see that if Iristan, the blacksmith, were to perform the deed in such an open, commonplace manner, he would not only thereby lose his own life, but also fail to shed any lustre upon his hereditary line?"

"I hardly understand you," exclaimed my friend.

"I mean only this," was my answer. "The blacksmith should not rashly act, so as deliberately to throw away his life. He may take his risk, to be sure; for to assume his peril is merely the part of any true gentl—I mean, of course, of any true blacksmith. But willfully to throw away his whole existence under the iron beel of the law, without any hope of succor or release, can be the act of only an insane man or fool. He must live, if he can, not merely to perpetuate his race, so that his successors may enjoy and repeat his exploit, but also so that he himself may go down to the quiet evening of a well-spent life, and in that sweet decline enjoy the satisfaction of having deserved well of the ancestors who have gone before him. In fact, he must remember that he murders not for the applause of the public, but for the peace of his own conscience and for his own self-approval; and that, therefore, any precautions which he may judge fit to take for safety or concealment are not merely justifiable, but also a duty."

"Now, indeed, I begin to comprehend," said Trevalian.

"And there naturally comes the further question as to the nature and condition of the victim," I continued; "for in case of detection through any unforeseen occurrence, it is fitting that the world which condemns the act, and in its unjust lack of appreciation hastens to punish it, should not fail at the same time to admire it and recognize in it a great purpose fitly and nobly carried out. Therefore, the victim should not be ignoble or unknown; nor should the deed be tinged at all with suspicion of interestlessness. It is said that I—that is to say, that Iristan, the blacksmith—had an ancestor who murdered a Hungarian peddler. The act was doubtless done with merely the usual good intent of sustaining properly the family glory; but the victim being a peddler, you observe, there were some people who delighted to cast the basest insinuations. Peddlers have often been murdered for their wares, and therefore, it was illogically argued, it might have been so in that case. Think, now, of all I have said, my ever dear friend, and before long let me have the benefit of your sage counsel."

And having thus explained myself I left him in my cabinet and strolled away, the better to commune with my own thoughts. Yes, there were those two things to be fully considered: The safety of the deed, so that I might live for years thereafter in secret sense of satisfaction, and the quality of the victim. For the former requisite provision could readily be made. I could easily entice anyone into my castle, and there, unobserved, deal with him at my leisure. It was a rambling old feudal erection, with deep recesses in the walls and with dark turns and corners where no ray of light ever penetrated, and, moreover, was so heavily jointed and ceiled that no cry of alarm or pain could ever find its way outside. If any shout for relief or succor were to arise at all, it could be heard only by my own household, and they would remain quiet and motionless, conjecturing rightly that the destined action of that generation was being at last fulfilled, and knowing that it did not become them to interfere. But there still remained the second question: Who should be the victim?

For a long time I pondered deeply upon it. The village around me was a small one and had no celebrities residing in it; therefore, I could scarcely expect to impart to my deed much lustre from the quality of the victim. All that I could do would be to maintain the disinterested character of the transaction by selecting no one through whose death I might be supposed to gain. For a while the subject caused me much reflection, and I was thrown almost into despair. Then suddenly the answer to the problem flashed across me like a ray of sunlight. How strange that I had not thought of it before! How regularly, indeed, does it not sometimes happen that we carry our speculations over the whole world in vain search after the impossible, and all the while the true solution lies at our very door! For I had canvassed this and that man carefully in my mind, and rejected one after the other as inappropriate for the proper fulfillment of my design, and thereby had weighed in the balance of my judgment half the better class of villagers before I remembered Trevalian himself, sitting all the while, quiet and unsuspecting, in the privacy of my cabinet.

The very man of all others upon whom my thoughts should have fixed themselves from the first. He was one of the most distinguished and respected gentlemen of the district—wealthy, talented, and the soul of honor. Physically and mentally he stood above all his compeers. In giving him up to death I should not only be selecting a most suitable victim for the exercise of my hereditary duty, but I should repel from myself, if detected, any suspicions of interested or unworthy motive. He was my dearest and most valued friend. That, of itself, would prove the absence of disgraceful or sordid design, since in losing his daily intimacy I should be sacrificing much that made existence pleasant to me.

Transported with the idea and finding it constantly gaining new developments of fitness, I hastened below. Since the deed was determined upon there should be no loss of time in putting it into execution. Why, in fact, with my resolution fortified beyond the power of any subsequent reflection to shake it, and with opportunity so temptingly displayed before me, should I delay? Therefore, I descended toward the foundations of my castle, and passing down two flights of stone steps slowly groped my way into a certain far-off corner of the outer wall.

When, at previous times, I had dreamily and in an incomplete manner mused upon the future possibilities of my design, I had invariably pictured this place as most suitable for the purpose. A quiet corner, into which no ray of light could enter except from a single distant loophole, between whose short, thick bars a straggling gleam now and then shot in and glanced faintly upon other portions of the wall. A secluded nook, with heavy brick and stone angles, where no stranger would ever think of searching for anyone who might have disappeared. Here, hanging a lantern upon a neighboring hook, so that its flickering beam would fall upon the hard ground, I seized a pickaxe and began breaking up the surface.

I had never been in a more exultant state of mind than when I thus began my task. The whole plan of operation was mapped out fairly and plainly in my thoughts, and it seemed as though none of my ancestors had ever yet done such honor to the name. The murder of a French noble by my great-great-grandfather Nicholas was a distinguishing feature of the past, to be sure; but still there had not been any personal friendship between them, and consequently but little real sacrifice was thereby made. None of the line, in fact, had ever made any illustrious sacrifice in all their several murders; but here at last I came, giving up to duty the dearest social tie I had ever formed. In all this, there was truly something grand and noble.

Moreover, I felt that I would perform the deed with a certain picturesque effect that would ever afterward live in my thoughts and gild my recollections of it with proud satisfaction. Digging that pit which was to become a grave, I would decoy my friend down to its edge, under pretense of examining some freshly killed game. Aha! he alone would be the game. Then, while there he stood, I would reach from behind and plunge a short dagger into his side. He would, of course, fall into the pit, but would not immediately expire. Then, as he there lay face upward, I would lower the lantern between us so that he could see me bending over him. He would understand the whole thing at once. Of course he would be sorry to pass from life, but at the same time he would recognize the full force of the necessity that urged me to the deed, and knowing my earnest desire to illustrate it with a noble victim, he could not but feel flattered that I had selected him rather than a stranger. Perhaps he would die with a smile upon his lips, and blessing me for the compliment I had paid him. And then I would gently cover him over, and leave him to that long, last slumber.

Thus depicting the scene and working away with pick and spade alternately, at last I had excavated a hole three or four feet in depth; and then all at once a new idea came into my enraptured fancy, whereby I might still more brilliantly illustrate the projected deed. Confident of the capacity of the place for concealment, why should I not write out a confession of the act and bury it with the body? It would never be found, of course; but still it would be there all the same, and it would please me to imagine the strong, tell-tale lines lying just beneath the surface and yet not a person the wiser for them. Men would come to me and would talk about the mysterious disappearance, and I would help them mourn and would condole with them, and all the while I would inwardly chuckle to think that they were standing directly over what would surely betray me if it could be found. It would never be found; but still it would be there—and so, while the world wondered and searched, the body and the written confession would lie side by side and decay together in abject helplessness. Perhaps now and then I would go softly down and dig up the confession and read it aloud to the rats, and then again bury it and stamp it down as before. Aha! that would be grand, indeed!

Suddenly, as thus I reflected and dived, my spade struck against some hard, unyielding object. At first I thought that it was a stone, and I endeavored to cast it one side; but by reason of its length, a portion of it remained still buried, so that it retained its place. Therefore, stooping down, I attempted to remove it with my hands; and, after a little resistance, it relaxed its hold, almost throwing me upon my back. Carrying the object to the lantern, I examined it closely, and, to my astonishment, discovered that it was a human thigh-bone.

I was greatly startled, as may be imagined; and then, feeling assured that this could not be all, I returned to the pit and pursued my investigations. Almost immediately, another thigh-bone rewarded my search, and then the small bones of the spine, and then again the bones of the right arm; and close to the latter, the skull. Beneath and around these relics were fragments of decayed cloth and gold thread and rich lace embroidery. Upon the skull rested a flat cap of what had once been fine crimson velvet, with tasselled appendages of gold woven work. Beneath the bones of the arm was a parchment scroll, heavy with broad seals, and emblazoned with cunning penmanship, at the end of which I could faintly decipher the trembling signature of a late Pontiff. Further and deeper, in a wild frenzy, I searched; and, after a moment, striking against a hard object anew, I raised it to the surface and discovered it to be an iron box. At the side was a padlock, which I speedily twisted apart with the pick. Within lay a roll of manuscript; and when I held it to the light and read the few words it contained, involuntarily I uttered a cry of astonishment. Then, in uncontrollable excitement, I hurried up stairs and stood once more beside my friend Trevalian.

He was still sitting in my cabinet, and was poring over a book. At my entrance he raised his eyes; and, noting from the disturbance of my countenance that something of importance must have occurred, he arose and closed the volume. "Is anything wrong the matter?" he exclaimed. "Trevalian," I answered, "there is this the matter, and it has doubtless saved your life. An hour ago, I had determined to pay you a great compliment—to select you as the most eligible person whom I could find to murder, in accordance with our family traditions. In another hour, the deed would have been done. But now—now you will go for ever free."

"I trust that I am deeply sensible of the great compliment intended me; but perhaps I am as well pleased not to be obliged to suffer so severely for it," he responded with a sweet smile; and I could not but admire the composure with which he spoke. Almost any other person, upon being thus addressed by me, would have exhibited symptoms of affright or disturbance, and perhaps would have hurriedly left the house, lest, perchance, I might repent and return to my original purpose. But Trevalian entirely refrained. Knowing me as he did, he perceived that as far as regarded himself the crisis of his fate was past, and that thenceforward he could even sleep in that chair as calmly and quietly as an infant in its cradle. "Yet tell me, my friend," he continued, "what has perplexed or offended you, and what is the meaning of this sudden change of intention regarding that honor which you had first intended to confer upon me?"

"This, dear Trevalian," I answered, and I showed him the written will. "Here lies the mystery, and its full explanation. It proves to me, moreover, how vain are often the hopes and expectations and ambitions of feeble man. It tells me that when we dream of improving upon the past, we err as frequently as we succeed; and that we sometimes find all our plans and purposes, however skillfully laid, exceeded in the end by those of the men who have gone before us. Oh, my dear father!" I continued, raising my eyes, "to think that I had almost learned to reproach and to despise you! To know that, after all, you in your meek and gentle modesty have silently carried out the cherished purposes of our race so much more fully, tastefully, and grandly than any of our progenitors who had gone before!"

"It was your father, then—" "Listen, Trevalian! I will tell you all. This little scroll, which I found in the grave I was digging for yourself, unfolds to me the mystery of the past and the weak insufficiency of my own crude designs. It proves to me that I am nothing worth, in comparison with him who, going before me, has eclipsed all our line, and yet, in his humility, has never uttered boasts of his great success. Behold how different—how much more artistic and complete were his designs! I, having thrown you into your grave, would have roughly and hastily told the tale upon scraps of paper; he selected the enduring parchment, and there, in arabesque and illuminated work, emblazoned with gold and colors, told the brilliant story of his triumph. I would have murdered you, the best and truest of all my friends, but, for all that, a mere private citizen; he, in his great ambition, sought out a victim who was clothed in such authority as made him one of the princes of the earth. You may have heard the story, how that, years ago, occurred the mysterious disappearance of a high cardinal-legate, journeying from Rome to the Court of France. Trevalian, it was my honored father who, in the calm seclusion of his cellar, extinguished that mighty life and buried the remains, with all the official insignia and authority, in one grave!"

"And now, my friend?" "Now, Trevalian, what can I do other than pause for ever? For there must always come a time in every family when the best old customs cease; and surely it must be most wisely allowed to happen when the observance of them has reached some dazzling pinnacle of success. Then should the custom, whatever it may be, grandly die away, rather than risk, in futile attempts, the possible humiliation of long drawn out procrastinating feebleness and penury. And therefore, though for many generations it was proper for the members of our line to struggle each to surpass the one who had gone before, yet since my father has now in taste and grandeur triumphed over all, why should I longer protract the contest? I know that I can never hope to equal him. Rather, therefore, let the honored observance die out at once in the all-sufficient blaze of his great glory."

"You are right, my friend; I feel that you are right," Trevalian said; and, pressing my hand with deep emotion, he went his way.

Yes, I was right. Not only Trevalian's approving smile, but also my own applauding conscience tells me the same. Yet now and then I sit listless in my cabinet, musing upon the family glories of the past, and mourn to find that my own life has become so purposeless and barren. And then, as I sadly pore over the emblazoned record left me by my worthy sire, I can not keep back the heavy sigh and open utterance of the regret that, while a fitting task had been meted out to him, so that he might not sink into an unhonored grave, kind fate had not sent down to me, instead, the blissful heritage of his surpassing genius, in order that to me alone might have been the brilliant inspiration of his unexampled deed.

ALBANY, N. Y., January, 1879.

LEONARD KIP.

Mr. G. P. Healy is the doyen of American portrait painters in Paris. He has had a long life in art; his memory is a good one, and every distinguished sitter has left a mark in his mind in the shape of "a story." He has met everybody; and to hear him running over the names of United States Ministers to France is like dipping into a series of back volumes of the Almanac National. Dynasties have passed before him; he has painted them in and painted them out; his sketch-book would make an admirable substitute for the dreary tables used in elementary schools to show "changes of government in France."

Louis Philippe gave Mr. Healy a commission to paint Andrew Jackson from the life. All other tasks was as child's play for difficulty to this. Jackson was ill with the dropsy; he was, in fact, as the event proved, dying; and he was at no time particularly easy of approach on errands not strictly of a business character. Mr. Healy nevertheless set to work with the same will as before, and he went out to the States. It was as he might have expected.

"Sir," said Jackson (men of his position were not yet out of the tradition of the old Johnsonian pomp of manner), "I can not sit."

"The King of France will be very sorry," returned Mr. Healy.

"Not for all the kings in the world, sir," thundered the other.

"Mr. Healy," said some one who witnessed the scene, "you should have begun by seeing Mrs. Jackson, the wife of his adopted son; he will do anything for her." The lady was in Nashville, and Mr. Healy at once set out for the place. He found her in a drawing-room full of company, told her his errand, and obtained her promise that she would do her best for him. In a few days, she sent him good news. She had at first gone on the same tack as the painter—the wishes of the King of France—but had received no other answer than: "I can't sit; let me die in peace." Then she changed the form of her pleading: "Father, I should like you to sit." The old man made no difficulty after that.

He went through it like a stoic. He was suffering intense agony, but he faced the artist with a look of perfect composure. Mr. Healy was a dozen times on the point of abandoning his task, only he reflected that, so far from adding to Jackson's torments, it really tended to relieve them by giving him an additional motive of self-control. As the picture progressed the sitter began to take a more active interest in it, and when it was done he asked for a replica, and even expressed a wish that the artist would remain to paint the portrait of his daughter-in-law. But Mr. Healy had other projects.

"General," he said, "before I leave the country I want to paint Henry Clay, and I have very little time to lose. I must try to find him. It is a sort of duty."

"Young man," returned Jackson, solemnly, "always do your duty." The word had perfectly reconciled him to the painter's desertion of him for his political antagonist. But Clay was not at hand just then, at least for the purposes of art, though his whereabouts were perfectly well known. He was simply aboard of a steamer that had run aground. Mr. Healy had no leisure to see him safely through his trouble, and so he returned to Jackson's house to paint the portrait of the dying General's daughter-in-law. On the Sunday following the day of his arrival he heard a loud, unearthly wail from the negroes on the estate, "Lord, Lord, old massa's dead!" He rushed to Jackson's room, but it was a false alarm—he had only fainted. At five on the same afternoon Mr. Jackson, the adopted son, knocked at the painter's door, and hurriedly asked him to come down stairs. Mr. Healy followed him to the chamber where his late illustrious sitter lay in mortal agony. About ten persons were in the room; Major Lewis, the General's old comrade, was supporting his head; Mrs. Jackson held his hand. Jackson was firm and composed to the end. He died as he had lived, with a moral strength of the heroic cast. He rallied for a moment as the painter entered, and said to some of those at the bedside: "Why do you weep? You should rejoice; I am in the hands of the Lord, who is about to relieve me." A few minutes more and his under jaw fell, and Mrs. Jackson was borne in a faint from the room.

The sirloin of beef is said to owe its name to Charles II., who, dining upon a loin of beef, and being particularly pleased with it, asked the name of the joint. On being told, he said: "For its merit, then, I will knight it, and henceforth it shall be called Sir Loin." In a ballad of "The New Sir John Barclaycorn," this circumstance is thus mentioned:

Our Second Charles of fame faeete,
On loin of beef did dine;
He held his sword, pleas'd, o'er the meat—
"Arise, thou fam'd Sir Loin."

Some time ago while a poll-parrot was sunning herself in a garden, in Oakland, a large hawk swooped down and bore the distressed parrot off as a prize. Her recent religious training came to her assistance, as at the top of her voice she shrieked: "O Lord, save me! O Lord, save me!" The hawk became so terrified at the unexpected cry that he dropped his intended dinner and soared away in the distance.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERBS

All About a Little Bird.

It was not in the blooming May,
It was not in the dimly spring,
But deep in the leaden gray
Of the new year's bitterest day,
That a sweet little bird that had lost her way,
A tiny feathery thing,
Lightly perched on my heart's bare spray
(Poor little bird, she had lost her way!)
And folded her downy wing,
And chirruped and sang on my heart's best spray,
Folding her soft wee wing.

Sitting alone and apart
Her notes rang clear and keen,
And lo! with a strange sweet start,
An exquisite shuddering smart,
Each unborn bud in my frozen heart,
Pent in its deep unseen,
Flashed to the light a quivering dart
(Each yearning bud in my frozen heart)
And thrilled into poignant green;
And now she nests in my leafy heart,
Embowered in the shadowy green.
F. LANGBRIDGE, in Good Words.

Opportunity.

How brightly on the morn it lies,
Purple monarch in disguise!
Hail him, crown him; if you wait
'Twill for ever be too late.

Youth, by May's enchantment led,
Dreams of rosier days ahead;
But only he who fronts the hour
Carves the spiral path to power.

Maiden with the pretty face,
All the world admires your grace,
Form, and sweetness, Bright Blue-eyes,
Put no trust in by and bys.

When the silver summons calls,
Stoutly speak—'tis Fate befalls;
One moment turns each golden door,
And then it shuts for evermore.
JOEL BENTON, in Scribner.

Love's Promise.

"I will come back," Love cried, "I will come back."
And there where he had passed lay one bright track
Dreamlike and golden, as the moonlit sea,
Between the pine woods' shadow tall and black.
"I will come back," Love cried. Ah me!
Love will come back.

He will come back. Yet, Love, I wait, I wait;
Though it is evening now, and cold and late,
And I am weary watching here so long,
A pale, sad watcher at a silent gate,
For Love who is so fair and swift and strong,
I wait, I wait.

He will come back—come back, though he delays;
He will come back, for in old years and days
He was my playmate. He will not forget.
Though he may linger long amid new ways,
He will bring back, with barren sweet regret,
Old years and days.

Hush! On the lonely hills Love comes again,
But his young feet are marked with many a stain.
The golden haze has passed from his fair brow,
And round him clings the blood-red robe of pain;
And it is night, O Love! Love! enter now.
Remain, remain.

—Macmillan's Magazine.

Ferns.

As oft the pictured scene upon the walls
Brings back to mind scenes dearer and more fair—
As, heard at night, some simple, plaintive air
Awakes a chord we thought beyond recall—
So do ye bring, O dainty, feathery ferns!
The summer's vanished glory to my room.
Again the violets bud, the harebells bloom;
Again for me the scarlet maple burns
In leaf-strewn woods; once more I softly tread
The fragrant piny paths, or down moist dells
I wander, where a faint, fine odor tells
Your fairy fronds are near. . . . The dream has fled;
But still your sweetness stays. Oh, who would grieve
To die so sweetly, and such sweetness leave?
E. S. F., in Lippincott.

Song.

The fire-light listens on the floor
To hear the wild winds blow;
Within, the bursting storms burn;
Without, there slides the snow.

Across the floor I see the flake
Pass, mirrored, mystic, slow.
Oh, blooms and storm must blush and freeze,
While seasons come and go!

I lift the sash—and live, the gale
Comes leaping to my call.
The rose is but a painted one
That hangs upon the wall.

—Harper's Magazine for February.

On an Etruscan Tomb.

On thy rough sides, O cinerary urn!
Two thousand years and more these warriors fight—
One lifts the shield, and one the sword to smite.
The end it is not given us to discern,
Nor yet the purport of that strife to learn.

Scorn not my reading, terrible if true;
All life is such a battle, until the Night
Falls, and ephemeral heats to ashes burn.

Lo! on the lid—wrapt closely to the chin
In the long sheet, arms limp upon the breast,
Head drooped and turned—a form of perfect rest!
Strewn to the winds the dust that lay herein,
Yet, on this sepulchre, the Etruscan faith
Carved unmistakably a Sleep—not Death.—Catholic World.

The dignified Chan Lan Pin, Chinese Ambassador, wore at the White House reception, the other day, an undershirt of maroon silk, with an overdress of dark brocade, the texture of which was brightened by a mixture of gold thread. This gorgeous dress was completed by a fur-lined silk overgarment, a basin-shaped hat, and an able, diplomatic expression upon his wise and handsome face.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1879.

THE TWO GRANTS.

There are no two persons who have filled a more brilliant page in the history of the American people than the two Grants. One, distinguished for his military genius, ranks among the great historic names that will go down to posterity enrolled among those illustrious ones who have nobly served their country on battle-fields, where hung the nation's destiny. The other will be regarded with the kindly sentiment that excuses a great failure in recollection of honest intention and honest endeavor. General Grant's name will live an honored one in the memory of all loyal men, and no impartial historian can write the annals of the American Republic without emblazoning its pages with the grand achievements of this great and successful military leader. President Grant's name will follow down after the immortal ones who have been Presidents. His administration, interpreted in the light of his own achievements, without the borrowed glare of the other's military fame, will be but a dull chapter in comparison with that more brilliant one that tells the reader why he became Chief Magistrate of the Republic. General Grant sprang from obscure life. His antecedents are full of romantic incidents. He was the tanner's apprentice, the man of the Stanislaus ferry, the wood-hauler of the Missouri. He had passed through adversities; he had been tried in the fire of an adverse experience. President Grant sprang into life like Minerva from the head of Jupiter, full-grown, full-panoplied in the military armor. General Grant, obscure, unknown, untried, fought his way through bloody paths to fame; won his reputation by grand achievements on the battle-field, till he culminated the nation's idol, its hero, its saviour, its third Washington, Lincoln standing ever foremost. President Grant was called to the executive office from the army after he had attained its head. He was asked to serve his country after he had served it. He came into political power with a prestige of military success—with a halo around his brow. Of General Grant little was expected—nothing was prophesied; so that when he added victory to victory, achievement to achievement, beat down rebel armies, bisected the Southern Confederacy, environed Richmond with a circle of iron, thundered his cannon in the Wilderness, and hammered the rebellion down by the unflinching and bloody obstinacy of resolute and unrelenting attack, he struck the nation with a great surprise.

We shall never forget—it would be an ungrateful republic that could forget—General Grant's distinguished and meritorious service. He deservedly fills a distinguished and honored position in American annals. Of General Grant we entertain only the feelings of profoundest regard and most patriotic love. We honor his name, and look upon his military achievements as entitling him to rank among the foremost names in the world's history. President Grant presents himself to our consideration in an altogether different aspect. He became President when he knew that he possessed none of the qualities that adorn statesmen. He came to the Presidential office in absolute ignorance of everything that would have given to his administration assurance of probable success. Honest purpose we do not deny him; but he possessed none of those qualifications of mind or habits of thought that could enable him to conduct the civil administration of a people discordant, disaffected, bleeding from the unclosed wounds of civil strife, States withdrawn from the Union, a treasury overtaxed with debt. He was ignorant of law, unacquainted with civil administration; had the soldier's contempt for civilians, whom he called politicians, and undertook to administer the affairs of a great nation as he would those of a great army. He undertook, without the aid of the statesmen of the nation, to choose a cabinet, and thought to run the Government in contempt of the opinions of eminent civilians who had the capacity to direct national affairs and who were entitled to have been called in as advisers. His first cabinet was a blunder which none but a soldier could make. His nomination of Stewart as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States was made in ignorance of law and in violation of a principle that underlay the law. His selection of cabinet officers was not more unfortunate than his selection of party friends. Having struck all the statesmen of his party in the face with a first rude blow, he was compelled to seek from inferior material his political and party advisers. As a result of the mortification of early mistakes, by means of which he alienated from him the better men of the Republican party, he was compelled to call around him a meaner element. Unwilling to follow where the policy of Lincoln led to amnesty, reconciliation, and generosity to the South, he inaugurated there a reign of military power, and attempted to build a permanent party structure upon the social and financial ruin of a great people. He was reflected to position by reason of disfranchised communities, political chaos in Southern States, the menace of future disturbances, and the fear that among the bloody ashes and black embers of a quenched rebellion there might be sparks that could be fanned into another conflagration. His second administration was less reputable than the first. A continually changing cabinet was changing for the worse. A senatorial oligarchy, drunk with power, became more and more audacious; party thieves, emboldened by Presidential support, became more bold; felons, who deserved the penitentiary, wriggled themselves to the foot of the Republican throne and claimed and received the protection of its shadow. Over personal friends who were caught thieving, President Grant threw the shield of his great and honored name. To rogues and rascals, laden with the loot of official plunder, he gave the sanction of his personal protection. His fidelity to his rascally friends seemed almost a virtue, it was so heroic. And all this time no one questions the integrity of President Grant; no one believes that any plunder of rings or stain of party conspiracies attaches to him; no one doubts his honesty of purpose or his patriotism. Every American who loves his native land, and is not blinded by passion and prejudice, delights to know that General Grant has been honored abroad. It was a tribute paid to his military achievements. It was in recognition of his greatness as a military leader.

If the United States of America were again disturbed by intestine strife, or threatened by foreign invasion; if again it should become necessary to marshal great armies in defense of the nation's life, we should with one accord ask this most distinguished captain of modern times to lead our armies again to the field of war. We should repose ourselves in confidence on his great ability, and rest under the assurance of his tried patriotism. If, as we believe and hope, our empire of the future is peace at home and with all the world, we would make him the honored recipient of the nation's bounty; we would make his advancing years secure in the nation's generosity. He should live in the affections of a country he has so well served. But for our next President we demand a civilian, a statesman, one trained to civil service. We ask for something better than we have had since the death of Lincoln, and assuredly there must be some one among the living Americans capable of filling the executive chair with a broader intelligence than any since his death. If, then, General Grant is not the ablest and the best man in the nation for the Presidential office, is it becoming to the national dignity, or is it essential to the party welfare, that he should be nominated upon the ground of availability? Are there not higher than mere party questions in the choice of a chief magistrate? Has the Republican party reached that low estate that it must seek for a candidate only because he is popular? Is it the Republican party, representing the intelligence and the wealth of the nation, that shall inaugurate the era of advancing a military man to the chief magistracy of the republic, in defiance of all national traditions, simply because he is the representative of force and military power? Is it becoming for this great party of moral ideas to be the first to implore protection from the military arm, and advance the mere soldier over the statesmen of the nation? Shall the future historian of the Republic be compelled to admit that it was this class that deliberately elected to change from the Republic to the Empire? that it was the scholars, the thinkers, and the brain workers that proclaimed Augustus? Is it to the wealth and property owners that first occurs the idea of intrusting the guardianship and protection of property to the pretorian guard of office-holders and office-seekers, and giving them the right to name the ruler?

There are two classes of people who desire to make General Grant the third time President of the Republic: The old pretorian band of official thieves who surrounded him when in the Presidential office before, who, by his advancement, hope to retain place or gain office. The ring plunderers, the contractors, jobbers, camp followers, and all that vast army of party tramps and political mendicants which the war threw upon the State, and that other timid, trembling, fearful class which styles itself conservative because it has property to lose. The upper and the lower strata of society—bankers, holders of corporation stock, monopolists, usurers, the great, greedy, voluptuous money-getters and land-grabbers, the active bandits of the business highway, and the retired robbers, who are anxious only to preserve their ill-gotten wealth. These two extremes of society meet for once and strike palms upon the proposition to give us a "strong government." For the first time we are hearing this prayer for King Stork. It is a dangerous sign, this asking for a military chieftain in a time of peace. It is not the clamor of a thoughtless mob, as in the times of Harrison and Taylor. It is not the grateful outpouring of national enthusiasm, as in the time of Grant's election. It is not a mere party slogan to catch votes, as for the heroes of New Orleans, Lundy's Lane, Tippecanoe, Chapultepec, and the Wilderness, but the calm and deliberate demand of two powerful classes to give them a chief magistrate, who, in the event of organized discontent against the thieves in office, will appeal to the sword to subdue it; in the interest of the thieves themselves, and in the interest of a conservatism that regards even reform as a dangerous change. We do not believe the time has yet come when it is wise to admit that all the evils of the country may not be remedied by an honest and intelligent administration of our political affairs by wise and prudent statesmen. We do not think the time is ripe to ask for the intervention of military power. We do not conceive that our condition is sufficiently desperate to invoke the assistance of a military chieftain in the administration of our civil affairs; and, because, in our judgment, that day has not yet arrived, we would not divide the North and South—the people—upon the issues involved in breaking down the two-term tradition of the Presidential office in order to elevate General Grant to the Presidency for the third term. We have had two Grants—the General, whom we admire; the President, whose administration we did not admire. Let us not have another combining the military genius of the one with the ambition of the other. Rome was a republic three hundred years before it had a Cæsar. We can wait for our Augustan age.

It was John the Baptist, we believe, who cried aloud in the wilderness; John, with camel's hair and a girdle of a skin about his loins, feeding upon locusts and wild honey. This John, of scanty raiment, poor diet, and strong lungs, was the forerunner of the coming Messiah. Perhaps Denis Kearney, who came riding upon a dray, is the precursor of a great municipal millennium. Perhaps his crying aloud in the wilderness of politics will avail to stir the hearts of tax-payers that they will make some effort at reform. Denis occasionally voices a great truth. It would be surprising if one who talks so much should not occasionally give forth a sane utterance. So far as he scolds against municipal extravagance and exorbitant salaries he echoes the opinions of a large class of intelligent tax-payers. Our city government is upon an extravagant scale of expenditure. There is no single officer in the city government that is not too highly paid. The estimate of the value of a man's service is what equal talent can be obtained for. The labors performed by a judge, city official, or clerk have a market value, and is an article of merchandise governed by the law of supply and demand. That all salaries are too high is evidenced by the struggle that is made to acquire them, and the other significant fact that a salaried official never resigns. If all the judges were to resign to-day their places can be filled to-morrow with equal talent, average integrity, and superior industry at less compensation. If a cordon was drawn around the City Hall, each official asked to walk out that would not submit to a reduction of twenty-five per cent., not one would step over the line. If forty per cent. were to be deducted there would not be five resignations. There are scores of young men in salaried places at $750 per month that could be better filled by young women at half the money. There are a great many idlers and superfluous people in the pay of the city. There are a great many who are unfitted for their positions and really earn nothing. The Street Department is a wretched fraud. A reasonable number of licensed highwaymen, authorized to garrote citizens, would be a less offensive and less expensive system than the Street Department as at present administered. The courts with their costly and vexatious machinery, their delays and hinderances of justice, their exactions for jury duty, long and useless pleas of half-educated attorneys, ought to be, and could be, remodeled if there were no lawyers in the Constitutional Convention, and substantial justice could be administered in a more expeditious, better, and economical manner. Our school system is extravagant and unreasonable, and an utter departure from its original design. It is less an educational than a political institution. Of the average boards of education more than half the members have been ignorant foreigners or demagogue politicians. It is run as a party machine. It does not properly educate the children of the poor in the rudimentary elements of an English education. Its expenditure for ornamental branches, for cosmopolitan and higher schools, for teaching dead and modern languages, is a gross and inexcusable outrage upon tax-payers, defensible upon no hypothesis of common sense or common justice. Hence, we say to Denis, howl on; some good may come of it.

AFTERMATH.

The latest immigration from Ireland is beginning to agitate itself to bring about the annual Irish parade in honor of that hypothetical saint who was not born in Ireland, and whose name was not Patrick. The harp of Erin, the banner of the shamrock, and all the pictures of St. Patrick and the Pope will be reproduced as usual in our streets on the 17th of March. Who shall be the marshal, orator, and poet?—who shall ride on horseback and who go on foot?—are now serious questions disturbing the Celtic heart. There will be very few representative Irish gentlemen in this procession following the badly-executed picture of a mythical saint. There will be few American-born sons of Irish parentage who, by their presence, will contribute to keep alive what seems to us to be the most absurd and preposterous festival that is celebrated on American soil. If the Catholic clergy had its way they would be very glad to suppress so indecorous an observance. If intelligent men of Irish birth could regulate this ceremony, it would be either abolished or relegated to the interior of the Cathedral, where it belongs. Thank God for one thing: the time has gone by when the Democratic party looks to St. Patrick's procession as a nominating convention for city officers. The world moves.

Senator Christiancy of Michigan is the man who married a young maiden from the Treasury Department—January and June, December and July; they won't mix—so for domestic reasons, and for the benefit of his health, the Senator asks to be sent as Minister to Peru. The Administration assents, the Senate confirms the appointment, and the somewhat notorious Zach. Chandler is sent back to Washington in Christiancy's place. If the traveler from New Zealand should ever sit upon the ruined bridge over Goose Creek, on Pennsylvania Avenue, to sketch the ruins of the Republic, he should picture treasury girls weeping over the broken arches of the Senate Chamber because there are no more nice old Senators to capture. This would be an historic picture for more than the Camerons and Christiancys.

It costs from £5,000 to £50,000 to manage a parliamentary election in England, and yet our British cousins bewail the condition of our election system, and kindly suggest that it leads to the unfaithful performance of official duties. There are some six hundred members of Parliament. At an average of say £10,000 each, the cost of an election aggregates £6,000,000, and such is the integrity of this great legislative body that no one ever makes a penny out of his position, as there is neither per diem nor mileage attached.

The Reverend Father Buchard, for whom we have great respect, because he is broad, earnest, eloquent, and was one of the first to indorse our views upon the Chinese question, delivered a lecture at St. Ignatius Church, on Thursday evening. He attempted to prove, and did prove to his own satisfaction, that Catholic priests have the right to remit sins. Thus: Christ said to his apostles, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven, and whose sins ye shall retain, they are retained." As we interpret this power of attorney it contains no power of substitution, by the terms of which the present Catholic clergy—even admitting the doctrine of apostolic succession—are authorized to forgive sins. He also proved the existence of purgatory, and we congratulate the Reverend Father Buchard's congregation upon the fact. We do not often indulge ourselves in theological reflections, but are anxious to set the Catholic Church right upon this important doctrine of the remission of sins. That it is now wrong is evidenced by the fact, that in the long race of nineteen centuries in which the Catholic clergy have been remitting and the wicked committing sins, the bishops and priests are far behind, and the gates of hell have prevailed against the church which Peter built upon his rock.

In the sombre picture of the Smith divorce matter there is a touch of light: Mr. William M. Neilson ambles into the discussion and raises "a question of veracity" between Dr. Smith and himself—Neilson! Mr. Neilson is the humorist of the discussion, and his ludicrous intrusion ought to make the whole dispute immortal in the annals of comic literature. "Thou wilt forgive him, Father, wilt thou not?"

The following is extracted from the letter of a model father in Sacramento to his son in this city: "No matter, my son, how immoral your life, endeavor always to keep your mind clear as to the distinctions between right and wrong conduct, in order that your censure of immorality in others may be justly awarded and deferentially received."

The second marriage of King Alphonso (with the sister of his deceased wife) is "postponed," the newspapers explain, owing to the affection of the lady being already engaged by a less exalted aspirant to her hand. As this "match" was altogether made by the newspapers it might have been expected that they would have been indignant at its breaking off, and their forbearance under the disappointing circumstances is highly commendable. They had, of course, to let themselves down as easily as possible, and "postponed" is a tolerably good word, while the explanation that the lady had a "previous engagement" is frankness itself. It was their duty to have known about the previous engagement before making the match. This kind of veiled retraction is rather like that of the editor, who, having stated that a certain well-known gentleman had been mortally shot, and being afterward assured by him in person that he had not even been fired at, generously consented to correct the statement, and in his next issue expressed the hope that, with good surgical attention and careful nursing, the gentleman would recover.

In a recent number of the Illustrated London News Mr. Simpson, the artist, has a sketch of a bivouac in the Khyber Pass, and among the figures is himself, sound asleep! Pointing this out to a friend, the writer of this paragraph remarked that the artist could hardly have made the drawing from life. "Certainly not," said he, "but is it any the worse for being drawn from memory?"

Speaking of pictures—science has pitilessly laid its "effacing fingers" on them, and "swept the lines where beauty lingers." Having tumbled religion in the dust, the dreadful thing is footing it fealty after art, with whose blood it will soon incarnadine the arena. Mr. Norman Lockyer has recently taken the pains to calculate the height of the mountains in a collection of landscapes by famous painters. In one picture the principal peak lifted its lordly head to the breezy altitude of one hundred and five miles, while about its feet clustered a number of minor eminences varying in elevation from ten to forty miles.

This Mr. Norman Lockyer, by the way, is the worst iconoclast of the scientific lot. It was he who, finding no more worlds to conquer, recently turned his victorious arms against science itself, and selecting chemistry as his point of attack, resolved all the elements into hydrogen before they could make a defense—just as a general levels all distinctions of rank among his enemies by making them prisoners. Now that science, like a spiteful snake, has taken to hating itself, its wounded and cowering victims may possibly take heart, and pulling themselves together get off with their lives.

We congratulate Mr. Kearney—Mr. President Kearney—upon a new acquisition: The Call has renewed its allegiance; the Bulletin and Stock Exchange have given in their adhesion. If the devil could obtain leave of absence to visit San Francisco, the daily journals would all indorse and eulogize him to obtain an advertisement or increase their circulation in his dominions. The Call and Bulletin would overlook all the other faults of his Satanic Majesty by reason of his soundness upon the water question. The Chronicle would interview him, and for a sensational article would indorse the broad road that leadeth to destruction in opposition to Stanford's railroad. The Exchange would underwrite him for a column of delinquent assessments upon his sulphur mine; and if there was a probability that he could become Dictator they would all give in their allegiance to him. It is all one to the journals we have named whether the devil or Denis Kearney obtains control, so that they get advertisements, circulation, and the opportunity to abuse each other.

There is great distress among the working people of Lancashire in England. Only £75,000 have as yet been collected toward the Liverpool Bishopric fund. There is to be a fresh canvass of the diocese to raise an additional amount of £25,000. It would be such an alleviation of the prevailing distress to obtain £100,000 toward the support of the church, and thus give to the suffering poor of that locality all the relief that would necessarily follow the fact of having a bishop pray for them. "And the Son of Man had not where to lay his head."

According to the Detroit Evening News only one man ever successfully resisted temptation. That must have been some fellow who virtuously refrained from offering a sufficient inducement to land his man.

The most terrible news comes to us of the existence of the plague in Russia. This recalls the fearful ravages of the Black Death of the Middle Ages. This disease has so alarmed the Russian authorities that they have endeavored to resist it by the military arm. They have established a sanitary cordon one thousand miles long, and are burning towns, villages, and clothing where it has existed. The German and Austrian governments have also taken active precautionary measures to prevent its spread. It advances faster than the march of an army, carrying off its victims in from four to ten hours, killing ninety-five per cent. of those whom it attacks, and literally desolating the country to which it extends. So far, it defies medical skill.

This Black Death is a fearful possibility to Europe, and should the dreadful scourge obtain headway it might prove to be a cataclysm like that which at various epochs of the world's history has swept races from existence. Should it visit our Eastern States, the first duty of California and Nevada will be to quarantine it by inhibiting the passage of trains on the Central Pacific Railroad. If it threatens to come from China and Japan, we must seal our ports to all commerce. If it comes to California, we must all run away to the hot, dry deserts of Arizona, where it can never make headway; at least, it never has done so in a climate and country of that character. It is a very remote possibility that the plague or any kindred epidemic can ever cross the plains and mountains that divide us from the Mississippi; all our conditions of location, climate, and character of people forbid the belief that such a visitation is possible to the Pacific Coast.

We observe with pleasure that Mrs. Theresa Corlett, with admirable good humor, has passed her literary scalping-knife under the hair of that insufferable scold, our Prattler, and nailed the reeking trophy to the Post. We congratulate the lady on her improved temper and more effective novum organum. This is a good deal better than storming the ARGONAUT office like a forlorn hope, and leaving innocent editors twisting about the floor in a cat-fit of terror.

A royal wedding will occur in England on the 13th of March. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught will spend their honeymoon at Claremont or Osborne. The Queen, having sown her children, is harvesting a crop of grandchildren, and last month was presented with a great-granddaughter, to whom her majesty may look with reasonable hope for a great-great-grandchild. No lack of heirs to the English throne is likely to embarrass the succession in our day.

In choosing for the subject of a Wednesday evening lecture "The Holy Land," Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard is believed to have committed an error of judgment. That is the evening for the regular weekly prayer meetings in all the churches; and it is the church people who are principally interested in the Holy Land. Mr. Stoddard ought to have known that no truly pious persons would come to him for instruction when they had an opportunity to themselves instruct the Deity.

We hear Mr. Stoddard's lectures very highly commended by those who attended them. We did not go because Wednesday evening was prayer-meeting time, and Thursday evening we always keep sacred, for a Thursday evening may possibly be the last we shall spend on earth. This afternoon and evening we shall be there, and hope to see all the readers of the ARGONAUT that can get in the hall, for aside from the interest of the lectures they have the merit that their proceeds are devoted to two very deserving charities, of which the Youths' Directory is one.

We observe that the Bulletin has begun to write "Mr. Kearney," and "President Kearney;" and we also observe that Kearney introduces resolutions against the Water Company, evidently prepared in the Bulletin office, and styles the men who monopolize water as "hell-born" and "hell-bound thieves." Now, if anybody in the world is justified in stealing water it is the person who is hell-born and hell-bound. Even John the Baptist would approve that proposition.

If our good friend of the Post does not wish to concede the mental poverty of his poets why does he bodily steal from our columns Mr. Sam Davis' verses, "The Devil Fishing?" His friendly forbearance in not giving the usual credit to this paper is gratefully enough appreciated, we hope, but it was pretty hard on Mr. Davis to attach his name. It can't be very agreeable to him to have it thought that he writes for the Post.

The Chronicle also "improved the occasion" by a precisely similar stab at Mr. Davis, and its crime was the more offensive of the two, for a thing of that kind done by it has the double malevolence of hurting a writer's social reputation as well as his literary. But maybe Sam doesn't mind that.

Having in mind that the following was written by Mr. Pickering, in grave forgetfulness of his relation to the Chinese question, the reader will hardly fail to make a ludicrous application of the remark: "A good many communities look upon all new-comers as little better than tramps. Exceptions may be made in favor of great wealth and distinction, but in the cases of new-comers who come to better their condition, the native, though perhaps a person of no consequence himself, rather looks down upon them. This," Mr. Pickering truly adds, "is not always based on a correct appreciation of respective intelligence." We should say not!

An honest confession is good for the soul, and Mr. Stanley Matthews feels like a new man since acknowledging in the frankest and most contrite manner that his protection and patronage of Jim Anderson were dictated by the purest and most patriotic motives. Such candor as this is extremely rare in politics.

In the bright lexicon of youth there's no such word as fail, but it is emblazoned in letters an inch long in the bright lexicon of the married man who has attempted to impress his wife with a sense of the beauty of another and younger woman.

ALVERSON'S VALENTINE.

It was February 13th, late in the day, and Cupid's carnival drew near. There was an unusual bustle about the post-office, and people jostled each other at the door, looking eager as they entered and triumphant when they came out. It had been raining cherubs, doves, hearts, darts, and poetry down into the letter basket of the office for the last hour; Cupids blind-folded and Cupids with naked eyes, Cupids as archers and as letter-carriers, and the dainty little god flying about in a primitive state of nudity, displaying his baby dimples, adorned the embossed and scented envelopes that came pouring in to bother poor Griggsby, the clerk. He, indeed, had trouble enough already, for he was in love—fondly, madly in love with Julia Drason.

"This is from Alverson," said he, picking up the last note and looking through the window to see who dropped it. "So he's writing to Miss Sparling; and this one addressed to him, which has on it a pencil sketch of a baby floating down a river in a sea shell, must be from her," said Griggsby, looking at the two valentines. "Well," he continued, talking to himself, "if rich valley ranches, plenty of dividend-paying stocks, fine houses, horses, and Chinamen for servants can bring happiness they will find it, but give me Julia in a garret and—"

"See here, Griggy," shouted a clerk, "don't fool around there, but hustle the valentines along, or else we shall get left. All the idiots on the coast seem to have broken loose into poetry, and they have done it up into such odd-shaped envelopes that I can't handle or distribute them worth a cent!"

Griggsby emptied the basket upon the distributing table and worked away in moody silence, putting the missives in their pigeon-holes, and looking in vain for a letter from Julia. But she was too kind-hearted to wound her admirer by ridiculing his love in a valentine, and she would not foster hope by words of encouragement.

"Griggy," said the clerk, "I saw somebody on the street to-day, and I believe she's the handsomest woman I ever looked at—a regular masquerade."

"A friend of yours?" asked Griggsby, coolly.

"A friend of yours," replied the clerk. It was, in fact, Julia Drason, as both of these young gentlemen very well knew, but Griggsby refused to be entrapped into any expressions on the subject. It was near midnight when he reached his home and stole softly up to bed, to sleep and dream of fairyland.

It was early dawn when he awoke on the 14th. Remembering the saying, that one is destined to wed within a year the first unmarried person seen on the morning of Valentine's Day, he took from under his pillow a photograph, and looked at it for a long time. It was very beautiful, and he lay there building air-castles until the eastern sky began to show faint rosy streaks of light upon the fleecy clouds.

On getting up and approaching the window, he was surprised to see a basket hanging to the door-knob of Alverson's house, a large mansion across the way. There was no one in the street, no smoke coming from the chimney, no curtains drawn up; but all was silent and the house seemed fast asleep. While he looked, wondering what the basket contained, he saw the cloth stir, and then a chubby little hand became visible.

"Why, this is an event," said Griggsby, "a regular episode; something that we hear about and seldom see," he continued, as he hurried on his clothes.

Looking out again he saw Alverson, in his dressing-gown, standing at an upper window, looking over the roofs of the opposite houses at the sky. He could not see the basket on his own front door, and Griggsby thought he would inform him that he had a valentine that needed attention. He glided down stairs quietly and crossed the street. Alverson had disappeared from the window, and no one was visible as Griggsby approached the door. Pulling aside the cloth he saw a beautiful baby, about six months old, wide awake and trying to breakfast on its little fist. He glanced up at the opposite window and thought he saw a white face suddenly disappear. He wondered if he could possibly be mistaken. Then he turned and rang the bell, but instead of waiting until the door opened, as he had at first intended, he walked rapidly around the corner. Returning in a few minutes he saw that the basket had disappeared, and was satisfied that the baby had been taken into the Alverson mansion. As a matter of fact, it may be stated that the little well-spring of joy was at that moment sending forth cries of hunger that filled Alverson's soul with surprise and consternation. When Griggsby returned from the office at noon he looked across the way and saw, through the broad bay window, that the baby was in quiet possession.

That afternoon Alverson came out of his front door, and down the great stone steps, dressed in the latest fashion. He was a bachelor, born to good luck, and this house, with much wealth, had been left to him as the sole survivor of a proud family. Handsome, educated, rich, fond of books, and a patron of art, his acquaintance was sought in society. The parents of eligible daughters, aided by the fascinating fair ones themselves, had planned campaigns to capture him, and gain possession of the mansion. But they had all failed until the baby arrived. Since then Alverson had seriously considered the danger he was in, for he was convinced that unless he could get the baby out of the house, he must certainly get a wife to care for it. There was no doubt about that, and he thought it much the best way to get the baby out. But how was it to be done? He did not like foundling hospitals—that is, he had repeatedly told Miss Sparling so; while she, being wealthy and charitable, had taken great interest in them. It occurred to Alverson that in sending him the sketch of a baby floating on a shell, followed by a real baby in a basket, some one intended to test his sincerity concerning foundling hospitals, and was attempting to play a practical joke upon him. He had by this time reached the neighborhood where he expected to settle all doubts on the subject—the home of Miss Sparling. The house was in the centre of a lovely lawn; freshened by late rains, and brightened by clusters of calla lilies, which were as stately and statuesque among flowers as Miss Sparling was when surrounded by her associates. The walk was bordered by English violets and groups of budding roses, and Alverson's heart beat quicker as he approached the central figure of all this loveliness.

Miss Sparling's eyes, always bright, sparkled with unusual emotion. "I should have called this morning had I intended to be your Valentine," said Alverson, smiling.

"Though I did not, before retiring last night, take the yolk from a hard-boiled egg, then fill the space with salt and eat it, shell and all," said she, laughing, "as was done in old times to induce dreams, I confess that I looked out of the window earlier than usual this morning."

"Did you behold your destiny? Who was the lucky man?" asked Alverson.

"Oh, that fascinating Fancher, of course. His face shines upon us so often that the street would look lonely without him."

"Did he come from the direction of my house, and does he ever indulge in practical jokes?" he asked, looking at her very closely.

"He came from your direction, but I never heard that he was a joker," she replied.

"I asked," said Alverson, "because I was made the victim of a practical joke this morning."

"I have not heard of it. Something appropriate to the season and connected with St. Valentine's Day, I suppose?" said Kate.

"Well, yes; it is appropriate to all seasons, I guess," said Alverson, a little puzzled just how to act his part so as to escape gracefully in case he was mistaken in supposing that Miss Sparling knew something about his valentine. "I am willing to admit that the scheme was well planned and executed, and that no one has been able to detect the authors; and now, if they will take it back again, I will contribute to a charitable institution any sum they may name."

Kate's eyes grew wide with wonder as she listened. "Take what back?" she asked.

"Take the valentine—the little baby."

"Why, does the little thing trouble you so much as that?" said she, laughing and blushing, as she thought of the picture of a baby in the sea-shell which she had sketched.

"It don't trouble me so much, only I'm afraid it may die, or that something will happen to the child unless a lady adopts it," he replied.

"I do not understand," said Kate. "I thought you spoke of the picture of a baby in a shell."

"No; the birdling has been out of its shell this six months," said Alverson. "I tell you, it's a live baby."

"A live baby!" she ejaculated.

"A real, dimpled, demonstrative, hungry baby," he continued, with a slight air of desperation. "It was left in a basket at my front door early this morning; and as you were one of the committee visiting that little family of foundlings I thought you would know if anyone had borrowed a baby and sent over to me to see what I would do."

"I'm astonished," said Kate. "I never dreamed of such a thing. The foundlings are never loaned for any purpose. Was there no clue—no note?"

"Yes, to the dress was pinned a paper, on which was written: 'Ich bin dein!' As it has been intrusted to me, I consider it a high compliment that any one considered me too humane to let the little thing suffer; but my house is not the place for it. What a bright ray of sunshine she would be in your home," said he, looking about the room.

"But I have always thought I would not adopt a foundling," said Kate. "We can not tell what it may do after years of training, and we have not that affection for adopted children that we must feel for our own flesh and blood."

"My observations," replied Alverson, "have led me to believe that adopted children are usually happy, and on many of them much affection is bestowed. An adopted child is usually fatherless, or the child of misfortune, and therefore attracts sympathy which is not felt for the more favored. It is regarded as one providentially delivered to the hands of its protectors, as under the care of a guardian angel; and while I am not an advocate of the theory that love comes after marriage, I believe that affection for a child intensifies after adoption. When I think how easy it is to brighten up a house with the prattle of children whose natural guardians would be glad to give them away, I am surprised that so many homes are childless and gloomy."

"Bravo!" said Kate. "One would think you were the head of an orphan's home, or had a house full of children! Yet I think we love our own best."

"But this would be your own, when it grew up, all but about twelve pounds," said Alverson, quickly.

"In mere weight this is so; but its heart and brain are already formed," she replied.

"Its heart is but a bud. It would expand, blossom, and bear fruit under your care; and the brain is like a blank sheet of paper—you can direct what record shall be made upon it," he replied.

But there had been a very deep record made upon her brain on this subject, and he could not move her with persuasive words, so he returned to his house and the contemplation of the baby. It occurred to him, while he sat by the fire looking at the mute, sweet face of the sleeping child, that his own house was the best place for the little one at present, and that what it needed was a nurse.

Having communicated his views to the housekeeper, that dignified personage expressed her dissent in plain terms. She did not want to start a foundling home; but finding him resolute she dispatched a messenger to Mrs. Griggsby's. That excellent woman, after a long consultation, recommended Mrs. Cardigan. But she was old and fond of gin, and had a family, and a brother who had a family, and they were constantly visiting Mrs. Cardigan on trivial errands when she had a good place, making her presence a source of annoyance. Mrs. Cardigan would not do. Finally, the happy thought occurred to both that Julia Drason was just the one, if she could be induced to accept the position.

Alverson said that he would pay liberally for a good nurse, and Julia was duly installed. Thereupon, young Griggsby took the deepest interest in the little valentine. He bought it rattles, whistles, jumping-jacks, and complicated toys made for larger children, much to the annoyance of Julia Drason, who was afraid it would swallow the green paint or punch its eyes out. She was a most devoted nurse, and little Miss Valentine soon refused to take her food unless Julia held the spoon, a real good one, bought by its nurse as a present. Such a dainty spoon, just suited to the little mouth that looked like Cupid's bow, and the dimples in her chin when she laughed were pronounced too cunning for anything. Alverson said so, and he was not sentimental. At first, he was very anxious to find out the name of the baby. He hired the police to hunt, and left no means untried; but after a time he was silent on the subject, and feared he would learn some unpleasant facts. Finally, he began to be troubled at the thought that some one might come and claim her. He had grown so fond of the little one that he carried her up stairs and down, and watched her with unspeakable delight.

Miss Sparling had become interested also. She thought it had improved so much in the society of Mr. Alverson that it was extremely fortunate that he had not sent it away. In less than six months Alverson's valentine was the wonder and consolation of the neighborhood, and Alverson thought it best to live in ignorance of her parentage, to consider her the gift of St. Valentine; and Julia Drason began to dread the presence of visitors. She always clasped the little one closer when she saw Miss Sparling coming. At last St. Valentine's Day approached again, and evidently something was going to happen at Alverson's. No one knew exactly what, or whether the Saint would make a revelation, or come and claim his own. There would be anguish there, and moist eyes in many houses on the street, if the little one were called home. But the scarlet fever in its worst form had invaded many households, and Alverson, with all his money, could not keep it away.

The baby fell sick; it sank rapidly. Julia Drason bent over its crib and watched its face through her blinding tears. Alverson had never before looked upon a scene like this. He could not sleep. The vision of the beautiful and sorrowing was constantly before him.

The child grew worse; there was a season of terrible suspense; then the crisis was passed; it began to recover; and when Valentine's Day came it was dressed, and Alverson sat with it by the sunny bay-window. His face wore an unusually grave expression, though it was occasionally lightened up with a smile.

The time had arrived for the revelation. He hesitated a moment as he looked out and saw Griggsby staring at him from the opposite window; then he took a valentine from his pocket, and placing it in the baby's hand, he sat it up in the crib, and walked away. The nurse, who sat there at work on some embroidery, looked up and saw that it was addressed to her. She blushed, then her heart sank as she reached out her hand, took the note, and opened it. She read the words, then caught up the baby and kissed it as the same little slip of paper fluttered down from the envelope that was pinned to the baby's dress when it was in the basket hung on the door-knob a year ago.

"Am I to have a valentine this year?" said Alverson, who had suddenly appeared again.

She stood there, silent as a Madonna, while the child reached out its little hands to him.

"Do you know whose child this is?" she asked in a sad voice.

"I know all," he replied, "except the answer to my question."

"You know that I eloped, was secretly married, and was left a widow with this little one to care for?"

"I know your sorrow, and the kindness of the good woman's heart who cared for your little one while you were working for food and trying to conceal your misfortune from your friends. I know that you left the baby with me, trusting to my humanity, and knowing that you would have charge of it. This she has told me."

"Then I not only love but reverence the noble man who has been such a friend to my precious darling," said she, looking down into its wondering face.

And this second valentine made Alverson happy for life. But it was gloomy over the way. However, since the wedding day, Griggsby has recovered his appetite, bought a flute, and is considered convalescent.

It may be a satisfaction, to those who believe in omens, to learn that the door-plate on which is engraved the name of Sparling will soon be removed to give place to one bearing the name of Fancher.

J. O. CULVER.
SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

The most "taking" things in the European papers now are anecdotes of Bismarck.

When the German lay against the Socialists was first passed, it is said that Prince Bismarck burst out with, "Now, off we go for the pig-sticking!" ("Jetzt geht die Sauhatz los"). And apparently the chase has been tolerably active, for 187 clubs and societies, and 58 periodicals, as well as 210 non-periodical publications, have been suppressed. In addition to this, 62 persons have been banished.

Bismarck was present one evening at a ball in the Kursaal at Homburg, and saw a Frenchman waltzing and holding his hat outstretched in his hand whilst he did so. It seemed a delicate joke to Bismarck to drop some copper money into the hat; but this time he had to deal with a sensitive victim, who demanded a reparation by arms. I am sorry to say that it was the Frenchman who got the worst of the duel, for Bismarck sent a bullet into his collar-bone.

Here is his opinion of Gambetta: "A man of energy, who reminds me of the fellow (der kerl) who led out a pack of dogs to hunt a buck, promising that they should have the quarry for their supper. They failed to catch the buck, and the man apologized, saying he had hoped to keep his word. 'Well, never mind,' said the dogs; 'we'll eat you instead.' And they did."

Bismarck has at least the merit of fixing the attention of the literary classes.

When Cicero was a boy did he ever throw spit-balls?—Summy. We were never on very intimate terms with Cicero in his boyhood, a little feud about a clothes-wringer that his grandmother smouched from our kitchen during an auction sale having estranged our families; but our prejudice won't permit our doing him the injustice to say that he never threw spit-balls. There were stacks of heralds and tribunes in his day, and in his hours of juvenile abstraction he probably drew what succulence he could from those knick-knacks, and then threw them as far as the walls and maps of the school-room would permit. We are not prepared to say, however, that this accomplishment was the chief cause of his greatness.

It is remarkable that persons who speculate the most boldly often conform with the most perfect quietude to the external regulations of society. The thought suffices them, without investing itself in the flesh and blood of action.

INTAGLIOS.

Songs Unsung.

Let no poet, great or small,
Say that he will sing a song;
For Song cometh, if at all,
Not because we woo it long,
But because it suits its will,
Tired at last of being still.

Every song that has been sung
Was before it took a voice
Waiting since the world was young,
For the poet of its choice.
Oh, if any waiting be,
May they come to-day to me!

I am ready to repeat
Whatsoever they impart;
Sorrow sent by them are sweet—
They know how to heal the heart—
Ay, and in the lightest strain
Something serious doth remain.

What are my white hairs, forsooth,
And the wrinkles on my brow?
I have still the soul of youth—
Try me, merry muses, now.
I can still with numbers fleet
Fill the world with dancing feet.

No, I am no longer young;
Old am I this many a year;
But my songs will yet be sung,
Though I shall not live to hear.
O my son, that is to be,
Sing my songs, and think of me!

R. H. STODDARD.

Provençal Lovers.—Aucassin and Nicolette.

Within the garden of Beaucaire
He met her by a secret stair—
The night was centuries ago—
Said Aucassin, "My love, my pet,
These old confessors vex me so!
They threaten all the pains of hell,
Unless I give you up, ma belle,"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

"Now, who should there in heaven be
To fill your place, ma tres-douce mie?
To reach that spot I little care!
There all the droning priests are met;
All the old cripples, too, are there
That unto shrines and altars cling—
To fitch the Peter-pence we bring,"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

"There are the barefoot monks and friars
With gowns, well tattered by the briers;
The saints, who lift their eyes and whine:
I like them not—a stouping set!
Who'd care with folks like these to dine?
The other road there's just as well
That you and I should take, ma belle!"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

"To purgatory I would go
With pleasant comrades whom we know—
Fair scholars, minstrels, lusty knights,
Whose deeds the land will not forget,
The captains of a hundred fights,
True men of valor and degree:
We'll join that gallant company,"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

"There, too, are jousts and joyance rare,
And beauteous ladies debonair;
The pretty dames, the merry brides,
Who with their wedded lords coquette
And have a friend or two besides—
And all in gold and trappings gay,
With furs and crests in vair and gray,"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

"Sweet players on the cithern strings
And they who roam the world like kings
Are gathered there, so blithe and free!
Pardie! I'd join them now, my pet,
If you went also, ma douce mie!
The joys of heaven I'd forego
To have you with me there below,"
Said Aucassin to Nicolette.

From "A Masque of the Poets."

From Heine.

The rose and the sunshine, the lily and dove,
I loved them all once with a rapturous love;
No more do I love them: I love one alone,
The little one, dainty one, pure one, my own;
She herself, the source of all love,
The sunshine and rose, and lily and dove.

Vino Santo.

Once I read a strange, sweet story
Of a sacred ruby wine,
Made by peasants on Lake Garda
Brewed beneath the Cross's sign.
Vino Santo, called for ever,
Sealed with seal of things divine—
Vino Santo, Holy Wine!

On the first day of October,
Only in the shining sun,
Only in the dew of morning,
Clusters lifted one by one:
Thus begins the solemn vintage,
Vintage with the Cross for sign—
Vino Santo, Holy Wine!

Pales the autumn, falls the winter,
Lie the grapes untouched and still,
No man hastes and no man hinders
While their subtle juices fill,
Till the sacred day of Christmas—
Then is brewed the Holy Wine.

Past the winter, past the spring-time,
Into summer far and late,
For the joy of Vino Santo
They who long must long and wait;
Only glowing heat can ripen,
Glowing heat and Cross's sign,
Vino Santo, Holy Wine!

Dear to-day the strange sweet story—
Sudden twinned mine and thine,
Thine and mine and all true lovers,
Sealed by seal, and signed by sign.
Silence, patience from mine's Vintage,
Drink at last in joy divine—
Vino Santo, Holy Wine!

The Valley of Silence.

Out far on the deep there are billows
That never shall break on the beach,
And I have heard songs in the silence
That never shall float into speech,
And I have had dreams in the Valley
Too lofty for language to reach.

And I have seen thoughts in the Valley—
Ah, me! how my spirit was stirred—
They wear holy veils on their faces,
Their footsteps can scarcely be heard;
They pass down the Valley like virgins
Too pure for the touch of a word.

Do you ask me the place of this Valley,
To hearts that are harrowed with care?
It lies afar between mountains' Vintage,
And God and His angels are there;
And one is the dark mount of Sorrow,
And one the bright mountain of Prayer.
FATHER RYAN.

BILLINGS,
HARBOURNE & Co.

SUCCESSORS TO

C. BEACH,

Nos. 3 and 5 Montgomery Street.

WEDDING CARDS,
PARTY INVITATIONS
AND VISITING CARDS

Engraved and printed in the latest style.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,

PURE MOCHA COFFEE,

PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,
MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS

welcome to inspect collection.

W. K. VICKERY,

22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN
all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle
machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED
SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Wilcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10
each.

LITTLE BELMONT
FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; out-houses provided with gas; gas and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armoires, billiard table, range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

CALABASAS
LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND

Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.

For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus,
or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange,
San Francisco

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors,
held on the 7th day of February, 1879, an assessment (No.
17) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel
Building, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twelfth day of March, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the first day of April, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment,
together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JOHN E. HOLMES, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan
Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the seventh day of February, 1879, an assessment (No. 37) of one dollar per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the eleventh (11th) day of March, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the thirty-first day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 18 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Wednesday, February 12th, 1879. Transfer books closed on Saturday, February 8, 1879, at 12 o'clock.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

YELLOW JACKET SILVER MINing Company.—Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada. Principal place of business, Main St.,

Gold Hill, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of said Company, held on the fifteenth day of January, A. D. 1879, an assessment (No. 31) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon each and every share of the capital stock of said Company, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of Company, Main Street, Gold Hill Nevada, or to James Newlands, Transfer Secretary, Room 10, No. 203 Bush
Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the nineteenth day of February, 1879, shall be deemed delinquent, and will be duly advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the nineteenth day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

MERCER OTEY, Secretary.

Gold Hill, Nevada, January 15, 1879.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLIcation of the Brooklyn Land Company to be disincorporated.—Notice is hereby given, that the application of the Brooklyn Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, to be disincor-

porated, has been presented and filed in the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that Monday, the 18th day of March, A. D. 1879, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, at the court-room of said court, in said City and County of San Francisco, has been fixed and appointed as the time and place for hearing the said application. THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

[SEAL.] By JOHN H. HARBNEY, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARTHA A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A.
SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bond of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk,
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

[SEAL.] SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELAN-
GER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to
MARY BELANGER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought, to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bond of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.

JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LI-
CENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LI-NUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out
of this county, but in this district, within twenty days—
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1858, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22nd day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 13, 1879.

MY DEAREST MADGE:—I suppose there is no heroine the world ever saw about whom we women have so ravishing a curiosity as Cleopatra, upon the length of whose nose, says tradition, hung the destinies of millions of men. We are as curious of every item concerning her as she herself was of Octavia. We wish to know "her years, her features, her inclination, even the color of her hair." Yet, knowing all these, we never find out the secret of the spell, for of all the enchantresses Madame Récamier alone, according to the books, was strictly and superbly beautiful. The others only shared with her the strange charm of fascination, which, in our elegant modern diction, we call "something about them." You know the sort of women I mean, Madge; but they rarely become heroines nowadays, for love is a lost art.

I never like to place myself in direct opposition to Shakespeare. One's judgment is always likely to be impugned in such a case; but in this instance I find myself supported by Miss Rose Eyttinge, whose "Cleopatra" is not the "Cleopatra" of Shakespeare, but infinitely more like the great original, as I take it. She quite eliminates the poetical sensuality with which the great bard invested her. She is a mighty queen with a mighty temper—a virago, in short, with a full set of assorted passions to match her temper.

Miss Eyttinge is a very beautiful "Egypt," being in the full maturity of her charms. Much has been said of a red-haired "Cleopatra," but this obnoxious idea has only been introduced during the reign of the blondes. Since "Lady Audley" first stepped into the pages of fiction there is a deeply grounded impression that all bad women have fair hair. I prefer to think of Cleopatra as looking like Miss Eyttinge. I like her snapping dark eyes, her swarthy gypsy tint, her black, black locks. I can not imagine a pale, clinging blonde conquering an Antony, unless, indeed, Mr. Cyril Searle were the Antony. I have thought of a thousand reasons why this gentleman has been selected to play this part, and have hit upon but one: he is tall. Other qualification he has not. If he has ever played before, it must have been in the insipidities of the mildest drawing-room dramas. I believe there was a tradition in the Antony family that Marc was descended from Hercules, whom he was said to resemble. Judge, then, our feelings, dear Madge, when Mr. Searle rattled off Antony's lines in the most colloquial and chatty manner. It was astonishing at first, but it became extremely funny afterward, as compared with Rose Eyttinge's long rolled syllables and tragic periods. The lady is not a tragedian. She is too thoroughly a disciple of the emotional, and has too many of the ways of the melo-drama left. Her arms are too short, and round, and enticing; her hands too small, and plump, and pretty, for heroic gesture. I confess that this is a very womanly way of looking at it, but it is true that although Miss Eyttinge has the carriage of a queen, those too pretty arms and hands detract from the grandeur of her appearance. But beside Mr. Cyril Searle she might be Melpomene herself. Really he is, without exception, the most common-place young man that ever wore a toga. I can not imagine why they did not let Mr. Wells play it; or if he was necessary for "Octavius Caesar," why did not Mr. Frank Lawlor come forward. It is true he made no hit as "Julian Gray," but when he was an actor he was a tragedian, and as "Antony" he would have been infinitely preferable to Mr. Cyril Searle. I must say, in justice to Mr. Searle, that he died rather well; but we were all so glad to see that little affair take place that we barely appreciated what he did well. Also, as one of the distinguishing features of his performance was his being very perceptibly out of breath, a sense of peace and comfort stole over us when he stopped breathing altogether.

You will easily understand, dear Madge, that Mr. Cyril Searle was not a success. In point of fact, it is the first time since his departure that Tom Keene has been missed. You will remember the effect of his tremendous "Kiss me, Cleopatra," in his reconciliation with the fiery Egyptian. Mr. Searle says "Give me a kiss," in the meekest, mildest, most unobtrusive way, so that Miss Eyttinge's bit of Rignoldian business is completely lost. She had better look up the big Englishman to support her if she wants to give us that kind of a "Cleopatra," which name, by the way, Mr. Searle speaks with such a funny little sound of the "a," that one is inclined to call her Patty for short.

I think the daughter of all the Ptolemies was deeply relieved when the "man of men" shuffled off this mortal coil. At all events she did nothing remarkable until he was out of the way. Her defiance of Caesar's summons was something magnificent, but, alas! she died soon after, and the green curtain fell on the last of a set of the most beautiful scenes ever presented in this theatre, whose history is a history of gorgeous spectacle.

"Cleopatra's" palace, with its interminable vista, is a very miracle of light and color. A facetious neighbor on my right remarked to me that it needed but one thing to make it complete: the rigid and immovable Mr. Bock should have been lifted and placed on a pedestal in a line with those very decorous-looking wooden Egyptian gentlemen who always figure so largely in Egyptian scenery. I feel quite certain that the man must have passed a large portion of his early life hanging part in tableaux. Halliwell, or some other fellow who knows all about it, calls "Enobarbus" one of the rich sunlights of the picture, and tells of his grim jocularity. Mr. Bock introduced the grimness and omitted the jocularity. He was so really acceptable in My Son last week that I was disappointed.

For real comedy commend me to Mr. Bassett in a Roman character. He was either "M. Emilius Lepidus"—how odd for a noble Roman to part his name in the middle—or "Proculiteus," or some such man. He was apparently quite unconscious of the audience and of his comic effects. He simply stalked in and out in a Tar Flat sort of way, and contrived, when conversing with "Caesar," to summon to his face an expression of driveling idiocy—that is not a pleasant phrase, but it is the proper one—which was laughable in the extreme. Mr. Felix Morris must look to his clown parts after this.

Miss Mary Prescott looked extremely well as "Calanthe." They called her "Charmian," but then she herself must have known what she was about, and "Charmian" may have been a Greek girl. For my own part I am not quite sure of anything the girl ever did wear except a bracelet. I feel quite certain that when "Cleopatra" said, "Here, Charmian, take my bracelet," "Charmian" took the bracelet and put it on. You know women always do try on each other's jewelry.

Miss Holbrook has abandoned politics and taken to the theatre again. But her part is not full of grand possibilities. She has but a few lines and a flying honeymoon trip with "Antony," in a frail affair in which there does not seem to be much ship-room.

"Cleopatra's" barge is not so beautiful as it was two years ago. The painted figures are possibly exactly the same, but the living ones do not seem to be so well disposed. However, it is caviling to find fault with anything in the entire production which goes to please the eye. Then, too, there is much to please the ear. This is something new and rare since Charley Schultz has permitted the reputation of his orchestra to run down. How he used to be cheered to the echo. How often has the rising of the curtain been delayed to make him repeat some favorite melody, and how willingly have the most impatient sightseers acceded to the delay. They do say that the material in the California Theatre orchestra is as good as ever, and I believe it, for the weird, entrancing music of Aida attuned itself so harmoniously to the shifting Egyptian pageantry the other night, that I almost expected to see "Amneris" and "Aida" pop out from among the sphinxes, and almost waited for the scene-shifters to bring out the big Osiris.

At the other theatres everything is a trice-told tale. It is true, Clara Morris is playing an adaptation of Mons. Alphonse under a new name, but she has been clever enough to bring it out so late in the day as to attract houses by a change of bill, while not periling the prestige of her engagement with a play that will not run. After her engagement this beautiful little bijou theatre, just when it is commencing to be the fashion, is to be given over to a band of minstrels. Horror and desecration! The minstrel is not a clean creature. He is covered with cork dipped in beer; he is vigorous, and dances till he reeks; he is odious and vulgar at the best. But he is to be enshrined in all this red satin, and the company will go over to the great, bare, barren, bleak, blue Grand Opera House and catch their deaths of cold and play to thin houses and be miserable. Foolish, short-sighted policy!

Then the merry Rice party will go away and we shall have no more jolly music, and the Rentz minstrels will come to ooe or other of the Bush Street theatres—I don't know which—and respectable people can not go. What is to become of us all?

Thank heaven, there is still left Platt's Hall. It is not nice, and it is not clean, and it is not comfortable, and the gas never burns well, but it is old and respectable. As everything in the theatres was stale we went there the other night to see Waugh's "Photographed, Illuminated, Magnified, Incomparable Stereoscopic Views"—so say the bills. It is very pleasant to see the sights without the expense and the rigors of traveling, and photography is a blessing to the would-be traveler with the depleted purse; but the man who illuminates and magnifies the incomparable stereoscopic views ought to have been summarily disposed of on the spot by an outraged audience. We have none of us completely recovered our eyesight yet. The views, in themselves, are beautiful and wonderfully interesting, and Charles Warren Stoddard, who has traveled over every foot of the ground and knows whereof he speaks, has been engaged to give a series of four lectures upon them.

The lectures are far too good, not for the subject, but for the occasion; for while Mr. Stoddard is reading off his Holy Land reveries for example, illuminated here and there with a gentle, playful wit, the man at the helm is taking all the inspiration out of him by bungling with the calcium light and playing a game of hide and seek with the focus. The audience, meantime, are struck stone-blind, temporarily, and the Youth's Directory benefits little.

The rain has washed the crowds away from the Bush Street Theatre, but an astonishing number of people still plod through the mud and mire to get a good laugh. In fact, Goodwin now only finds it necessary to appear, when they set up a roar. They know that it is expected of them, and they do it with that obliging submissive characteristic of human nature. I will tell you more about the funny Goodwin when he changes the bill. For to-day, adieu.

Yours,

BETSY B.

On Thursday evening next Madame Jaffa will give a concert at Platt's Hall. Madame Jaffa will be assisted by a number of our best artists, and considerable interest attaches to the matter from the circumstance that this will be her first appearance since returning from Europe.

"The local evidences of the great civil war," writes a Southern correspondent, "were speedily obliterated." Same out here; the widows of the fallen married again with surprising rapidity.

George Washington may have been the father of his country, but its grandmother seems to be presiding over its destinies just at present.

In this country the idea of a free press is so prevalent that very few ever think of paying the printer.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Some Examples of Rare and Curious Valentines, together with various Irrelevant Tales concerning Cats and Things.

Uncle Ned he sed: "Johnny, this is Valentines day, and its haf gon alreddy, and you haint rote a werd a bowt it for the paper. And you call yureself a news paper man. You are a disgrace to the profession—not much bettern ole Fitch or Mister Mackerelish."

So I sed wot shude I rite, and he sed: "A Essay, Johnny, a Essay like a editorial. The public xpecks it, and if you dont do yure dooty to the public you be had for dinner by the ragin and rip-rorin Cupid, to wich this day is sacred!"

Then I ast him did it have tushes like a bi potamus, and he sed I better jest git my pen and go to work, no more tockn back.

Valentines day dont come only but jest once a year, and its the time wen all the little birds and the animells gits married, but not any preecher, and no cake, but wen me and little Sally Brope gits married I bet you will see mity big eatn, cos wot else does a feller git married for Id jest like to know. And thats all I got to say about Valentines day in the abstrack, but you jest ot to see one wich was sent to my sisters yung man. It was drowd with a led pencil, and was him a leanin on our gate a lookin up the wock real wishffe. And there was some poetry under it wich was this way:

"You stan there al night a lookin for Billys sister,
While the moon is a wastin herself in the ski;
And if she wude come out I spose you wude up and kissed her,
But likely as not Billy wude ben there too, mister,
And fetched you a regler sockdoller in the ey."

Wen my sisters yung man he got it he come over to our house and he sed: "Billy, xcuse me for bothern a feller wich has greefs of his own, but I was never so puzzel in all my life. I have bot a seven octave revolver and a rebound-in boy knife for to destroy the wrascle wich rote this thing, but I cant gess who he is."

Then Billy he got wite like sheets and trembly all over, and he sed did my sisters yung man mean it.

And he said: "Mean it, Billy, wy, my boy, I have got down onto the kanees of my legs and swore like a pirit that I wil take my boy nife and split that feller like a fish and drink his gore like I was a pig with both fore feets in the trof!"

Then I spoke up and ast him wude he scratch hissef against a gate post and grunt, but he just turned a round and loked at me reel sober, and said: "Johnny, one time there was a pig a scratchin the end of its back against a gate post, and its ears was a flippity floppin up and down, and there was a jackus come a long and stop for to look over the gate, and then he sed to hissef, the jackus did: 'This is the graceffest feller wich I ever seen, jest look at them ears!'

"Then the jackus tride for to get closer, and prest against the gate, and it went shet with a snap, and the pigs tail was cot in the gate, and the pig it hollerd like red Injins, you never herd sech singin out! The jackus he barked a wile, and then he shuke his hed and sed to the pig: 'You was more eliquent fore you spoke.'"

But fore my sisters yung man had got threw his story Billy he busted out cryin, cos twas him rote the valentine, and that yung man was a stonish like you never seen! But he sed he wudent kill Billy til nex Valentines day, and see if he done it agin.

Mary, thats the house maid, she got a valentine from the butchers boy wich brings the meat, and it was a red bart with a blu arro stickin in it. But I gess he got Mister Brily, thats the butcher, to make the poetry, for it sed:

"This oxes hart stuck on a skewer.
It onct was mine but now its your.
Harts is best rosted, but some fokes fries,
We keep nice livers, and steaks likewise.
You are my sweetheart, I love you true,
We just got in some fresh tripe, too."

But Missy thats my sisters valentine hern is jest the finest one wich ever was see, all gold and silver and berds wich is most all tails, and little boys which has been in a swimmeo, but she wont let me a Billy read the readin in it. So I ast Uncle Ned wot she wudent sho it for and he sed: "Johnny, the facks wich is narated in that valentine is unfit for publication."

Then I sed wot did that mean, but Billy he wank. But wen Uncle Ned he seen Billy wink he grabd up the fier poker and jumpt at him furious, but Billy he ran a way. Then Uncle Ned he sed to me a other time: "Johnny, take xample by a man which has been in Injy and evry were, and wen ever you have been unfortunate in your language dont you let a feller go a way with a rong impressin if you can git yure hands on him. A good man wich can git hold of a fier poker like thisn, Johnny, aint never too proud for to try to brake the force of his own thotless words."

And now lle tel you a little story bowt a cat fite. One night there was a candy pullin at Missis Doppys house, wich has got the red hed, and a feller he tuke some candy and roled it up in to a big round ball. And then he tuke an lade it in a other room were there wasent any fier, for to let it git cold. And there was two cats a hidin from the candy pullin in that room, and wen the feller was gon they went to smel the candy. Wen the cats thay found it was nice and warm thay lay down and cerled their selfs a round it, one on both sides, and went a sleep reel cumffable. Bimeby the feller he cum in the dark for to git his candy, and wen he put his hand there it woke up the cats, wich tride for to git up and run a way, but the candy had stuckem to gather and got cold. So wen the feller tuched em thay hollerd and spit, and the feller he was a stonish.

One time me and Billy we went out for to drownd a ole tom cat wich my father had tide up in a bag, but Billy he lay the bag down on the bank a minit for to catch a frog, and ole Gaffer Peters he come a long and set down on the bag for to watch Billy get the frog. The cat it stuck its toes in Gaffer's back and hollerd, and Gaffer he sed "O my" and sprang in the water like a frog his ownself. The cat was drownded, but Gaffer he fished hissef out on the other side of the crick, and then he shuke his fist at me and Billy and sed: "You gum dasted little welps, if you haddent got across the crick mity lifely I wude kicked you acros!"

SAN RAFAEL, February 14, 1879.

Faith.

The child who never disappointment knew,
Who his parent's truth has proven is faith exemplified.
He trusts and knows—believing—for never yet his confidence forsook;
Whatever the promise was, it was as promised given,
A sacred word that innocence receives in trust, a bidden
That they too soon like gods the good from evil know.
To innocence the morrow shall be as trusted age essays;
With a word the storm-clouds pass,
And sunshine brightens all.
With a word the brightest night foretells a dismal day,
The storm and darkness vanish with a word,
And bright effulgence glows in every cloud.
Beauty the lightning flash or direst death conveys,
Grandly the rolling thunder speaks to all,
The hissing typhoon bearing death upon its wings,
To trusting childhood is as balmy breezes are.
Who calls it death to die? If death but pleasure spoke,
All earth to death would fly, from earthly cares unyoked.
What gloom is in the grave for him that suffers here
But rest and hope, and joy too long deferred?
And what is heaven the good are to inherit?
Who are the good? We sometimes doubt our title deeds,
And fear the test, since none are proven good,
Nor proved the land exists we call our own.
What insects in the mighty universe are we?
What claim to heaven, the home of God
And our Redeemer, Christ?

Yet it was said, and faith still bids us hope,
That we shall live beyond this mortal sphere.
That may be heaven above we make our heaven here,
Or hell, or both, and dwell awhile in each,
And find the change doth please as we ascend the scale.

Even heathen gods protect and smooth the way
For the untaught savage or pious devotee.
A wooden idol for a penny bought,
Or crushing wheels of Juggernaut,
Have each a power as potent in their eyes
As hath Jehovah to the good and wise.
What, then, has faith no power to rectify the truth?
We still doubt Omnipotence, and ask for proof?
We see a flower where yesterday a sod.
From whence this beauty? this transformation how?
Ye wise and skeptics, speak, or ever hold your peace.
Says't thou the sun gives light and life!
Says't thou the falling dews and gentle showers!
Whence came the sun, from whence the rain and dews
That nature's bounty gives? Look deeper still.
How sprang the universe from chaos' womb?
Speak if thou canst, or probe it deeper still.
How strong is faith that sets a light beyond that we may see,
What though the illusion fades as wisdom grows,
'Twere better still to hope, believe, and trust,
Than doubt, despair, and die in search of truth,
The dying Christian sees with vision clear
What skeptic science never feels or knows.
Of heaven and happiness when earth is done,
And death a veil o'er earthly sorrow throws.
SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879. PHILMORE.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner
Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y..

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The Boston Post thinks the time will come when honest lawyers will hang out a shingle saying: "Attorney at Law and Candidate for Congress."

One of our pious old deacons went to a circus and took his grandchild, remarking to every acquaintance he met that the boy wanted to see the sacred animals, and he couldn't find it in his heart to refuse him.
Arriving at the tent, the boy cried to go home, and the deacon spanked him to make him go on, but to no purpose; he stilled howled and kicked. At last he was pacified, and consented to enter upon grandpa's promise to have his picture taken at T. H.
Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, where they take such beautiful photographs at moderate prices.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Goethe and Schiller. Their Lives and Works. By Prof. H. H. Boyesen. 1 vol. Cloth. $2 00
Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion. By F.
Max Muller. 1 vol. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 2 50
St. Paul at Athens. By Charles Shakspeare, B.A. 1
vol. 12mo. Cloth. 1 25
Multitudinous Seas. By S. G. W. Benjamin. Appleton's Handy Volume Series. Paper. 25
Demology and Devil Lore. By Moncure D. Conway. 2 vols. 8vo. Cloth. 7 00
Man and Wife. By Wilkie Collins. Franklin Square
Series. Paper. 15
English Synonyms. By Geo. Crabb. New Edition.
1 vol. Cloth. 2 50
David Hume. By Prof. Huxley. English Men of
Letters Series. 1 vol. Cloth. 75
Oliver Goldsmith. By Wm. Black. English Men of
Letters Series. 1 vol. Cloth. 75
Goethe Gallery. Kaulbach's Illustrations. 1 vol.
Stamped cloth. 10 00

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET,
'MASONIC TEMPLE.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,
WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

THE CARDINAL FEATURE!

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS.

The Weathersby Froliques certainly offer a very enjoyable entertainment, especially for those who appreciate roaring fun, pretty music, and excellent acting. N.
C. Goodwin, Jr., is certainly the most talented comedian in his line who has ever visited this city. The troupe is well adapted to this line of business, and the burlesque of "Hobbies" has been received with so much of applause by crowded and fashionable audiences that it will be continued.—CHRONICLE, Feb. 9th.
For two hours the audience was kept in a continual convulsion of laughter, and the Froliques achieved an unequivocal success.—ALTA.

Eliza Weathersby Froliques in "Hobbies" made a most decided and complete hit.—CALL.
There has not been a vacant seat at the Bush Street Theatre during the week, and perhaps this is sufficient evidence of the qualities of the performance there. If any one be in doubt, however, we advise him to listen to the hearty, universal, and continuous laughter which characterizes the progress of the latter part of the performance.—POST, Feb. 8th.
The entertainment justifies the comments of the Eastern press. It is pure, rollicking fun from beginning to end.—BULLETIN.

Monday Evening, February 17, 1879, and every evening until further notice. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday at 2 P.M.

Third week's reign of the supreme laughter-creators,

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S
FROLIQUES!

—AND—

MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR.,

—IN THEIR—

MUSICAL AND MERRY-MAKING MIMES, HOBBIES!

Introduced through the medium of the melange extravaganza,

HOBBIES!

Gay, Festive, Exquisite—A Reflex of Humorous Consequence.

Presented this week with New Dresses, New Songs, and New Features. The performance will commence with the new farce called the

GREEN-EYED MONSTER.

Seats may now be secured six days in advance.

A CARD TO THE LADIES.

The success and intrinsic merit of an article are best indicated by the amount of abuse it receives from propie-tors of similar articles. For some time past CAMELINE has been the object of malicious attacks under the head of "Cameleonine" or "Creme de Lis." The proprietors or agents of "Creme de Lis," with the intention of deceiving the public, have attempted, in these advertisements, to confound CAMELINE with an obscure and rare chemical substance of somewhat similar name, in no way connected with or entering into its composition, and the name of this chemical has in these advertisements been distorted for the purpose of increasing the deception. We have nothing to say in this connection in regard to the comparative merits of CAMELINE and Creme de Lis, concerning which ladies are best competent to judge, but for the purpose of sustaining our assertion that CAMELINE is perfectly free from objectionable or deleterious substances, we herewith append the opinion of a number of prominent physicians of this city.
H. P. WAKELEE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 1, 1879.

The undersigned, physicians of San Francisco, are familiar with the composition of the principal articles used for the complexion, and freely certify that WAKELEE'S CAMELINE is free from all poisonous or injurious substances:

L. C. Lane, M.D., Wm. Hammond, M.D.,
H. H. Toland, M.D., W. F. McNutt, M.D.,
R. A. McLean, M.D., A. J. Bowie, M.D.,
Chas. B. Brigham, M.D., J. C. Shorb, M.D.,
Benj. D. Dean, M.D., F. A. Holman, M.D.,
Henry Gibbons, Jr., M.D., Jul. Rosenstern, M.D.,
J. J. Clarke, M.D., J. D. Whitney, M.D.,
W. H. Bruner, M.D., Thomas Boyson, M.D.,
A. M. Loryea, M.D., C. G. Kenyon, M.D.,
Cephas L. Bard, M.D., Isaac S. Titus, M.D.,
Chas. C. Keeney, M.D., Harry L. Sims, M.D.,
A. M. Wilder, M.D., J. H. Stallard, M.D.,
Geo. M. Powers, M.D., Chas. McQuesten, M.D.,
Benj. R. Swan, M.D., James O. Shafter, M.D.,
L. L. Durr, M.D., Wm. Carman, M.D.,
Jas. W. Keeney, M.D., Washington Ayer, M.D.,
Gustav Holland, M.D., J. L. Meares, M.D.,
Geo. F. Cooper, M.D., Thomas Price, M.D.,
Samuel W. Dennis, M.D., H. Gibbons, M.D.,
J. M. McNulty, M.D., Thomas Bennett, M.D.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA
DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER

NAPA, CALIFORNIA.

FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.

THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—
is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper, both in the quantity and quality of reading matter, and in value as an advertising medium. The DAILY REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa County, and both
Daily and Weekly have a large circulation.
Daily $5, and Weekly $3 a year.
G. M. FRANCIS.....H. S. SPALDING.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

FAREWELL ENGAGEMENT OF
CLARA MORRIS,
Supported by the Great Legitimate Company of Baldwin's Theatre.

This (Saturday) afternoon, February 15, Clara Morris as Raymonde Montaigne, in her new adaptation of Alex. Dumas' great play,
RAYMONDE.

Saturday evening, February 15,
BENEFIT OF MR. JAS. O'NEILL,
And last appearance of CLARA MORRIS.
DAVID GARRICK, CAMILLE (fourth act), and THE MERCHANT OF VENICE (Trial scene).

Box Sheet now open.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

PARTICULAR NOTICE.

A SEASON OF MINSTRELSY, MIMICRY, AND MIRTH.

The Management has the honor to announce that on MON-DAY, February 17,

BARLOW, WILSON, PRIMROSE & WEST'S

MINSTRELS,

Acknowledged to be the most brilliant and artistic combination before the public, will commence a short season at this Theatre.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,
Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.

The Management of Baldwin's Theatre has the honor to announce that in consequence of the immense stage-room required for the production of the great play,

Within an Inch of His Life,

THE

GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Has been taken for a special dramatic season,

COMMENCING

MONDAY.....FEBRUARY 17th.

PLATT'S HALL.

THURSDAY EVENING.....FEBRUARY 20, 1879.

GRAND CONCERT

GIVEN BY

MADAME JAFFA,

(Her first appearance since her return from Europe).

The following artists will assist:

Mme. BERNARDI SERIGHELLI,
Mr. FRED. BORNEMAN, of Calvary Church,
Mr. ERNEST SCHLOTT,
Mr. M. SOLANO,
Mr. F. PEIPERS,
Mr. S. CONZALES,
Mr. C. SCHMITZ.
Mme. BAGEOLINI, de Paris, First Appearance.
S. F. SEXTETTE, who has kindly volunteered his services.
MONS. A. SAURET.....CONDUCTOR.

Tickets, $r. Reserved seats, 50 cents extra. Boxes, $5, $6, and $8. Tickets and programmes to be had at the principal music stores, and at Madame Jaffa's residence, 1906 Sutter Street. Seats can be reserved at Platt's Hall, on the 19th and 20th, from 9 to 4 o'clock.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator
with the will annexed of the Estate of JOHN BLISS,
deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco.
Dated February 13th, 1879.

WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of John
Bliss, deceased.
PHILPS & ELLIS, 66 Nevada Block, Attorneys for Estate.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,
OCULIST,

HAS RETURNED TO THIS CITY,
and will resume practice immediately. Consultation Rooms as before, No. 321 RUSH
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, Feb. 17, Second week and continued success of

ROSE EYTINGE,

Supported by

MR. CYRIL SEARLE.

REPERTOIRE FOR THE WEEK:

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, Feb. 17, 18,
19, and 20,

ROSE MICHEL.

Friday evening, Feb. 21,

EAST LYNNE.

ONLY ROSE MICHEL MATINEE SATURDAY.

Saturday night, Feb. 22,

OLIVER TWIST.

MISS EYTINGE in her great character, NANCY SYKES.

Seats at the Box Office.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSER AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

This (Saturday) afternoon, positively Last Ladies' Matinee.
MATINEE TO DAY AT 2 P. M.

Saturday and Sunday evenings, farewell of the popular favorites,

RICE'S SURPRISE PARTY.

ADIEU TO ALL!

Monday, February 17, first appearance in this theatre of

MADAME RENTZ'S

CELEBRATED FEMALE MINSTRELS,

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

FAMOUS ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMPANY.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,
DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126
Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Halifax.

I.—THE GOOD MAN AND THE BAD MAN.

In the good old times, long ago, there lived, in a village in the province of Hizen, an old couple noted for their honesty and simplicity. They had bought a little dog, of which they became very fond, treating it as if it had been one of their children.

One day the old man was out in the fields with his hoe, when the dog commenced scratching a certain place, and then running to the old man and back to the spot again, scratching the earth. This he repeated until the old man was directed to the spot, much to the dog's delight. The dog continuing to scratch the ground, the old man picked up his hoe, and, with a few sturdy strokes, turned up an immense heap of gold and silver coins, which he took home, and on examination found himself to have suddenly become a rich man. He was naturally grateful to his little dog, and gave it the best of food and the nicest of beds.

Now, in the same country place, there was a wicked old man, who, hearing of the dog's cleverness in finding buried treasure, determined to borrow it and try his luck at becoming rich without labor, but was refused the loan of the dog by its master, who feared that it would not receive kind treatment. So the wicked old man contrived to steal the dog, and watched its movements anxiously and carefully for some time. One day, seeing it scratching the earth, he dug down, hoping to find money, but only disinterred an old skull. Enraged at being disappointed by the dog, after having fed it on meat and other good things, he in his passion, and like a wicked old man that he was, killed the poor animal, and then went to its master and loudly complained of the poor dog, trying by his noisy manner to drown the expression of the blame that he deserved. But the good old man, after finding the body of his dog, and burying it at the foot of a large pine tree in the forest, and close by where the money was found, cried himself to sleep in his grief for the loss of his favorite. In his sleep he dreamed that the dog came to him and told him to cut down this very tree, and make from it an usu (a large wooden mortar in which rice is hulled).

The old man told his wife of his dream, and she advised him to do as he had been directed. So the next day he felled the tree, and, cutting off a section, hollowed it out. When the usu was finished he tried it by putting in some rice that required hulling, and, to his astonishment, after the first few blows of the pestle, each grain of rice was changed into gold coin!

The wicked old man, hearing of this new stroke of fortune, went to spy on the good man, and, seeing for himself the surprising fact of the rice being turned to money, was filled with fresh envy at his neighbor's good luck, and accordingly determined to borrow the usu. After much persuasion and some threats, he obtained the loan of it; but his rice turned into filth; at which he became so angry that he chopped up the offending usu and commenced to burn it, when the owner came to claim it—to find only the remains.

The good old man again dreamed that the little dog came to him, this time instructing him to obtain the ashes, and to go to the great highway where the nobles passed, and, by sprinkling the ashes, the cherry trees—then bare of blossoms or leaves—would immediately bud and blossom.

Now, these were the good old days, when nobles traveled in state with their retinues, dressed as befitted their high station, and rode on horseback, or in norimon (a kind of sedan chair), not, as in these degenerate times, when even the highest in the land condescend to ride in jinrikishas (a two-wheeled carriage, drawn by a man), wear ill-fitting and uncomfortable foreign clothes, unsightly hats, and get attacks of dyspepsia from badly cooked foreign food—composed of material too strong for their weak stomachs—and affect to despise what their forefathers were proud of. These were the days when the Tonosawa was open-handed to the poor, ready with his sword for the insolent.

Our good old man went to the wicked old man's house, and begged for at least the ashes of his property, only to receive a portion—the rest being retained on suspicion that there must be some urgent reason for coming so far for apparently such a trivial thing. The good old man took the ashes, and mounting a cherry tree on the high road, awaited the approach of the great man who was expected to pass that way. When he drew near he asked the old man what he was doing in the tree, and why he did not prostrate himself before him; to which the old man replied by saying that he would show him the tree bursting into blossom before his eyes by sprinkling upon it a pinch of ashes.

Stopping his retinue, he ordered the old man to try his skill; and the trial was attended with success, to the astonishment and delight of the noble, who ordered the old man to be suitably rewarded, and to be brought on a visit to his palace.

The bad old man, hearing of this, determined, with the remainder of the ashes, to try his skill on the occasion of another great lord passing; but the ashes flew in the faces of the noble and retainers, who, in their rage, beat the foolish old man severely, tied him, and put him in the lock-up.

The good old man's story becoming public, the wicked man was turned out of the village, and afterward died on the wayside. The good old man lived happily many years after.

II.—THE BOILER BEWITCHED.

A long time ago the priest of a temple Morinji, of Fatebayashi, in the province of Joshu, found in the lumber-room of the temple an old iron kama, or boiler, that seemed as if it had not seen the light for many years. Being a thrifty man, and wishing to turn everything he possessed to the best advantage, he cleaned it and set it on the fire to boil some water. Presently, to his intense astonishment, it commenced to move about, and the tail, head, and legs of an old badger grew out of its sides. Before the priest could recover from his surprise, or could even mutter a short prayer, the pot flew up to the ceiling and tried to escape. The priest called to his neophytes, and they chased it with bamboos, until finally knocking it down, they seized it and fastened it up securely in a box, intending to send the uncanny thing to a safe distance.

A rag-dealer was sent for and the box opened to show him the pot, when, lo and behold! it appeared the same old rusty thing it was before the priest cleaned it. The dealer would not give more than ni kan (twenty cents) for it. However, the priest, after a little haggling over so low a bid for such a heavy boiler, was glad to be rid of such a troublesome thing. The dealer found it heavier than he had anticipated, but with a great deal of trouble succeeded in getting it home. At night after going to sleep he was awakened by a noise in the direction of the place where he had left his purchase, but it ceased whenever he looked that way. Presently, peeping under the bed-cover, he saw the boiler had turned into a big, ugly old badger, and it was dancing about the house, now balancing himself on one leg on top of the frame of the night lamp, then on the rafters overhead, to the great consternation of the rag merchant. In the morning he went to a friend in the same trade, and related to him the marvelous performances of the old boiler. This friend, having heard when a child a story of a certain boiler that was bewitched, thought this must be the identical boiler, and advised its owner to exhibit it as a remarkable curiosity, first gaining the old badger's confidence and good will, but on no account to repeat prayers or perform any religious ceremonies in the meantime, as these would drive the badger away. Acting on this advice, a suitable place for the exhibition was erected, and the badger induced to show off his tricks before the public. The pot was placed on the stage, then, at the word to commence, out sprouted the head, tail, and legs; and it hopped about, and, jumping on a tight rope, went through the various dances with umbrellas, fans, and so on.

In a short time the rag merchant became rich beyond his highest ambition, and, having neglected his devotions, feared the anger of the Kami (Sintoo deities); so he took back the boiler to the temple, and presented the priest with a large sum of money in order to obtain his prayers to the Kami, beseeching them not to punish him for his neglect, and to permit him to retain his wealth.

The priest then, with the assistance of a further donation from the quondam rag merchant, built a beautiful temple, in which the boiler was kept in due state, and canonized, and where it may be seen to this day.

Not long ago, in a neighboring city, one of the belles of society accepted the matrimonial proposition of a worthy young gentleman, and was asked by him to name the happy day. She consulted her parents—who had previously given their consent to the match—and a family council was held. The decision reached was curious, as well as characteristic of our country and age. The father and mother agreed that the social position of their daughter required a grand wedding. The father, however, announced that misfortunes in business had brought him to the verge of bankruptcy; that he was, in fact, preparing to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. To this the mother replied, that the grand wedding being of primary importance, it must of course take precedence of the assignment, for pecuniary reasons easily understood. And it was so ordered. The marriage occurred amid a blaze of glory, duly chronicled in the newspapers, and a few days afterward Mr. Smith's paper went to protest, and his creditors took possession of his limited assets. Not long ago, considerably nearer home, a fond husband informed his loving wife that his financial affairs were in that condition which indicates a speedy and disastrous collapse. The wife said little, but thought much. The result of her meditation was that the next day she went down town and bought a seal-skin sacque and a set of diamonds. She told a female neighbor, who knew of the impending calamity, that the sacque and diamonds "would last her a lifetime; that if she did not get them now she never would, and so she got them." The collapse came in due season, and it is hardly necessary to remark that the furrier and jeweler are whistling for their money. These twin incidents are true. They are only two out of the many, equally true, that never find their way into the uncongenial and unwelcome atmosphere of print.

After the newspaper carrier, the letter carrier, and the telegraph boy had appeared, not to pay, but to get paid for their addresses on New Year's day, a fourth ring was heard, and the master of the house went to the door.

"And who are you?" he asked.

"I? Oh, I'm the chap that lights the gas lamp just in front of your door here."

"Ah, well!" and he gives him a quarter.

Another fifteen minutes, and another lamplighter at the door.

"My friend," said the gentleman, still good-natured, "I've already paid upon the lamp."

"Oh, sir," said the visitor, "that was the fellow who lights it."

"And what do you do?"

"I? I put it out."

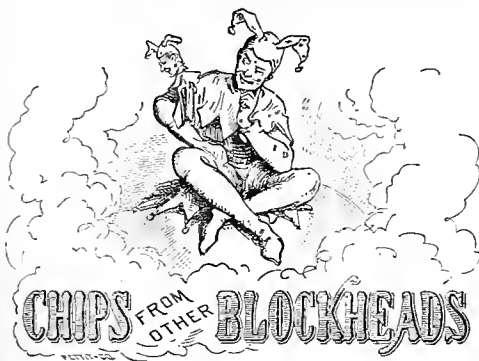

The following heroic challenge has been sent to the New York Sun. Truly this is an age of gladiators: "Sir: I hereby challenge any person under the age of eighteen years to eat apple pies with me for the championship of the United States. The pies to be thirty inches in circumference and one and two-thirds inches thick, and to be made by any person who can prove himself a good baker. By printing this in the Sunday Sun you will oblige T. J. MCNULTY, 'Champion Apple Pie Eater of the United States.'"

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, February 16, 1895.

Beef Noodle Soup (see Vol. III, No. 13).
Boiled Turbot, Genoise Sauce (see Vol. III, No. 19).
Stewed Mushrooms. String Beans.
Roast Beef. Mashed Potatoes.
Cress Salad.

Orange Jelly. Fancy Cakes.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Bananas, and Oranges.
Walnuts, Almonds, and Chestnuts.

TO MAKE ORANGE JELLY.—Eight oranges, two lemons, three-quarters cup of gelatin soaked in half a pint of cold water, three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar, one pint of boiling water, beaten whites and shells of two eggs. Rub the loaf sugar on the peelings of two oranges and one lemon; squeeze the juice from six or seven oranges and two lemons, and strain it. Take off the rind carefully from two oranges, leaving only the transparent skin surrounding the centers, and separate all the sections without breaking them. Soak the gelatin half an hour in half a pint of water; boil the other pint of water and the sugar together, skimming until no more scum rises; then put in the sections of oranges, and when they have boiled about a minute take them out. Pour this syrup over the soaked gelatin, adding the orange and lemon juice, the beaten whites and the shells of two eggs. Put it on the fire, let it boil about a quarter of a minute without stirring; then, placing it at the side of the fire, skim off carefully all the scum at the top, and pass it through the jelly bag. When half the jelly is in the mould, put it on the ice, and let it set hard enough to hold the orange sections, which place in a circular row around the edge of the mould; then add enough more jelly to cover the sections. When this has hardened, pour over the remainder of the jelly, which should have been kept in a warm place to prevent it from hardening.

Some men marry rich widows for the same reason that others drink whisky. All they want is the effects.

That was a ghastly joke that a sinful townsman played on a stranger whom he promised to introduce to a rich planter, and then took him around and presented him to the leading undertaker.

With face plump up to the window-pane,

Intently watching the falling snow

(That turned to slush in the after rain),

Young Tom let this conundrum go:

"Do you know what that white stuff is, mamma,

'That's comin' down from the sky up there?

Do you give it up? Well, I guess it are

The dandruff out of the angels' hair."

The expression of a boy's face at the end of a straw that lacks two inches of reaching the cider in a barrel, is supposed to be the model that the artist selected in the delineation of Adam leaving Paradise.

We have about decided to sail for Europe as soon as this issue of the paper goes to press. We can no longer hold back. Paris mothers call distinguished Americans to kiss their pretty grown-up daughters.

I've a letter from thy sire,
Baby mine, baby mine;
He's coming home or he's a liar,
Baby mine, baby mine;
He is now chuck full of wine,
And he's feeling mighty fine;
He had better bide his sign,
Baby mine, baby mine.

He had better come in soon,
Baby mine, baby mine;
I've been waiting since high noon,
Baby mine, baby mine;
I am waiting with a broom,
I will chase him 'round the room,
While his nose shines through the gloom,
Baby mine, baby mine.

My new boy (says Edison) is double back action, perpetual motion, automatic, and all the latest improvements in one grand combination, and he has lungs in comparison with which the noise of the elevated railroad is as the sighing of the summer breeze on a lazy afternoon.

A well known local clergyman made the trials of Job the subject of his discourse a few Sundays ago, when, after enumerating the repeated messages of misfortune which came fast one after another, he gravely remarked: "It is characteristic of Job's simplicity of character that he did not suspect this extraordinary accumulation of trouble of being a hoax."

The other evening a man with eight good-looking daughters found four of them hanging over his front gates trying to entertain a callow-looking young man with a good deal of collar and cane. He invited them in and set the gates again, and in just thirty minutes by the watch caught the other four with an equal allowance of young man. This was the last he landed; he had no more fresh bait.

THE PUZZLED DUTCHMAN.

I'm a proken-hearted Deutscher,
Vot's villed mit crief and shame.
I dell you vot der drouble ish:
I doesn't know my name.

You dinks dis ferry vunny, eh?
Ven you der story hear,
You vill not vunder den so mooch,
It was so schtrange und queer.

Mine moder had two leedle twins;
Dey vos me und mine brudder;
Ve lookt so ferry mooch alike,
No von knew vich vrom toder.

Von off der poys vas "Yawcob,"
Und "Hans" der oder's name;
But den it made no tefferer;
Ve both got called der same.

Vell, von off us got tead—
Yaw, Mynheer, dat ish so!
But vedder Hans or Yawcob,
Mine moder she don'd know.

Und so I'm in drouples;
I gan't kit droo mine hed
Vedder I'm Hans vot's bing,
Or Yawcob vot is tead!

A stranger with a weak back walked into a drug store, the other day, and said he wanted the strongest kind of a mustard plaster. With a fiendish grin, the clerk built up a terrible mixture and passed it out. That night the inmates of the hotel were startled from their slumbers by loud cries in room 57. When the door was burst open, they found the stranger wrestling with that mustard plaster in Græco-Roman style. But the plaster had thrown him twice, and was now thumping him against the wall, preparatory to throwing him through the transom. It took two policemen to get the two.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

TO OWNERS

REAL ESTATE.

PERSONS OWNING REAL ESTATE that has heretofore been assessed in the former owner's name, or misspelled, or otherwise misdescribed, are requested to appear personally, or send their Deeds to the Assessor's office (New City Hall), and have the proper changes made for the Real Estate Roll 1879-80. Immediate attention is necessary, as work on the Roll will commence in a few days, after which it will be too late for any alterations.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,
City and County Assessor.

司公市噤

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

THE Automatic
SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 69.—The monthly dividend for January, 1878, will be paid on February 10, 1879, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
San Francisco, February 5, 1879.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3 AND 4, SHERMAN BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 770.)

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA CO.
OF LONDON.

A Flattering Compliment

—TO—

STEINWAY & SONS.

Academy of Music,
New York, Dec. 28, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Gentlemen—Having used your celebrated Pianos in public and private during the present opera season, we desire to express our unqualified admiration of their sonority, evenness, richness, and astonishing duration of tone, most beautifully blending with and supporting the voice. These matchless qualities for accompanying the voice, together with precision of action and unequalled capacity for remaining in tune for a great length of time, render the Steinway Pianos, above all others, the most desirable instruments for students of vocal music and the musical public generally.

MINNIE HAUKE,
ETELKA GERSTER,
MARIE ROZE,
CL. CAMPOBELLO,
G. LABLACHE,
LUIGI ARDITI,
ITALO CAMPANINI,
A. F. GALASSI,
G. DEL PUENTE,
J. FRAPOLLI,
A. J. FOLI,
F. DE RIALP,
J. H. MAPLESON.

NEW YORK, December, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:

Dear Sirs—Allow me to express to you the entire satisfaction I feel in praising your magnificent Pianos. They are the finest and most superior instruments in the world, and I have therefore taken every opportunity, while in Europe, to extol their sterling qualities. Believe me, dear sir,

Yours, very sincerely,
MINNIE HAUKE,
Royal and Imperial Court Singer.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

382 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL, Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports, On THURSDAY, Feb. 20, at 12 o'clock M.

Steerage Passage..... $2 00

Cabin Passage..... 7 00

In Bridal Rooms..... 10 00

Freight..... at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.
P. B. CORNWALL.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 8.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 22, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

A Romance of Real Life.

CHAPTER I.

Away back in the early time of California when the century was new, a stalwart young Englishman of adventurous spirit came to the Pacific coast. The country was unoccupied, and he had everywhere among its beautiful valleys and its hill-sides to choose a home. After many pleasant journeys, sometimes in sailing vessels cruising along its shores, now and then entering its beautiful roadsteads and harbors, sometimes on horseback from mission to mission, crossing streams, mountains, and valleys, camping now on wooded heights, and again lighting the fires of his bivouac in romantic glens, he prospected the whole country.

Lands unoccupied were easily attainable, and titles could be acquired from the Mexican Government. It was desirous of colonizing this, its outlying province, and was especially generous to bold, enterprising, and intelligent men who were willing to make this land their home. The savage race was dominant here, and only the Jesuit missions had begun their conflict with the aboriginal people. Joseph Workman—for that was the name of our English adventurer, finally chose for his home a beautiful place in the beautiful valley of the San Gabriel. The San Gabriel River came down from among fruitful, grassy hills, with its pure and sparkling water. The San José streamlet crossed it at another angle, while all around and on every side were broad, grassy plains—the very spot for the raising of herds of cattle, droves of horses, and flocks of sheep. From the Mexican Government he obtained title to the Rancho La Puente, 48,790 acres, a broad and beautiful domain. There was none in his native land that exceeded it for beauty and fertility; not a ducal estate in all of England could compare with it.

He married a maiden of the country; sons and daughters grew up around him. One daughter married Mr. Temple. The old adobe house was exchanged for a magnificent stone mansion, and it was embowered among groves of orange, lemon, lime, and walnut, with vineyards. All around were gardens, groves, and blooming fields. The son-in-law built for himself and his growing family a costly mansion among groves and vineyards.

As time advanced, these gentlemen added to their estate the Rancho Potrero Grande, 4,431 acres, the Rancho La Merced, 2,363 acres, and the Rancho Potrero Felipe Sugo, some 4,400 acres more—a truly magnificent estate. It became covered with flocks and herds.

The United States conquered Mexico, acquired the country, confirmed titles, and there came from all the world an adventurous immigration to this land of gold. From the placers and gold-bearing streams of the Sierras, groaning with the accumulations of gold, there floated down to this beautiful valley of San Gabriel, and its larger neighbor, the valley of Los Angeles, a splendid population. The country was semi-tropical. The climate was simply perfect. The soil was fruitful beyond anything known. It was the land of the pomegranate and the olive, of the orange and the lemon. The apple and the pineapple would grow side by side. It was a land of enchantment. It was the Happy Valley of Rasselas. There grew up a great beautiful city in it. Stately buildings, luxuriant homes, public edifices, and commercial blocks worthy of an older civilization.

In this city of Los Angeles Temple & Workman bought and built, built and prospered. A splendid pile of buildings in the town known as "Temple's Block," the Post Office building, was theirs. They opened a bank. Old residents, wealthy, honest, with two or three millions of landed estate, with flocks and herds, orchards, vineyards, and orange groves, they had the confidence of all, and their bank became the depository of workingmen's accumulations.

CHAPTER II.

The great civil war had brought inflation, false values, false prosperity to the land. The Rebellion ended, and the wave of progress having rolled back and left the business of the nation stranded, hard times, money stringency, ruin, swept from the East. The great Bank of California, mother of speculation, inflation, and false business morals, went down, down with crime and blunders; and though it was restored, it was not in time to save the other tottering bricks. The bank of Temple & Workman staggered under the blow, revived, stumbled again, and fell. It owed everybody; its books had not been balanced; its proprietors, unused to this business, floundered in a sea of confusion. Mortgages floated them for a time, till in the person of E. J. Baldwin, a lucky gambler in mining stocks, the trembling firm found a "friend." He came to their rescue with a loan and a promise; the loan for some $250,000 was to bear interest at two per cent. a month!—two per cent. a month!—to compound monthly! To save appearances the amount was placed in the body of the instrument to represent a principal that was content with a nominal one per cent.—two per cent. to compound in default of payment of interest; making a loan at the rate of three per cent. a month compounding monthly!

The storm burst and the deluge came; the firm was ruined; Joseph Workman committed suicide; assignees, receivers, proceedings in bankruptcy, and Reuben Lloyd, attorney for E. J. Baldwin, followed in quick succession. To foreclose this Baldwin mortgage it was assigned to Camilo Martin, and proceedings instituted in the United States Circuit Court, the Hon. Lorenzo Sawyer, Judge. The creditors employed Messrs. Lattimer and Morrow; the family, E. Volney Howard; somebody else, James Eastman. Last week a decree was entered against the estate for $576,754 52 and costs. The attorneys foreclosing were allowed $12,000.

The certificates of deposit, something like a million of dollars, representing the accumulations of toiling men and hard-working depositors, are worth five cents on the dollar, and the land embraced in the mortgage is to be sold in four parcels, instead of being so subdivided into farms that individuals of moderate means could become purchasers.

We do not impugn the integrity nor good sense of Judge Lorenzo Sawyer, but if he knew the land as well as we do he would know that 20,000 of these acres are easily divisible into small farms, and that in this shape they would have brought $1,000,000; that the two homesteads of Temple and Workman, the mill, the town property, ought to have been sold in separate parcels. The hill lands, properly divided into larger tracts, would have brought another million of dollars; and with honest computation of the money advanced by Lucky Baldwin, a reasonable rate of interest for its use, a proper mode of sale, every creditor of this unfortunate firm of insolvent bankers would have been paid in full.

Twelve thousand dollars were allowed as attorney's fees to foreclose this mortgage. So far as the simple work of foreclosing this or any other mortgage is concerned, it may be done by any lawyer's clerk; and this work undoubtedly was done by one of Mr. Lloyd's salaried clerks, who does not get more than $100 a month. Yet Judge Sawyer allows $12,000 for a work that would have been liberally compensated at $500. The employment of McAllister & Berger to swell the total of this decree was not properly chargeable as proceedings in foreclosure. Judge Sawyer in 1852—then a better lawyer than any named in this romance—worked for $100 a month. His salary is now, we believe, $6,000. So Mr. Lloyd's clerk, in a labor not requiring one week, earned a two-years' salary of Judge Sawyer, and a compensation equal to ten years of his time when he was a salaried attorney.

No creditor can come in as redemptioner under this sale, because the amount in gold coin is beyond the means of other than a few wealthy men. Thus this great estate, with its mansions and mill, its orange and olive groves, its orchards of lemons and walnuts, its vineyards, its nearly thirty thousand acres of rich valley land, will be acquired by the stock gambler, surnamed Lucky, upon an expenditure of money not equivalent to one-tenth of its value. The farmers of the valley of the San Gabriel, the depositors in the bank, and creditors of the estate, will be permitted to come in as tenants under this great landed lord, who will, when he adds this property to others, have fifty thousand acres of land in the valley of Los Angeles. They will pay him one-quarter of their crops, their toil, their lives, to swell his income, and with it he will build opera houses, and his opera house will have queens of half the world, blazing in jewels and dressed in gorgeous robes, adorning his private box.

CHAPTER III.

If this were a true story there would be those who would say that something was wrong in the constitution of a society, of government, of courts, out of which could come such disastrous results; that under a better regulated condition of things these calamities to the families and children of Messrs. Temple and Workman would not have occurred. If there had been an honest Bank Commission the affairs of this bank would have been disclosed before serious loss could have occurred. If we had had laws against usury, regulating the interest of money, such a decree could never have been obtained.

If our courts had an equity jurisdiction to have cleared the proceedings from everything that was oppressive, burdensome, and unfair, so that honest justice might have been done between man and man, then Mr. Workman had not now been filling a suicide's grave. If Judge Sawyer had not drifted away from a proper estimate of lawyers' services, by a false and spurious esprit de corps that makes lawyers swear for lawyers, and had not acquired a mistaken judgment how to sell farm lands at the best price by the testimony of all sorts of land experts except the farmers who desired to purchase that they might till, there would have been a different outcome to all this business. It will be a curious postscript to this novelette to some day print, as we will, the bill of costs in this case—how much was paid to assignees, receivers, commissioners, sheriffs, clerks, experts, witnesses; for mileage, commissions, per diems, percentages, and all the luxurious accessories that come out of a fat goose that's picked.

If this were a true story, and not a mere romance, there would be a moral in it; and the stern moralist who thinks that men are equally endowed by their creator with life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, might ask if the laws that enable property to be thus acquired are not in some degree unjust and oppressive?—whether the law is not affording opportunities for the acquisition of great estates, to the prejudice of the interests of the people?—whether in a government republican in form it would not be well to inhibit the Luckys from acquiring such great landed estates? Practical men of the middle class of society will soon be apt to inquire how long they are to stand between the two destructive elements—the men of great wealth, who exert all the devices that enable them to acquire property to escape taxation, and the great mob of idlers, tramps, and vagabonds, who have nothing to tax? How long will it be before this skeleton of agrarianism and communism, that now crouches upon the sand-lots, intrigues in ward politics, and hides itself in poverty and rags, will be an outspoken, rampant, aggressive, political force? Would it not be well for our very rich men to begin to study the signs of the times, and by a somewhat less selfish, and somewhat more generous, policy, begin to more kindly treat the beast they ride?

CHAPTER IV.

If the people of Los Angeles have any thing like public spirit; if they would preserve their valley from the desolation of being a rich man's paradise; if they would see it blossom under the cultivation of men and women who would own it; if they would convert it from a sheep ranch and coral into fruitful farms, and have it settled by intelligent people instead of sheep, and hogs, and land monopolists; if they would have their city prosper in the midst of a prosperous community; if they would have a million of busy toilers about it to give it business and to send live currents of trade through its dull and pulseless arteries; if they would breathe the breath of life under the ribs of its present death, let them make war against their only enemy—the land grabber, the land monopolist, the land pirate that makes the small farmer walk the plank or swing at the yard-arm of their low, black craft.

The man who tills his acres, broad though they may be, has some claim to consideration, but the land speculator who spreads himself over God's soil like a great black spider with his prehensile and poisonous tentacles should be crushed out of existence by a system of taxation that would discriminate against the land gambler in favor of him who cultivates. It would not be a desirable condition of things if such a story as we have drawn upon our imagination to narrate could be possible. It would not be creditable to our legislative or judicial system if bankers with two and a half millions of land and real estate values could fail, and their small creditors be robbed of more than a million of their hard earnings, when one creditor for $280,000 could, by process of the courts interpreting contracts, secure not less than eight times the money he advanced upon usurious interest.

The Chinese question has been under consideration for twenty-five years upon the Pacific Coast. It has been exhausted by writers pro and con. Every statesman and prominent citizen of the nation who has visited us has been invited to observe the effects of Chinese immigration. A Congressional Committee has visited our State and taken testimony in reference thereto. The press, the clergy, the politicians, the business men, the professional men of the coast have given expression to an almost universal public sentiment: that it would be a wise policy to restrict it. After debate in Congress, and after deliberate consideration, a restrictive enactment passes, and yet the measure is in doubt. It is said the President will veto it, and veto it in obedience to the wishes of a religious sentiment of the Methodist Church, of which he and his wife are professing members. If this religious organization is the high tribunal of ultimate appeal which is to decide this great political question, would it not be well to refer it to the Methodist Church of the Pacific Coast? We will venture the prediction that the lay and clerical members thereof would give an overwhelming vote in favor of restricting Chinese immigration.

If the question could be left to a popular vote of the Chinese themselves, it would be overwhelmingly in favor of the bill. We declare that it is our opinion that if this question could be considered in a convention of professing Christians and honest-minded clergymen of all denominations upon this coast, there would not be found five per cent. of dissenting opinion. There is probably not one clergyman on this coast that will, in his to-morrow's sermon or prayer, attempt to tell his congregation or his God that Chinese immigration is desirable. There is probably not one intelligent professor of religion in California who is disinterested and honest that will not admit that the demoralization and injury these people do the Christian religion and Christian civilization far outweighs any corresponding good that may be done them.

A pious correspondent sends us the following selected meditations—one for each day of the first week in Lent: "Pluck up the stones, ye sluggards, and break the devil's head with them. Every one draws the water to his own mill. The net of the sleeping takes. Better a grape for me than two figs for thee. Men cut broad thongs from other men's leather. One ass nicknames another Longears. He who serves two masters has to lie to one." If one will give his mind to meditating on this kind of things he can live through the first week without other nourishment. But on the second week he'll require his whole ARGONAUT.

A colored woman was recently made insane by the Rev. Mr. Talmage's preaching, and the doctors are treating her views with reference to the unfeeling and unfeeling.

MISS ARMSTRONG'S HOMICIDE.

A few weeks ago some workmen engaged in removing an old mansion on the corner of California and Mason Streets were considerably puzzled at finding a number of copper wires connecting the bath-room with a room above. The owners of the property were equally puzzled, having never before known of their existence. The wires were removed, and nothing more thought of the matter. This recalls to my mind an incident which many will now remember:

On the 14th of July, 1862, a Professor Croftly was found dead in the bath-room I have just mentioned. Croftly was well known among scientific men as a professor of chemistry, and, besides, had a large circle of acquaintance in this city. He was supposed at the time to have committed suicide, and his death furnished a three days' sensation for the press. The accounts in four leading newspapers materially conflicted, which made the matter all the more interesting to the public. All agreed, however, with a singular unanimity of opinion, that he was dead. Even the Call, while not positively admitting his demise in the article, virtually conceded it in the head lines.

Croftly, when found, was lying in the bath, covered with wounds of so curious a nature that no one could explain how they came to be inflicted. They were deep, ragged, and gaping, and there was no instrument found in the room with which they might have been made. Even the detectives who visited the scene of Croftly's death shook their heads and were at sea. Those who discovered the body found the door securely fastened from the inside, and were obliged to burst it open. The room had no other means of egress or ingress.

"Suicide," remarked one of the reporters.
"How came those wounds on the back?" asked a detective.

"Who else was here?" responded the journalist. And neither man had anything more to say.

A post mortem revealed nothing new, except that the physicians found a state of the blood which they could not satisfactorily account for.

"He was frozen," said a young physician, whose opinion seemed to have its foundation only in surmise.

"You seem to have forgotten that this is July," remarked an elderly gentleman connected with a University.

The newspapers vied with each other building up ingenious theories accounting for the affair, the Coroner's jury found a verdict of suicide, for want of anything better, and the remains were buried.

The reader who desires to get a more detailed account of the affair—as related at the time—can do so by referring to the files of any of the city papers of that date. In fact, I would produce them here did space permit. The main thing, however, is to clear up the mystery of Croftly's remarkable death.

He came to the coast in 1860, and was reputed to be a man of sufficient means to live handsomely on the interest of his money. He stopped a while at the Oriental Hotel, and there met Edward Dean, a young man, who, like himself, was a gentleman of leisure. The two became intimate, and, finally, tired of hotel life, they determined to seek quarters which would be more congenial and home-like. They found these quarters at the residence of Richard Armstrong, a mutual acquaintance, who lived in very desirable quarters on the corner of Mason and California Streets. Before the costly habitations of Stanford, Crocker, and other millionaires sprang into existence, Armstrong's house came very near being called a mansion. Armstrong rented Croftly and Dean three elegant rooms, partly because he liked the men personally, and partly because he was running on a pretty close margin financially. The two found their new quarters as attractive as men of taste could wish. Armstrong was a widower, and the three men had some rare old times together evenings. His cellar was stocked with excellent wines, and his library with books of the very rarest vintage of literature.

One evening a back cove up to the door, and a woman, clad in wraps, bounded up the steps with astonishing vigor and agility, like most Western girls who are blessed with good health and animal spirits. She dashed into the hall in a style that sent a perceptible tremor throughout the house, and fell into old Armstrong's arms. A fusillade of kisses followed.

It was his daughter, Alice.

Next morning the usual formalities of introduction were gone through, and Miss Armstrong became one of the fixtures of the place. A few days before her arrival Professor Croftly had suggested the idea of living somewhere nearer the centre of the city. After Miss Armstrong entered the house, however, no further allusion was made to the proposed removal. The Professor began to pay Miss Armstrong the most devout attentions, and, as a matter of course, she fell madly in love with young Dean, who paid her none. It is generally conceded that one of the most effective ways of wooing a woman is to let some other man do it. The woman tires of the indefatigable lover, and the man who treats her with indifference is soon preferred. Some men learn this by experience; Dean discovered it by accident.

He presently began to turn his knowledge to excellent account, and a bitter rivalry sprang up between the two men. Croftly soon realized that he was not the favorite, and never for the life of him could ascertain how a woman could form an attachment for a man who hadn't the remotest idea of chemistry. He forgot that he was somewhat old, and that some women dislike to cast their bridal wreaths upon the snow. He finally determined to put his rival out of the way, and set about laying his plans.

After a couple of weeks' deliberation he concluded to murder Dean, and do it so neatly and scientifically that discovery would be next to impossible.

One day I was in his room—being an occasional visitor—and observed him busily engaged in chemical experiments. Said he: "Did you ever realize that the conditions which result in congelation might be produced chemically?"

I confessed that I had never given the subject much thought.

"Of course, you understand that sudden evaporation uses cold."

"I knew nothing of the kind at the time, but nodded assent rather than acknowledge my ignorance."

"I can produce ice instantaneously," he continued. "This is my assistant," pointing to an electric battery. "With a current of say one hundred omes of electricity, I can accelerate enough evaporation to freeze instantly one hundred gallons of water."

Here the Professor took a basin of water and poured in a small quantity of colorless liquid. "This is ammonia," said he. "But this"—here he added about as much of some other liquid—"is something else."

"What is it?"

"No one knows but myself."

I deemed it impertinent to question him further. He then attached the wires of his battery to the water.

"When I make the connecting current the water will become ice."

I watched, much interested, and he laid his hand on a piece of metal which was part of the apparatus, and the turning of which caused the currents to connect. He turned the brass piece, and instantly a cloud of vapor rose from the surface of the water. Crystals shot from the sides of the basin with astonishing rapidity, and there was a sharp, crackling sound as the water expanding in it caused a strain upon the basin, which pressed out the sides.

"With five hundred omes," continued the Professor, "I can freeze five hundred cubic feet of water."

I left the house much impressed with the discovery made by the Professor, and a few days afterward learned of his death. The public considered it a case of suicide. I made a careful examination of the premises, and came to a different conclusion. It was the hand of Alice Armstrong that killed Professor Croftly.

Let us go back a little. After the Professor realized what could be done with his new appliance of electricity, he determined to utilize it in the murder of Dean. He hit upon the grand idea of freezing him in the bath.

"She will not love him cold," he said, and began to arrange his plans. Dean was fond of the bath. He retired at midnight, and always took a bath just before. The bath-room of Armstrong's house was an exceptionally good one. It was situated but a short distance from the suit occupied by the Professor and Dean. The tank was of marble, eight feet wide, ten feet long, and six feet deep, capable of holding four hundred and eighty cubic feet of water. Croftly connected the bath with his own room by means of wires. One entered the bath by the waste-pipe. He reached this by digging in the garden under the pretext of planting flowers. The wire ran down the side of the house and into the ground. It was concealed from observation by a lilac bush. The other was connected with the pipe which furnished the water. He bored a hole in the wall and found the pipe, as he expected, running in the rear of the room close to the floor. He then increased the jars of his battery, and raised its strength to five hundred omes.

No suspicion was excited by this, as he had been for months before making electrical experiments. His apparatus was fixed on a stand near the wall, and the wires from it connected with those leading to the bath. When the apparatus was removed its wires would be pulled away from the others, and no trace would be left of previous connection.

On the night of the 3d of July all was in readiness. Croftly laid his plans with nicety and deliberation. Dean always took a bath before retiring, which was about midnight. In the morning Croftly had purchased two seats at the Metropolitan Theatre and given them to Armstrong, who took his daughter to the play. By eight o'clock everything was quiet in the house. Croftly knew that he was safe from interruption until eleven o'clock, and perhaps later.

He now began to work in earnest. He filled the tank with water, and then tested his wires over and over again. Everything was in splendid working order. He calculated that he could embed his rival in ice about midnight, and then turn on hot water. In the morning there would be no trace left of the freezing. He rubbed his hands with delight, and then poured in the chemical proportions, wherein lay the secret of his discovery. Having done this, he went back to his room and laid the two connecting wires of his apparatus side by side upon the instrument. It was now nine o'clock. He turned the gas up to a full blaze to disperse the shadows, took an easy chair, and determined to read until Dean's return. The silence of the house became unbearable, and the sultriness of the apartment more and more oppressive. His excitement began to tell upon him, and he was no longer cool. The man who is about to kill suffers more pangs than he who knows he is about to die. Croftly paced up and down the apartment, and then a strange fascination drew him toward the bath. He entered the room again and stood gazing into the motionless water in the tank, and murmured to himself: "Four hundred and eighty cubic feet, five hundred omes."

There was a gas jet above the tank, and its faint glow was reflected in the water. To Croftly the atmosphere seemed to have been generated in a blast-furnace. The water looked cool and refreshing. There was yet more than an hour. Croftly turned the catch of the door from force of habit, and, throwing off his clothes, plunged in. He could discover no disagreeable trace of the chemicals, and once more he felt the delightful sensation of being cool. It was so agreeable that he began to reflect in his mind whether he would not continue to enjoy the bath and postpone the murder.

Suddenly the hall door was slammed, and he heard the voice of Miss Armstrong talking with her father. The pair had indeed returned, having left the theatre because they did not care to be bored with Mrs. Bowers' hackneyed rendering of "Queen Elizabeth." Passing along the hall, they saw the Professor's door open, and the gas in full blast. Armstrong hated to see anything go to waste, and told his daughter to go in and lower the gas, as the room was unoccupied. Miss Armstrong went in, as directed, and her father passed up stairs. While alone the girl could not resist the temptation to pull a little note from her bosom and read it again. She had received it that morning, and had already perused it about twenty times. It read:

"DEAR ALICE:—Will you be my wife? Yours,
"EDWARD DEAN."

Dean was a young man who, when he had anything to say, said it at once, and stopped on reaching the point.

She pored over the letter about five minutes, and then returning it to its place, looked about her. Her eye presently fell on the instrument connected with Croftly's battery. She took up one of the wires, and was about to lay it on the other, and see if there would be a shock, when her courage failed her and she dropped it across its mate. A spark flashed out, which startled her. She drew back, lowered the gas, and went to bed.

At the instant the wires were connected, Croftly was in the centre of the bath. A shock and terrible chill passed through his frame, and he felt a cloud of vapor rising from the surface of the water and sweeping into his face. Myriads of spear-like crystals shot out from the edge of the tank and converged toward him like so many shafts of death. He realized his situation, and dashed to reach the steps; as he did so, he threw himself against the jagged edges of a sheet of ice half an inch thick. There was a frightful gash in his side, from which blood was streaming. He struggled madly amid the ice, and every throe brought fresh wounds. His limbs moved no longer in water; they were enveloped in slush. The ice closed about him like a vice. He was dead.

After the evaporation of the chemicals the electricity no longer had any effect, and the heat of the room began to tell upon the ice. The mass melted, and by four o'clock in the morning the corpse of Croftly was floating upon the surface of the bath. He was not missed until nine o'clock next morning, when Dean burst open the door and found him as described.

The rest is known. The jury gave a verdict of suicide, and Miss Armstrong and Edward Dean were married on the 22d of the same month.

SAM DAVIS.
VIRGINIA CITY, NEV., February, 1879.

The Gift of Tears.

It is common nowadays to say of a tragic or an emotional actress, when she fails to move her audience perceptibly, that she has not the Gift of Tears. There are some fine dramatic artists who plainly have this lack on the stage, though it is altogether probable that they possess such gift and can use it effectively and plentifully in private. Many actresses, even clever ones, act far better off than on the stage, and for this reason never get the public reputation they deserve. The poorest of them, if they could and would delineate in the theatre what they delineate in their own drawing-room or chamber, would awaken tumultuous applause. All women, as a rule, are actresses more or less. The great majority have a degree of histrionic talent and exercise it unconsciously, though seldom, if ever, in vain. And the principal source of their success is their tears, which would seem to have been given them as a set-off to the superior strength, aggressiveness, and rapacity of men. Poets may sing of idle tears, and of knowing not what they mean; but tears are not idle, and they hold a deep significance when shed by a woman who understands the art of weeping.

Woman's grandest achievements of a lachrymose sort are always before an audience of one, and that one a man. If she fails in an aqueous way on the stage, it is because too many witness her performance. If the men who sit it through unaffected and dry-eyed could be exposed singly to her influence, and it were her interest to touch them, most of them could no doubt be made to blubber like school-boys. Really many men, particularly men of the Anglo-Saxon race, have a dread of weeping, especially where they are visible; and they have nearly an equal dread of seeing women weep, conscious that tears not only produce sympathy, but are apt to be contagious. They seldom know what to do when a woman's eyes begin to flow. They are in a most awkward dilemma. If they leave her in her sorrow, they are barbarous; if they remain, they are like to show themselves fools. They hate to appear as barbarians; they abhor to be considered fools. Go or stay, they will regret it. Do one of the two things, and they are sure to wish they had done the other. Their sole security is in meeting women who do not weep; and that woman has not been born.

The Gift of Tears! What a potent and terrible gift it is! How it has prevailed over man from the earliest recorded time, and prevailed unquestionably over the pre-historic man. No hero of ancient or modern days has been able to withstand it. The iron will of Julius Caesar, foremost figure of the antique world, was melted by Cleopatra's passionate tears. He could conquer Gaul; he could bend Rome to his purpose; he could subjugate the fiercest tribes; but he was vanquished again and again by Egypt's streaming eyes. Beneath them he forgot his armies, his fame, his ambition, his very self. The cruelest tyrants, like Nero and Caligula, were humanized, and demonized at times, by Fabina, Poppæa, and Milonia Cæsonia's briny drops. The great Napoleon, who had no faith in any living creature, who was wholly destitute of moral principle, was as wax while he gazed into Josephine's swimming eyes. And ordinary mortals feel that they have no chance wherever woman can reach them, and open the flood-gate of her heart.

How many thousands of men there are, the earth over, who would rejoice at the creation of a woman deprived of the Gift of Tears! They would be delighted, if not for themselves, at least for their posterity, hoping she might be prolific and found a fair race incapable of crying. Then they would feel some sense of distant security, which they never can while women is constituted as she is. What a divine being woman would be, they think, without her watery ways! But how can they tell? They can not conceive of a woman minus her liquid sensibilities, any more than they could conceive of themselves innocent of egotism. They may long for her dispossession of the Gift of Tears; but, were they put to it, would they unsex her by a wish, and make her a creature neither masculine nor feminine? They can not, they dare not, answer; they can only murmur, with countless vivid recollections of bow they have been wheedled and undone, "Alas! alas! the Gift of Tears."

An eminent pianist, having suffered much from the irrepresible conversation of drawing-room audiences, devised the other day a means of giving a lesson to the town. He arranged with his violin, his violoncello, and the rest, that the music should come to a sudden stop in the midst of the loudest passage of the piece at a given signal from him. It was done. The bawling and shouting voices were left, in the twinkling of an eye, high and dry, as it were, upon a shore of silence. Joyous, clear, and distinct above them all rose a voice from the foremost seats—the voice of a lady: "We always fry ours in lard."

A STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

It was two o'clock in the morning. The almost exhausted lamps in the hallway gave but a glimmering light, and I was retiring to my apartments, when I thought I heard a noise at the foot of the staircase. I called out, twice: "Who's there? What do you wish?" and was answered in a soft and touching voice: "It is I; don't you see that I am waiting for him?"

As I was not the person expected I was walking away, when the same voice called to me: "Pray, come here; but do not make a noise." I approached, and near the last step, behind the pillar, perceived a young woman dressed in black, and her hair falling in disorder on her shoulders. "I never did you harm," said she; "pray, do not hurt me. I have touched nothing. I am here in a corner where I can not be seen. This injures nobody; but don't say anything about it. Don't mention it to him. He'll come down presently. I shall see him, and then I'll go away."

My surprise increased at every word, and I tried in vain to recollect this unfortunate creature. Her voice was perfectly unknown to me as well as her person. She continued to speak, but her ideas became so confused that I could discover nothing but the disorder of her head and the distress of her heart. I interrupted her and endeavored to bring back her attention to our situation.

"If somebody else," said I, "had seen you before I did at the foot of the great staircase?"

"Ah!" said she, "I see very well that you do not know all. He alone is somebody. And when he goes away he does not, like you, listen to all he hears. He only hears her who is above. Formerly it was I; now it is she. But it will not last! Oh, no, no, it will not last!"

At these words she took a miniature from her bosom, and seemed to examine it with much attention. A moment after we heard a door open. A servant holding a light at the top of the stairs enabled me to see a young man, who tripped lightly down stairs. As he passed, this hapless victim was seized with trembling, and scarcely had he disappeared when her strength gave away, and she fell on the lower step behind the pillar that concealed us. I was going to call for assistance, but the fear of exposing her prevented me. I took the poor, senseless creature in my arms. The shutting of the door above was then heard. She started at the noise and seemed to revive a little. I held her hands in one of mine, and with the other supported her head. She tried to speak, but the sounds she endeavored to utter were stifled by grief. We remained some time in a silence which I did not dare to interrupt, when, at last, having entirely recovered her senses, she said to me, in a soft, faltering voice:

"Ah! I see very well; I should have warned you. The accident which has just happened to me must have made you uneasy, for you are good and kind. You must have been afraid; and I am not surprised at it. I was afraid, like you, when I found myself in this situation, that I was going to die; and I feared it because it would have deprived me of the only means of seeing him—which is all that I have left! But I have found out—yes, I have found out—that I can not die. Just now, when he passed by, I left myself to go to him. If he dies, I should die to; but without that it is impossible. We only die where we live; and it is not in myself, but in him that I exist. Some time ago I was mad! Oh, yes; very mad indeed! And that will not surprise you, as it was the beginning of his going up this staircase. My reason is now returned; everything goes and comes, and so does that. This miniature, which you see, restored it. It is a portrait—but not of my friend. What good would that do? He is very well already; he has no occasion to improve; he has nothing to alter. If you did but know whose portrait it is. It is the wicked woman above stairs. The cruel creature, what trouble she has given me since she approached my heart! It was so content, so happy; but she has changed and destroyed all. One day—I recollect it very well—I happened to go alone to my friend's room. Alas! he was no longer there. I found this portrait on his table. I took it; ran away with it; and since then I am better."

After saying this she began to laugh, talked of the public drives, of phaetons, and of horses; and I once more perceived a perfect confusion in her ideas. Some moments after she left off speaking I drew near to her, and asked her why she preserved with so much care the portrait of the wicked woman up stairs.

"How!" answered she; "what! you do not know? Why, it is my only hope. I take it every day, put it by the side of my looking-glass, and arrange my features like hers; and by taking pains I shall resemble her exactly. I will then go and see my friend; he will be satisfied with me; and will no longer be obliged to go to her above stairs; for except that, I am sure he likes me best. Only think on what trifles our happiness depends: on some features which he no longer found disposed to his liking. Why did he not say so? I would have done then what I do now; and he would not have been obliged to apply to a stranger. Nothing was more easy, and it would have saved us both a great deal of trouble; but without doubt he did not think of it. Every evening I wait at the foot of the staircase. He never comes down before the hall clock has struck two; and then, as I can't see, I count the beatings of my poor heart. Since I have been in possession of the portrait I count every day some pulsations less. But it is late, and I must go away. Adieu!"

I accompanied her to the street door; as soon as without, she turned to the left, and I walked on some paces beside her; she then fixed her eyes on the stream of light the lamps formed before us. "You see all these lamps," said she; "they are agitated by every breath of air. It is the same with my heart; it burns like them; but they consume, and I burn for ever!"

I continued to follow her. "Stop," said she; "again return home; I carry with me a part of your sleep, and I am to blame, for sleep is very sweet; it is even so to me. I see in it what is past!"

I feared to afflict her by insisting any longer, and left her. I then returned home, my mind and heart equally agitated, and this unfortunate girl still before my eyes. I reflected on the cause of her anguish; and some regret, and the remembrance of some past circumstances, mingled with my tears.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

H. R. J.

THE TRUE PHILOSOPHER.

I hold the true philosopher
Not he who wears a solemn frown—
Who speaks alone of those who err,
And swears the world is upside down—
Who aims at every shining mark
The shafts of wisdom tipped with hate—
Who walks for ever in the dark,
And deems men's lives are ruled by fate;

But he who looks across the tide
Of troubles incident to man,
Still seeking on the other side
Fulfillment of some bounteous plan—
Who feels men's hearts are made of stuff
That should resist each petty grief,
And bravely turns from each rebuff
Unconquered in his strong belief.

Who mourns not for the olden time,
Declaring, with a sombre sneer,
The world is more debased with crime
And life more wretched year by year,
But boldly says that men to-day
Are nobler than they ever were,
And doubts this doctrine of decay—
He is the true philosopher.

The cynic's crown is lightly won,
And simple are his scornful ways,
For, ever since the world begun,
'Tis easier to rail than praise.
A moment—you may cloud the stream,
And dim its rippling breast with clay,
But it will wear its silver sheen
Again the livelong summer's day,

The morning sun that lights the grass
With diamond flashes from the dew,
The morning winds that as they pass
Waft dreams of flowers the lattice through,
The morning hopes that fill the heart
And all its thrilling pulses stir
When on to bear his earnest part
Goes forth the true philosopher,

Are deep, convincing evidence
That smiles befit us more than tears—
That, call it fate or providence,
Some mighty power directs the years;
And if we take the good and ill,
And chide the cynic's heresy,
With humble faith and steadfast will,
We have the true philosophy.

OAKLAND, February, 1879.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The Unborn Soul.

Life! I have heard strange tales of you,
Of your weird winds, and starlit dew,
And temples wonderfully cold;
Your cities full of loneliness;
Your twin souls, glad in one caress;
Your faces passion-worn and old.

I have known souls that came from you
With sad brows bound with weary rue,
And after them a weeping came;
But some without a sound go by
Crowned with unchallenged purity,
And eyes intense with sudden flame.

Blind cravings urge me in my dreams:
I am not yet, but still it seems
I shall be soon. The hidden source
Of being seems to slowly fill;
I wait with passive yearning still
For the great flood of human force.

The souls as yet ungarmented
Press round me without nose or tread;
And there is one dear soul who saith
That she will clothe herself ere long,
And if I find her in the throng
We shall have love through life and death.

NILES, December, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

Pansies for Effie.

Ho! little yellow faces,
In your purple velvet hoods,
Peeping out from hiding places
Where the callow groundling broods,
Say, are ye fairy changelings
With your faces dusk and rare?
Are ye royal Indian children
Caught in some enchanter's snare?

What strange mesmeric talisman
Is yours to ease the heart
With magic touch, to soothe its pain
And bid its grief depart!
O heart's-ease! teach to me thy charm,
Rarest of all there is,
And, shielded thus from every harm,
I ask no other bliss.

Thou prayer in flowers, thou type in rest,
When life with me is done
Spread thy rich wings upon my breast,
Flower, butterfly, in one,
No lily pale, no jasmine fair,
Shall hint of my release,
But thou alone shalt nestle there—
God's gracious gift, Heart's-ease.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

LOUISE H. WEBB.

Song.

Hush, hush, my heart! Sing softly!
Your sweet song rings so clear
To my happy, listening fancy,
It seems the world must hear.
"He loves me, oh, he loves me,"
Rings out so sweet and clear
To my happy, happy fancy,
It seems the world must hear.

Shine, shine, my eyes, less brightly!
Your new-born light will be
A tell-tale of the story
He whispered soft to me.
To my soul's most quiet shelter
Its strange, new joy would flee—
Then oh, shine not so brightly,
For all the world to see!

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

OUR MINISTERING ANGELS.

The ladies of Japan are said to gild their teeth; and those of the East Indies to paint them red; while in Cjuzert the fashion is to render them black.

A Chicago paper says that "a young lady should never stretch her feet out in company." Very good advice, especially if her feet are long enough already.

While a Massachusetts man was on his knees praying, his insane wife killed him. The idea that he was wearing out his pants at the knees was more than her brain could stand.

The King of the Cannibal Islands always speaks of lovely woman as—

"A creature not too bright and good
For human nature's daily food."

Stylish lady holding a lapdog is about ready to leave the car. Dog manifests impatience. Lady says: "Wait, darling, till mamma puts on her gloves." Passengers roar with laughter.

A woman—a real live woman—has the good sense to write: "First in the qualifications advisable in a husband, I would suggest virtue, but if this were made essential, I am inclined to think the whole generation of women would die old maids. Of course, there are virtuous men in the world—indeed, I have been assured of this fact by gentlemen themselves, so I cannot doubt it—but I am skeptical enough to fear that the supply of virtuous candidates might run short; therefore, let us ignore this subject for the present and pass on." Thanks, a thousand thanks!

The elderly King of Holland delivered this somewhat enthusiastic address of welcome to his young wife when they first arrived at Dutch territory, the other day: "I am delighted to be able to welcome your Majesty on the soil of the Netherlands. Your Majesty may be proud of the reception with which you have met. As King of Holland, I am deeply moved. Your Majesty may rest assured that no queen on earth is at this moment richer than you are in love, in honors, and in attachment from a famous, honorable, and faithful people. Long live the Queen of Holland!" Truly it must be fine to be "an old man's darling," and have him call you "Your Majesty!"

Mary Clemmer Ames writes of Susan B. Anthony: "I like Susan. Her jaw has the resolute grip it would naturally get in a life-long tussle to have its own way. Her eyes are round, large, and gray, and look straight at you. She has no end of common sense, and lots of keen wit, no sentiment, and little culture in the æsthetic sense. But she is as affectionate and as simple-minded as a child; a brave, noble woman, who has given her whole life to her convictions, and in battling for the equality that she does is simply true to the traditions of her Quaker birth and education. I like to look upon her at a safe but silent distance, where she can not turn and rend me for my silence on 'the cause.'"

Some ingenious Indianapolis ladies are painting buttons for their dresses and necklaces for their pretty throats. The common wooden button-moulds are first covered with a layer of soft cloth, and then with silk of any desired shade, and then painted with the least of flowers, each button a different blossom or leaf. The necklaces, covered and painted, are formed of graduated buttons, and just encircle the neck. A large pendant is made by cutting off squarely two sides of the largest size of button-moulds. This necklace, tied with long ends of floating ribbons, is lovely. Scrap-book pictures give excellent models for the flower designs, and the painting is very easily accomplished. Common cuff-buttons are covered and decorated in the same manner.

Mrs. Mackay is one of the most charming hostesses of the American colony in Paris. Accomplished and intellectual (she speaks French and Spanish as perfectly as she does English), the charms of her mind would eclipse those of her person, were not both thrown into the shade by the exquisite loveliness and sweetness of her noble and elevated nature. She is very lovely, and still quite young. Her form is petite and faultlessly proportioned, her hair dark, and her eyes of exceeding beauty, being large and lustrous, of a dark clear blue, shaded with long black lashes. Unspoiled and unspoilable by a position that would have turned the heads of ninety-nine women out of a hundred, she wears its onerous dignities as gracefully and with as little ostentation as she might a fresh-plucked flower. All the ridiculous stories that have appeared respecting her in the papers are pure inventions. She never wanted to illuminate the Arc de Triomphe, for instance, and never offered to buy it. Gentle, gracious, generous, and kindly-hearted is she, and the world is all the better for having such a woman in it.

The Princess Louise is exceedingly interested in church-work, in Sunday-schools, and in schemes for the relief and comfort of the poor. She recently entertained at Rideau Hall all the teachers and pupils of the Sunday-school connected with the church which she attends. The servants were dismissed, and the hungry children were served by the Princess, the Marquis, and their suite. Addressing a pretty little girl the Princess asked her if she would not take more cake. The little guest declined with awe; and her hostess, fearing that bashfulness was standing in the way, pressed her again. Again she declined. Her Highness, struck by the sweet modesty and child-like simplicity of the pretty creature, cut a large slice from the cake and said: "Well, my dear, you must, at least, take this home as a present from me; let me put it in your pocket." The child hesitated, blushed, and exhibited a decided unwillingness to accept the proffered gift. And the more unwilling she seemed, the more charmed the Princess became with her innocent look and blushing diffidence. Using a gentle force, she found the poor young visitor, when lo! to her infinite astonishment, covered that it was already filled to overflowing with cake, which this bland little heatben Chinese had snatched from the table.

Mr. Thomas Archer, a well-known London littérateur, has written a book on the important events in history. He necessarily omits all mention of what he probably esteems the most important event of all—the publication of his book.

In a review of English literature for 1878 a writer in the Daily News cites only one American work as worthy of attention. This is Mr. Henry James, Jr.'s, Europeans; but the writer, with admirable effrontery, hastens to claim it as belonging to Europe, "not only by its title and its subject, but also, and above all, by its literary execution." For other American writers there is only a general allusion to "the ordinary amount of low comedy—which has taken for its principal theme the plague of children."

Eugene Fromentin's Sahara and Sahel, a beautiful French book of travels in Algeria, is a paper quarto of four hundred pages, uncut, and contains twelve etchings and forty-five relief engravings. This work and Sir Joseph Hooker's Morocco and the Great Atlas, which Macmillan & Co. have just published, form two of the most sumptuous books of Old World travel that have been printed in many a day.

A book collector, well known to dealers in New York, has devoted several years to illustrating the works of five authors, at an expense of $40,000. These works are Shakespeare, Milton, Irving's Washington, Ticknor's Life of Prescott, and Scott's Waverley Novels.

Says Mr. Richard Grant White in the North American Review: "There are millions of people in England, and millions in America, and almost millions in Australia, to whose enjoyment of life novels are almost as necessary as food is to their life itself, all of whom take some credit to themselves for the time they pass in 'reading,' complacently contrasting themselves with idlers and those who are given up to the frivolities of life. As a child opens its mouth and has sugar plums put into it, so the ordinary novel reader sits quietly and thoughtlessly, and has a story poured through his eyes into his mind, or into what serves him in that capacity. It is in quite another spirit and with another purpose that great works of imagination are approached by those who can appreciate them."

We are nothing if not inflated braggarts. For years we have been printing it that this country was Herbert Spencer's chief support; that more of his works were sold here than in Great Britain, and that he attributed all his success to America. It now appears that the sale of the great philosopher's works in America is extremely small as compared with their sale in England, or even Germany.

Miss Anna E. Dickinson has written another comedy, and says, also, that she shall repeat her recent lecture oftener than she had intended. If there is anything in perseverance Miss Dickinson will some day eclipse Shakespeare as a dramatist, and drive all other lecturers from the field.

The late George Henry Lewes left an unfinished defense of Positive Philosophy, and the philosophers of that persuasion are moving heaven and earth to obtain the manuscript. They are afraid George Eliot will complete it.

"Josh Billings" says he has made a hundred thousand dollars "with his pen"—the profits of illiterature. The one hundred thousand dollars made with the pen of a forger are more honestly and decently earned.

Fanny Kemble's Records of a Girlhood is not selling very well, we suspect, for the publishers have taken the trouble to send us a lithograph "Literary Note" declaring that it is.

Queen Victoria's favorite authors are said to be Charles Dickens, George Eliot, Wilkie Collins, William Black, and Walter Scott. She has also a kind of intellectual tenderness for the author of an immortal work entitled—m! what is the title?—the book she wrote herself, you recollect.

Mr. James S. Goodman is the author of a newly published book on "The Boston of the Future." Being himself a Bostonian he probably means heaven.

Cowper's Task has been admirably illustrated by Mr. Birket Foster—so it was not written wholly in vain.

In Dick Sands, the Boy Captain, Mr. Jules Verne has excelled his former miracles by wrecking on the shore of Africa a ship bound from Australia to San Francisco. The wicked cook had placed a piece of iron near the compass. The iron drew the continent of Africa out of its place, probably.

The late Dr. Ramage's last work is Bible Echoes in Antiquities. Following the order of the Biblical books, he has collected from Greek and Roman writers passages containing parallel or similar thoughts. If these show that the Pagan writers were familiar with the Scriptures it probably shows something else.

WRECKED WITH MODJESKA.

After enduring the fervent heat of July at the Centennial, it was a pleasant change to find myself, August 17, 1876, among the passengers of the Colon steaming out of the harbor of New York, bound for San Francisco and home. Among our motley number in the cabin was a Polish lady (with her husband and son), then unknown as Modjeska, and unknown to fame. As the "Polish lady" she was known to all on shipboard, and to a few of us as the Countess Bozenta. Dame Rumor, as omnipresent on sea as on land, whispered in under tones that they were refugees, that P. Bozenta was a caricaturist, and that they were driven from unhappy Poland by autocratic fiat of the Czar for caricaturing some obnoxious officials of the Russian Government. Of the truth or falsity of this I know nothing. The quiet, silent man often sketched groups and scenes on shipboard, while apparently reading his paper or magazine, so life-like and at times so grotesque as to prove beyond all doubt that he might have so offended.

For three days we steamed southward, with skies so bright, weather so pleasant, and ocean so placid, that all the marine weather-prophets who said it would blow great guns "off Hatteras" were silenced and subdued to a level with us land-lubbers; but on the fourth day a change came over the scene, sudden and for a time appalling. While at divine service, and singing "Gates Ajar," there came a shock so severe as to throw many off their feet, followed instantly by the most frightful sounds of escaping steam. Nothing but remarkable presence of mind on the part of our heroic commander, Griffin, prevented a panic, and probably great loss of life. To have the door to the engine-room closed, to shut out the death-dealing steam, and to order all on deck in a firm, assuring tone, was all the work of a moment—but what a moment! glad, exultant song had died out in the wailing of despair, and the blanched faces of our little congregation I shall never forget.

I never saw Modjeska in mimic life, but I doubt if she ever equals in any impersonation the acting that here was real. With pallid face, firm set lips, and erect form, she awaited the coming of our awful doom; but, except to two of the ship's crew, the doom never came. And to us who leaned over the ship's side to see if she were sinking came each moment stronger and stronger the hope that the hull of the vessel was uninjured. This hope was fully realized in a few minutes, as soon as the immense volume of escaping steam permitted an examination of that part of the vessel. Doubtless the glad news that we were not in a sinking condition would have been received with loud rejoicing but for the death of the two men, who were killed instantly and utterly cooked by the steam.

Our disabled steamer now rolled lazily on the sea, helpless, but not hopeless. How eagerly we scanned the horizon all that delightful summer afternoon for some friendly sail that would see our signals of distress and come to our relief. And how we talked of and hoped for the success of a plan to send next day an open boat to Watling's Island, more than one hundred miles distant, to intercept a steamer; and all the time a strong sea-current was carrying us south-eastwardly and farther from the hope of aid. But, long before nightfall, far away to the westward we discovered a steamer. How provokingly for a long time she kept on her course to New York, and with what joy we hailed her final discovery of us! In our great joy even the bodies awaiting their burial at sunset were forgotten, and with exultant shouts we answered the call of the dinner gong.

I wish I could close this account by describing in fitting terms the after-dinner scene. A burial at sea is always a matter of serious interest to passengers; this was thrillingly so; and in some inexpressible manner the chords of sympathy were touched in every heart, and, with faces bathed in tears, we saw their bodies consigned to ocean's depths, and then turned our eyes to the vessel now within hailing distance and coming to our aid amid the gold and crimson splendors of a glorious sunset.

I shall never forget the sympathetic face of Modjeska as it appeared in this scene, nor its strong and strange contrast to the same face seen in the moment of peril a few hours before. Our week's trip back to New York—towed by the Etna, of the Atlas line—and how, over the cables that bound us to her, we transferred northern news and northern fruits for those of the tropics; the balmy weather all the way on our return; how we speculated on how we could speculate if in New York selling Pacific Mail Stock short; our arrival, and how I was prevented from reshipping on the Crescent City and hurried by rail across the continent to answer in person a telegram reporting a daughter as dying—all these matters are of little interest to you, reader, but help to make up a never-to-be-forgotten chapter in my experience, to be recalled with that delicious, indescribable thrill that always accompanies a strong admixture of sorrow and joy, or a sudden transition from tears to laughter. And no matter what victories may yet await Modjeska, I doubt if any achievement in mimic life will ever dim, much less efface, the memories of this part of her real life.

OAKLAND, February, 1878.

CHARLES F. LUCAS.

Obscure Intimations.

F.—We can not publish the letter of the crazy Dutchman "C. B." to Clara Morris. We could—and, if we dared, would—write her a better one ourselves.

SINGLELINE.—Your sermon is not available. God o' goodness! are we a pulpit?

SALIS.—Sometime, maybe; this Chinese question is bothering us now, and the grave seems a long way off.

"ALPHONSE KARR."—Thanks; we shall be pleased to consider it.

CONUNDRUM.—We shall have to give it up—to the writer.

LUCY H.—You pay thirty cents in postage to send us a manuscript, for the return of which, if rejected, you inclose a three-cent stamp. Do you think at your age this is right?

SAN JOSE.—Not to inform us of your name and address when sending manuscript is the height of prudence and foresight; it gives your work absolute security from publication.

BASE INGRATITUDE.

Though the Chinese passenger bill finally passed the Senate by a vote of 39 to 27, the test votes upon Mathews', Conkling's, and Edmund's amendments show that the real friends of the measure numbered but 33 to 31 against it. The change of a single vote from no to aye upon either of these amendments would have put it in the power of the Vice-President to give the casting vote against California and in favor of the Chinese. All the accounts received from Washington agree in this: that throughout Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of last week, while this momentous struggle in behalf of free white labor in California was pending in the Senate, Senator Sharon never once left his seat, nor was he absent at any of the roll-calls. Had either one of those hostile amendments been adopted by the Senate, the question of stopping Chinese immigration would have been postponed almost indefinitely, and, as we have seen, the change of a single vote might have accomplished that result upon this occasion; therefore, Mr. Sharon, though not a representative of this State, has laid its people under a very heavy obligation to him. He stood, so to speak, guarding the Golden Gate against the entrance of any more Chinese into California.

And while Mr. Sharon was thus serving the people of this State and city in Washington, how, let us ask, were they reciprocating his good offices? At the very time we speak of—during those days of anxiety and peril to the Pacific coast—a few men in this city, who are determined we shall have a grievance, and whose policy it has been and now is to keep alive a sore spot upon the body politic that they may profit by the irritation which it causes, were engaged in hatching out a scheme whereby the property of Sharon in the Spring Valley Water Works is to be confiscated.

With malice almost superhuman these men, having first matured their scheme of spoliation, set to work, through the Bulletin and Call, to seduce with honeyed phrases the autocrat of the sand-lots to give it his sanction in order that it should be incorporated into the new Constitution. And by one of those curious coincidences which fate seems to take pleasure in prearranging, on Friday last, at the very time that Sharon was working like a beaver to save us from the spread of these Asiatic locusts, the Constitutional Convention, acting under the dictation of the sand-lots and ward clubs—who, in turn, were carrying out the behests of Pickering, Fitch & Co.—adopted a proposition which takes away from this city the power to acquire by purchase, construction, condemnation, or in any other manner, water works for its inhabitants, but which subjects the property of Sharon and his co-owners in Spring Valley to confiscation at every municipal election to be held hereafter in San Francisco.

Under this constitutional provision the income of the water company is to be established by resolution of the Board of Supervisors in February of each year. But although the supervisors are to "regulate" the rates to be charged for water, we are told in advance that the valuation to be placed upon the property of this company shall not exceed $4,000,000, and upon this basis its income shall be calculated.

This proposition to regulate water works, as first presented in Convention, was as broad as the State itself, embracing all counties as well as cities and towns therein; but finally the word "counties" was eliminated from it, and now it applies to cities and towns only—which really gives Pickering, Fitch & Co. a monopoly of the business of "regulating" water rates.

Saturday last the Chinese passenger bill passed the Senate, and on Sunday the workmen assembled in great force at the sand-lots to listen to their favorite orators, who, it was expected, would enlighten them upon the question uppermost in all minds that day. We expected to see resolutions unanimously adopted by that "horny-handed" multitude thanking those noble men in Washington, who had just said "No more Chinese shall come to this country."

The expression of such a sentiment by the workmen of San Francisco would have been but natural upon that occasion, seeing that for many years they have attributed almost all their misfortunes to the presence of the Chinese in our midst. But instead of this Denis Kearney treated his audience to a two hours' harangue upon the water question, making free use of such choice epithets as "water rats," "water thieves," "corruptionists," "scoundrels," "hell-born and hell-bound villains," etc., and these epithets were—we blush to write it—leveled principally at one who is absent, and who, but a few hours before that meeting, by his vote and influence in the Senate of the United States, gave to the workmen of California the promise of the dawn of a brighter and better day for themselves and their children, and all who come after them in this favored land, which, as has been said, "bounds at once the empire and the continent." But the ingratitude of mankind seems almost boundless.

X.

Numbers 5 and 6 of The Chefs-d'Œuvre d'Art of the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878, contain admirable photographic representations of Gérôme's "Harem Bath," Robert Fleury's "Dr. Pinel at the Hospital of Salpêtrière," Hector Leouex's "Vestal Tuccia Carrying Water in a Sieve," and Pasini's "Promenade of the Harem." There are also two fine wood engravings—Bouguereau's "Flora and Zephyr," and Francais's "Daphnis and Chloe." These classical subjects please us best, and we like wood engraving better than photography, but the whole work, with its minor pictures, initial letters, and lucid descriptive text, is excellent.

Governor Stanford has been at no time seriously ill—a cold, a relapse, and a malarial fever. We have had them, and the community was not at all alarmed lest we should not recover. Governor Stanford's life is a useful one—a precious one, just now. With great projects on hand, and a railroad system to perfect, the community has been anxious concerning him, and has felt that it could not spare him. As with all strong, overworked men, when the machinery breaks down it takes time to repair it. He is now out every day. On Thursday he rode twenty-five miles, and although not in business harness, he soon will be again at work.

The British Quarterly Review speaks in terms of the highest praise concerning Mr. Edward Eggleston's Roxy.

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

The Directors of the Art Association have, without doubt, taken a step in the right direction in determining that the approaching exhibition—which opens on the 4th prox.—shall consist exclusively of the works of local artists, and of these only such as have not been previously exhibited. This is as it should be. I have never been able to see any good reason for mixing up the annual exhibition of our progress in art—assuming this to be the motive of it—with the mass of good, bad, and indifferent painting that has hitherto been permitted to monopolize a great share of the wall space and distract the attention, unless, indeed, it is to be found in the plea that there was not sufficient home work to make what is called an "attractive" exhibition, and that without this "attractive" feature—viz.: the complete covering of the walls—the exhibition would fail—to pay. That there would be less money taken at the door I will not presume to doubt; one would have to be very ignorant of the condition of our art culte to fancy for a moment that there exists a sufficient interest in the progress of our local workers to attract many visitors, or bring much coin to the treasury of the Association. Whereas, when the exhibition contains many pictures from private owners, these owners and their friends have a direct interest in the matter that helps to swell the receipts; or if, perchance, a five or ten-thousand dollar painting from the gallery of one of our art swells can be secured, the success of the exhibition is assured beyond all question. But I do not understand it to be the object of our Art Association to speculate in picture exhibitions, nor do I think that by so doing it has in any way advanced the interests of art or artists in this city. On the contrary, the difficulty, when accepting the loan of any pictures, of declining the bad ones (that are frequently offered from the kindest motives), has generally resulted in the hanging of much questionable work as well as much about which there could be no question whatever; and this work, having received the sanction of the hanging committee and the indorsement of the Association, takes its place among the various influences that go to make up our art atmosphere. The bad pictures mostly receive as much attention as the good ones, and get as much newspaper praise, too, if they but belong to some "influential citizen," or to one who is generally supposed to be a connoisseur. But, all this apart, it is only just to our local artists that their work should be considered by itself; it is their privilege to have the undivided attention of that part of the community that is interested in their progress, and they may be considered sufficiently strong to make a very interesting exhibit without calling to their aid the odds and ends that may have been picked up by ambitious art patrons, and are kindly taken down from parlor walls for the quid pro quo of having the owners' names appear in the catalogue.

Mr. Toby E. Rosenthal, who is spending the winter in this city, visiting his parents, designs adding his latest work to the exhibition, having received the assurance of its owner—who resides at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania—that it will be forwarded in full time. This is particularly gratifying, as Mr. Rosenthal, although domiciled at Munich, belongs to us, both in the beginnings of the career that has made his name famous, and in the pride that we have in the eminent position that he has won for himself in the art world.

Mr. Ferrer's concert, originally announced for the 23d inst., has been postponed, and will be given on the 12th proximo.

The first of the new series of Recitals by the Schmidt Quintet was given at New Dashaway Hall on last Tuesday evening, and was, on the whole, a most satisfactory performance, despite an unfortunate combination of circumstances that were sufficient in themselves to imperil the most carefully prepared programme and unsteady the nerves of the most sturdy veterans of the concert stage. To begin with, a change of locale is always a very trying matter to players of ensemble music. The tone-quality, as well as quantity, has to be adapted with the greatest nicety to the new space and surroundings, and, as this can not possibly be done while the room is empty, a first performance is necessarily in a great degree experimental. Then, the humid condition of the atmosphere always renders stringed instruments rebellious (they seem to get colds in their heads), and converts any attempt to produce delicate effects upon them into a seeming struggle as to who shall get the best of it, the fiddle or the fiddler—and the fiddle generally wins. Add to this a careless janitor, who had forgotten to light up the stage—and who could not be found, in order to do it later on—a programme which, although exceedingly interesting, was a little over-quiet for our audience, and a débutante; and altogether, as I said before, the circumstances were not very propitious.

And yet it was a very good concert. That is, there was much good music, mostly very well performed, and mostly, also, thoroughly appreciated and enjoyed. The quartet numbers were both gems; that of Carl Schuberth full of a certain Slavonic color and fire that we are accustomed to find in the new—and rapidly advancing—Russian school of composers, while that of Mozart—the one in D—has all the grace and purity of his inimitable style, together with a brevity in the treatment of the movements that adapts it peculiarly to a concert programme. The quintet—piano-forte and strings—of Rubinstein is a superb composition, with themes of a grand type of beauty and enormous dramatic force, and was played in a masterly manner. The task of the pianist, in this quintet, is one of no ordinary difficulty, and Miss Schmidt acquitted herself of it in a way that entitles her to very high praise. The solo numbers were a Serenade Orientale for violoncello, by Popper, an interesting, but to my mind not very beautiful, composition, which Mr. Ernst played as well as the damp strings of his instrument would permit, and the Fantaisie Caprice of Vieuxtemps, in which Mr. Clifford—also with "misty-moisty" strings—displayed some exceedingly brilliant execution (especially in the finale, which, bristling with difficult staccato and octave passages, is extremely hazardous) and a growing grace of style which, when he has somewhat subdued that extreme Frenchness that is the besetting weakness of young violinists and painters alike, bids fair to ripen into something very nice.

I have reserved Mrs. Tippet's songs, together with the Bilder aus Osten, for a paragraph by themselves, inasmuch as they form to me a quite distinct and separate feature of the Concert, and caused me to stumble upon a reflection that may not have very much of novelty in it, but, I fear, has considerable of truth. It is that our most musical public does not, after all, care very much for music, as such. In other words, I do not consider it a safe public to approach with pure music that is entirely devoid of any sensational quality, such as, say, brilliancy of execution, obvious dexterity, piquancy of effect, or pretty heavy sentimentality. Mrs. Tippet, who apparently knows her audience and its weakness, endeavored to make her peace with it, and obtained its consent to her introduction on the programme of two genuine songs—of Schubert and Mendelssohn—by making her entrée with an operatic trifle by Victor Massé that suited neither her voice, her style, nor its musical surroundings. It was a bit of stage frippery which she felt obliged to parade that she might get a hearing for the better things. I was rather pleased that she did not sing it well—of course it got an encore—and almost surprised afterwards to find how well she could sing when she had something to do that thoroughly suited her. The Schubert song was lovely; voice and style seemed to fit it perfectly. The "Bilder" were evidently an infliction to the majority of the audience. I think there was a general impression that a piano-forte duet should consist of brilliant passages and plenty of fireworks, and, when none of these were forthcoming, a sense of disappointment and disgust. It wasn't a real concert piece; it didn't show that it was difficult. There was a débutante: Miss Bacon is known to be talented and promising, and that she should merely play beautiful music intelligently and musically was not enough. She should have made a display of fireworks. Miss Schmidt has no right to hide her facile fingers under the musical bushel of Schumann's composition; she can play passages, and she should be made to play them. Well, the next time these young ladies play I hope they will prepare a goodly supply of musical explosives—they can both do it, and without much trouble either—and do something sensational. Meantime I willingly credit them with having played Schumann's lovely pieces beautifully—in spite of a little natural nervousness on the part of Miss Bacon—and hope that they will persevere in the study of just such music, even if our audiences do find it a bit of a bore.

The soiree of Trinity Church Choir filled up Wednesday evening very pleasantly, and brought with it a welcome opportunity for a rehearsing of Romberg's respectable, but somewhat humdrum and antiquated, setting of Schiller's Lay of the Bell. Thoroughly respectable the music is, beyond a doubt; well-written, sound, healthy music that wears a queue, very proper small-clothes, and the neatest of silver-plated buckles to its high-heeled shoes. But what dreary stuff it is, to be sure, with its dead level of regularly cadenced melody and conscious rectitude of extremely proper choral treatment that spins itself out to any desired length with the most dexterous avoidance of freshness either of idea or form. What dreary, dreary stuff it is! And yet this music was exceedingly popular, and not more than thirty-five or forty years ago formed the pièce de résistance of all larger singing societies. "To this complexion shall we come at last," all of us who dip our goose-quills in the ink-pot of the muses and with much burning of the midnight oil grind out the cantatas and things that are to write our names high on the roll of fame. Thirty or forty odd years' of endurance for the best—or luckiest—of us, and then comes some little newspaper scribbler who sits in solemn judgment on us and votes us "dreary" and "humdrum." The fashion changes and we are gently but decisively shelved. Well, I for one feel inclined to thank Mr. Gee for his resuscitation of Romberg's cantata, the more as it was quite nicely sung and evinced most careful rehearsal and study. The chorus, as well as solo parts, were exceedingly creditable. The residue of the programme consisted of choruses—one charming one, The Skylark, by Barnaby—and solo songs, and was very pleasantly rendered.

Madame Jaffa's Concert, given at Platt's Hall on last Thursday evening, brought one of those miscellaneous programmes which, from their hybrid nature, are exceedingly difficult to speak of from any serious standpoint, and yet occasionally—as in the case of the one under consideration—present points of real interest which it would be manifestly unjust either to overlook or treat without a becoming gravity. I need scarcely say here that I regard all such mixed programmes, in which a heterogeneous lot of musical scraps are thrown together without any method or attempt at coherence, with a certain horror; they are at once illogical and absurd. Still it is a custom that has the sanction of long usage, and has been followed by many artists of much repute. But it is dying out in older and more advanced communities, where a concert programme is considered in some sense an intellectual menu, in which it is hardly in good taste to indiscriminately mix up breakfast and dinner dishes, or introduce the puddings and sweets immediately after the soup, and it seems to me that we might advantageously adopt the latest fashion in this matter, and begin to mix a little brains with our programmes. Of Madame Jaffa's share of the concert it is impossible to speak without respect, although I can not say I find her piano-forte playing in the least enjoyable. She has great facility, a light and dexterous wrist, cool nerves, and considerable endurance; but she does not play at all beautifully. She lacks sympathy, warmth of conception, and—in a marked degree—both style and finish. Her playing of Beethoven's enormously difficult Concerto in E flat—absurd as the undertaking appears with the meagre accompaniment of a string quartet—was quite a heroic performance, and deserved to be followed by something better than Liszt's flash second Rhapsodie, or Woelfe's dry and super-stupid Non plus ultra Sonata. Her song—very nicely sung by Mr. Borneman—is a pretty and creditable composition, good in color and of correct musical form. The interest of the residue of the Concert centred in a harp Fantaisie with which Mr. Solano created a furor—he played it admirably—and Mons. Sauret's accompaniments, which were in the main exceedingly musician-like.

Mr. Howell's Atlantic story, "The Lady of the Aroostook," has faded out.

MARRONS GLACÉS—FRENCH FROZEN TRUTHS.

The wife of a French democratic free thinker obstinately persists in preserving in her bedroom the portrait of the Duke of Orleans.

A friend expressing her surprise at finding such a portrait in the house, the husband replied, excusing his wife: "What would you have us do? It's her only superstition."

The owner of a large landed property happened to meet the wife of one of his farmers who had just lost her mother. "Well, my poor Rose," he said, "there is another good woman gone."

"Yes, indeed, sir," replied the daughter, "she was really a good woman, and should have a good place in Paradise. When I say a good place, I mean good for people like us."

A professor of rhetoric who is fond of dehors said to his pupils the other day:

"The reign of Nero was dreadful. You know the atrocities which that monster committed. He caused to be burned in his presence slaves whose bodies had been previously covered with pitch. But history has recorded of him acts still more odious. He was a gambler. When he played and was in an unlucky vein he forced his courtiers to bet on his side!"

Two friends lived close to each other, one of whom was in a state of constant impecuniosity. The latter got up in the middle of the night and rushed breathless into the house of his more fortunate neighbor.

"I have had an awful dream," he said. "I fancied you were ruined and reduced to the last degree of want. I rose from bed under the impression of this nightmare, and I ran to my desk to get some money to take to you."

"How good of you," said the friend.

"Yes," said the dreamer, "and you can imagine my annoyance on finding that I had not a sou in my drawer. It was completely empty. By the by, do you happen have fifty louis in the house?"

They were speaking of the pretty Countess of X—, whose beauty, alas! is not equaled by her wit.

"She never opens her mouth unless it is to say something silly," says a friend.

"Never mind," was another friend's reply; "she's a woman that it's a pleasure to see speaking."

One of the Paris papers publishes the following:

"There are Gascons in America as everywhere else. One of them recently said:

"In the State of Ohio the cold is so intense in the winter that this happened to me: I was attacked by a robber. I took out my pistol. There was powder in it, but no ball. I was inspired by a lucky idea. I spat in the barrel and I fired. The spittle froze on its way and the malefactor was shot dead!"

At a wedding party at a restaurant a maladroit waiter contrives to upset a tureen full of rich soup on the satin dress of a lady guest, who takes on terribly and threatens hysterics.

"Do not worry, madame," says the waiter kindly, "there's lots more soup in the kitchen."

Madame X., who has no teeth, is in the habit of speaking very ill of Madame Z., who has very ugly ones.

Their respective situations were thus pleasantly summed up by a mutual friend:

"If Madame X. had teeth she would be quite as ugly as Madame Z."

Madame R., a Parisienne, whose least defect is to be as old as she is coquettish, arrived the other evening after eleven at the house of a friend, where only a few intimates had been invited.

"How late you are, ma belle," said the lady of the house, in a tone of friendly reproach.

"I am very sorry," replied Madame R., "but the truth is that I have a femme de chambre who is slowness personified. Would you believe it? She took more than an hour and a half to dress my hair."

"You had one consolation," interposed one of the ladies present, "and that was that you might have taken a walk during the operation."

On the signboard of a shop in the Rue Richer, Paris, appears the following curious announcement:

Ici on remplace les mauvaises lêtes.

It should be added that the establishment is devoted exclusively to the sale and reparation of children's dolls.

In a French assize court:

The President—Well, you acknowledge that you assassinated the girl Clement?

Prisoner—I do.

President—And why did you commit such a crime?

Prisoner—It was all owing to jealousy, Monsieur le President.

President—But, having committed the murder, I should like to know why you cut up the body into seventy-two pieces.

Prisoner—I suppose because I gave way to a feeling of impatience.

An old servant enters the shop of an apothecary and presents him a prescription in which is ordered a potion containing two decigrammes of morphine.

The apothecary's assistant weighs the dangerous ingredient with the greatest care.

"What a shame!" said the old woman to him, with a shove at his elbow. "Come, don't be so stingy—it's for an orphan."

It was during one of the numerous managees which have so rapidly succeeded each other at the theatre. A young author had presented a comedy in five acts! exclaimed the director; "we can't do that. Our theatre is too small."

OUR POLICY TOWARD ALIENS.

The agitation which has been aroused by the relief which the Chinese are seeking from the over-population of their country, by migrating in vast numbers to the Pacific Coast,* the thickly settled condition of some of the Atlantic States, lack of work for the laborer, reduction of wages, overcrowding of the poorer classes, the rapidly increasing population, the facilities for immigration, lead us to inquire whether the liberal policy of the United States toward aliens should not be modified.

Is it not time to extend the term of residence before naturalization, or declare that nothing but birth shall entitle a man to citizenship in this country?

Is it not time to discourage rather than invite immigration? How can we discourage immigration in the future?

These are the questions which are forcing themselves upon the consideration of the statesmen and thinkers of the day. Among the inducements which it has been the policy of our Government to hold out to foreigners and encourage immigration, has always been the liberality exercised in granting to aliens the right of naturalization—the highest privilege which one nation can confer on the subjects or citizens of another.

Let us compare the condition of our country when the policy was first inaugurated to the condition which it now presents.

The first naturalization law of the United States was passed in 1790. Two years' residence within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States was required for admission to citizenship. At such an early period in the history of our country it is not to be wondered at that every inducement was offered to the foreigner to live among us and share our fortunes. The total population was under four millions of souls, scattered over a vast territory, living principally on the sea coasts. The means of communication and travel were slow and limited; our frontier was subject to frequent incursions of savage tribes; the life of the frontiersman was threatened with constant danger; we needed men to protect us from enemies at home and abroad; the greater part of our territory was unexplored. An invitation to foreigners to come and settle with us was almost a necessity, and it was considered a wise policy. We offered citizenship, cheap lands, and a republican form of government.

Since then the term of residence has been changed several times. By the Act of January 29, 1795, five years' residence was required. By the Act of June 18, 1798, the term was extended to fourteen years, and subsequently reduced to five years by the Act of April 14, 1802. Since then no change has been made in the term of residence; the later Acts relate to other provisions of the law of naturalization.

The early Acts upon the subject were not passed without considerable discussion, and the policy of admitting foreigners to citizenship was even then seriously questioned.†

The views of those who were opposed to naturalization, and those who advocated a longer term of residence, are to be found in the "Madison Letters," said to have been written by Honorable A. H. H. Stuart, of Virginia.

The sparsely settled condition of our country was an argument powerful enough to dictate the policy which has ever since been adhered to, although the principal reasons for its adoption have long ceased to exist.

The advantages which have resulted to the United States from its liberal policy toward aliens, and the encouragement it has given to the immigrant, have been inestimable, and should not be undervalued. But with the improved and changed condition of our country, would it not be prudent to vary from a policy which was created to meet a state of affairs which existed nearly a century ago, and which no longer exists? Would it not be well to adapt our policy to the changed condition of our country?

Have not the ends and aims of the policy of our early fathers been accomplished?

We have a population estimated at 40,000,000, which is enough for protection and progress. We are rich, great, and powerful; no savages to dread at home, no enemies to fear abroad; our means of communication and travel are easy and rapid.

We hear our statesmen deploring the overcrowded condition of some parts of Europe, and at the same time they seem to encourage a policy which necessarily hastens upon us the same misfortune.

Let us rely upon the natural increase of our population for inhabitants; let it be their descendants who will people our lands.

The profuse and liberal hand of nature showering its resources upon us, the fertility of our soils, and the favorable circumstances surrounding us, account for the extraordinary rapidity with which population has multiplied.

The time which it requires for the population of this country to double itself, exclusive of the effects of immigration, has been variously estimated by writers on political economy and social science to be from twenty-five to thirty-two years. The United States Census Reports give the following figures:

YEAR.	POPULATION.
	NATIVE.	FOREIGN.	TOTAL.
1790			3,929,214
1800			5,308,483
1810			7,239,881
1820			9,633,822
1830			12,866,020
1840			17,069,153
1850	20,912,612	2,244,602	23,157,214
1860	27,304,624	4,138,697	31,443,321
1870	32,991,142	5,567,229	38,558,371

The causes which have prevented the natural increase of population are each year growing fewer in number. War is less frequent, medical skill has prevented the ravages of many epidemics, and, with increasing knowledge, will continue to find additional remedies for diseases. Cleanliness, good diet, warm clothing, draining of marshes, and many improvements made by a rapidly advancing civilization, tend to increase the average of human life.

Assuming that every 33½ years the population of the United States will double itself by natural increase, 100 years from now it would amount to 320,000,000.

We have reason to believe that in the United States, with its immense area of 3,603,884 square miles, comprising extensive lands of great fertility, inhabited by an industrious people, the same favorable conditions for the rapid multiplication will continue to exist, and with the reasonable expectation that labor will be liberally rewarded, the American rate of increase will be maintained for a century.

"The liberal reward of labor, therefore, as it is the effect of increasing wealth, so it is the cause of increasing population."*

It is unnecessary to discuss the axiom, "that there is a constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it."

It is not necessary to refer to the celebrated theory of Malthus, nor for the purpose of considering what is the most prudent policy of the United States toward aliens is it necessary to extend any consideration as to the probable overpopulation of the entire world; and it is, likewise, immaterial, though not foreign to the question, to reflect upon the proposition as to whether the limit of population of a country is the number of people which its soil is capable of supplying with food, or whether it is the number which the whole earth can feed. We should not, however, subscribe to any doctrine which would render us careless or indifferent to a threatened evil or misfortune to our national welfare, even though it may be centuries removed; the nation has its duty to perform to the remote descendants of its present citizens.

Our object should be to maintain for as long a period as we can the prosperity with which we have been blessed; the happiness and welfare of all classes should be our aim, and our policy as a nation ought to be so directed as to accomplish these desirable ends.

Our laboring classes enjoy an abundance of the necessities of life, many of the comforts, and some of the luxuries; wages are admitted to be fair. We should endeavor to uphold the price of labor, and strive to ameliorate and improve the condition of labor; low wages are not conducive to the prosperity of a nation, and to produce strong, active, able, diligent, and intelligent workmen, labor should be liberally rewarded.

The chief cause of the reduction of wages with us is undoubtedly attributable to the number of foreigners who annually find a refuge in the United States, and it is to this fatal tide of immigration we must ascribe much of the poverty of our laboring classes. A thoughtful writer on political economy, referring to the causes of the decline of wages, says:

"The only causes which strongly tend to a depreciation of wages in this country are the vast and constantly increasing immigration of foreigners, the increased burden of taxation, and the want of sufficient encouragement for our manufactures. These causes may produce a lamentable effect in wages in the United States as other agencies have caused in Great Britain and Ireland. At present our institutions are preserved, and general content exists among the people, because no class in the community finds itself doomed to irretrievable penury, and not one individual is without the well-grounded hope of improving his condition, and perhaps of rising even to high rank in the social state. But let the rate of wages here be reduced to what the English economists regard as their natural and necessary standard—that is, to a bare sufficiency for subsistence from day to day—and the class of laborers who must always form the majority in any community, and who, with us, also have the control in politics, will not be satisfied without organic changes in the laws, which will endanger at once our political and social system. Our immunity thus far ought not to betray us into a blind confidence for the future. A few years have produced a marvelous alteration in our prospects, and the change has not been altogether for our advantage. The Atlantic has been bridged by steam, and the ties which connect us with Great Britain, and link our commercial and social well-being with hers, are strengthening every day. Ireland is depopulating itself upon our shores, and the influx from Germany and China is rapidly increasing. For the four years next after 1849 the average number of foreigners who arrived in the country was over 400,000 a year; for the three years before 1846 it was only 121,000. About 1,000,000 arrived during the three years preceding 1870."†

Our population will increase with sufficient rapidity without the aid of immigration; and if no restriction is made, the time will soon be at hand when wages will fall, and the laboring classes sink to an inferior condition.

No society can be in a flourishing state, or happy, where the greater number of its members are poor and miserable; but let the laborer and his children be well fed, clothed, and lodged, and we have at once a contented, cheerful, and progressive state.

While political economists in Europe are busily engaged in solving the causes of the fall of wages, and suggesting remedies, let us busy ourselves with prudent measures to prevent, or at least delay, the spread of the evil in our own land.

It is true that we have immense tracts of rich agricultural lands, but should we hurry to draw from it its resources? Is it prudent to exhaust the fertility of our best soils? John Stuart Mill says:

"When for the purpose of raising an increase of produce recourse is had to inferior land, it is evident that so far the produce does not increase in the same proportion with the labor. The very meaning of inferior land, is land which with equal labor returns a smaller amount of produce. Land may be inferior either in fertility or in situation. The one requires a greater proportional amount of labor for growing produce, the other for carrying it to market."‡

And, again, he says: "The countries which export food may be divided into two classes—those in which the effective desire of accumulation is strong, and those in which it is not. In Australia and the United States of America the effective desire of accumulation is strong; capital increases fast, and the production of food must be rapidly extended. But in such countries population also increases with extraordinary rapidity. Their agriculture has to provide for their own expanding numbers as well as for those of the importing countries. They must, therefore, from the nature of the case, be rapidly driven, if not to less fertile, at least what is equivalent, to remoter and less accessible lands, and to modes of cultivation like those of old countries, less productive in proportion to the labor and expense."*

We have a large proportion of our inhabitants carrying on agricultural pursuits; our exportation of cereals is enormous, and we thereby assist foreign manufacturers to undersell American productions in our own market; by giving them cheap food, they demand and get cheap labor. As we do not restore to our soils what we take from it, the fertility of our fields declines, and the recourse which must soon be had to the cultivation of our inferior lands, if immigration continues unchecked, renders the prospect of our future agriculturist cheerless.

An extract from an able article which appeared in the supplement of the Popular Science Monthly for June, 1878, is not out of place here. It is entitled, "Economy of Nitrogen," and it is a firm protest against the thoughtless waste of that "indispensable constituent of every vegetable seed and of every animal ovum." The writer concludes as follows: "We know now, approximately at least, the extent of the earth's resources. We have no more vast and scarcely trodden continents for us to discover. We can no longer calculate on finding coal, or phosphates, or other useful products at any point where we may choose to dig. No more can we comfort ourselves with vague hopes that emptied mines and exhausted soils will spontaneously grow rich again, or that plants can create their own nourishment. Nor can we lay the flattering unction to our souls that for every utility no longer procurable a substitute will be found. The dreams indulged in by enthusiasts in the earlier portion of the present century—of a future measured perhaps by millions of years, in which mankind will be constantly improving in power, in knowledge, and in happiness—are being somewhat rudely broken. Science tells us in unmistakable tones, that the earth can not forever afford a home for a race like ours. What, for instance, would be the condition of mankind were all the inhabitable parts of the globe as populous, as industrial, and as luxurious as are Western and Central Europe and the eastern part of North America? Whence would they all be able to import their needed supplies of food, of manures, of raw materials for manufacturing purposes?"

"Time was when England produced a sufficiency of food for her own inhabitants. Then came a time when she began to import, and that in ever increasing proportions, both food and manures. Next we mark that the countries which formerly exported food and manurial matters—i. e., ground bones, etc.—ceased to do so, became importers instead of exporters of both, and competed with us in the market. The Atlantic States of the American Union import manures, and can scarcely supply food for their home population. By and by must come a time when Chile, California, South Russia, and Hungary will require all the wheat they can produce for their own consumption. The eyes of our political economists will perforce be opened to the truth, that every country unable to feed its own population is in a dangerous predicament."

"Shall we ever succeed in obtaining food direct from its inorganic elements without the tedious and circuitous interposition of plants and animals? If so, the future of the human race may be both longer and brighter than we can at present dare to hope. Meantime, to economize nitrogen, phosphorus and potash, to recover these bodies from waste, and to find substitutes for their present 'profligate' applications, is the most sacred task which the chemist can take in hand. The reforms which may shield us from occasional pestilence sink into insignificance compared with those required to guard posterity, in a not very remote future, from chronic scarcity, from recurrent famine, and from a wolfish struggle for food, in which man must relapse into a worse savagery than that from which he has emerged."

The fundamental principle of government is protection: the citizen at home or abroad can ever call upon his country to protect him, and his voice will be heeded. The citizens of the United States, whether foreign-born or native, are calling upon their government to protect them from the overwhelming tide of immigration which threatens to destroy the laborer's prosperity, the security of capital and the nation's peace. Let us no longer induce strangers to come here by offering them citizenship. Let us deny to them a voice in the affairs of our nation; or at least let us discontinue granting naturalization on such easy terms. Increase the term of residence, and place further safeguards around the system.

It is true that in individual cases the exclusion of foreigners from a participation in the affairs of our government may operate harshly, but regulations of such importance and magnitude must be made general, and the inconvenience to which the deserving foreigner must submit by being debarred from citizenship will be much less than the danger we incur by indiscriminate admission of all classes to that right.

Prohibitive laws to check immigration would not be regarded with favor. They would be deemed a too radical change of our policy of government. We would be accused of retrograding, and anathemas of moralist statesmen would be hurled at us from all sides. But a resort to a system of taxation upon the immigrant could be had without much complaint and for just causes, and would only be deemed the exercise of a proper, prudent, and justifiable policy. A hospital tax of one or two hundred dollars or more would accomplish a result as satisfactory as direct prohibitory legislation, and the vast flood of immigration would be checked; the present evils under which we groan from that source would soon disappear, and the evil which threatens us in the future would be long postponed.

Let us for a moment consider the class of the foreigners who now land on our shores. In the East we have the paupers and destitute of Europe; in the West we have China vomiting upon our shores the scum of its population, from its worst districts; a people differing from us in language, customs, modes of thought, social peculiarities, and physical structure, and who, by their frugal and economical mode of life, which has become habitual, underwork the white laborer and crowd him from his legitimate sphere.

* Smith's Wealth of Nations, Chap. 13.

† American Political Economy, Bowen, pp. 181-2.

‡ Principles of Political Economy, Vol. XII, §2.

* Principles of Political Economy, Vol. I, Chap. 13, §3.

This article was written before the bill prohibiting vessels from carrying more than 25 Chinese passengers was introduced in the House of Representatives. See Abridgement of Debates of Congress, Vol. I, pp. 184-190; Vol. II, pp. 1-77.

We have already alluded to the facilities of immigration, and as to the character of the present immigration we can do no better than quote from the profound author of England in the Eighteenth Century:

"In the present century the immigration of a large foreign population is seldom favorable to the moral condition of a nation. Emigration has become so easy and so familiar that it is the recourse of multitudes but little removed from simple pauperism. Men of ordinary characters usually deteriorate when severed from the ties of home tradition, associations, and opinions, and they seldom feel any strong attachment for a country which was not that of their childhood. But in the seventeenth century the conditions of emigration were essentially different. The difficulties were such that those who encountered them were almost always men of much more than common strength of character, and they were to a very large extent men whose motive in abandoning their country was the intensity of their religious or political convictions. It is the peculiarity of the British colonies in America that they were mainly founded and governed by such men. Puritans in New England, Episcopalians in Virginia, Quakers in Pennsylvania, Catholics in Maryland—each province contained numbers who, during the persecutions of the Stuarts, or of the Commonwealth, had sought in the western world the opportunity of freely professing their faith. From the time of the Pilgrim Fathers to the time when the Salzburg Protestants flocked to the new colony of Georgia in 1732, America was preëminently the home of the refugees, and this fact is perhaps the most important in its history. After all that can be said of material and intellectual advantages, it remains true that moral causes lie at the root of the greatness of nations, and it is probable that no nation ever started on its career with a larger proportion of strong character, or a higher level of moral convictions, than the English colonies in America."*

It is well known that there is a larger proportion of foreigners than native-born in our jails, prisons, almshouses, insane asylums, hospitals, and other institutions of like character, whom we are compelled to maintain. We will not refer to many figures, but take several examples:

By reference to the United States Census Reports for 1870, we get the following items:

Total Population, 38,558,371. Native, 32,991,142; Foreign, 5,567,229.

Paupers.—Total number of paupers, maintained at an annual cost of $10,930,429, are 76,737. Native, 53,939; giving us .0016 per cent., or 16 in every 10,000. Foreign, 22,798; being .004 per cent., or 40 in every 10,000.

Insane.—Native, 25,372—.0007 per cent., or 7 in every 10,000. Foreign, 11,221—.002 per cent., or 20 in every 10,000.

Criminals.—Native, 24,173—.0007 per cent., or 7 in every 10,000. Foreign, 8,728—.0015 per cent., or 15 in every 10,000.

It is difficult to arrive at a true estimate of the proportion. It has been stated, that of the 49,423 prisoners in the city prisons in New York for one year before January, 1870, 32,225 were of foreign birth. And in the Eastern penitentiary of Pennsylvania, according to Dr. Bittinger, from one-fourth to one-third of the inmates are foreigners; in Auburn, from a third to a half; in Clinton, one-half; in Sing-Sing, between one-half and six-sevenths.

In the Albany penitentiary the aggregate number of prisoners during the last twenty years was 18,390, of whom 10,770 were foreign born.†

Being compelled, as we are, to maintain, at an immense annual cost, a large foreign criminal and pauper element, we find in this fact alone sufficient reason to justify a tax upon the immigrant; and though we may attach to it the importance which it demands, we are not compelled to appeal to that fact for our justification in adapting our policy to meet the necessity of protecting our laborer and providing for the security of all classes, which are claims strong enough in themselves, without other considerations, to impel us to such legislation, even to alter our fundamental law if necessary, to achieve those ends.

To those moralists who would oppose a change of policy to meet the changes of the times, and who deduce their arguments against it by reference to morals and dogmatic theology, and who argue upon the principle that "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," and hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth," and "that we have no right to shut a man out of any vacant lot which he needs to earn his bread," and who undertake to solve questions of political economy, international law, and national ethics, by an appeal to scriptural text, we must respectfully beg that the discussion be relegated to its proper field, and a solution can be reached by a reference to principles of political, economic, or social science.

There is no higher law than self-preservation. It is the underlying principle which regulates individual and national conduct. To it we appeal. We owe duties to our citizens first—to the children of those we invited to dwell among us, and who shared our fortunes, and to their posterity.

We must guard and protect our descendants; and in the struggle for national life we must, by prudence and forethought, preserve our strength and vitality, and be among the first in the rapid march of civilization and progress to reach the goal of a nation's greatness. S. HEYDENFELDT, JR.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

* England in the Eighteenth Century; Lecky, Vol. II, p. 1 and 2.

† Dangerous classes of New York; Buel, p. 36. Transactions of Nat. Cong., p. 282.

A DOLEFUL TALE.

Part I.

Listen awhile, a tale I tell,
List to a tale of sad disaster;
How the catastrophes befell
Muggama Chuddee Shaster.

Built in a shady grove divine,
Close to a tank of weedy water,
Stands the big idol's holy shrine—
Idol of hope and slaughter.

Shikkamy Shaster's form was stout,
Shikkamy Shaster, lumpy, dumpy;
None had piety more devout,
None had a leg so stumpy.

Many a year his friend had been
Billika Bucher, lengthy, lanky;
Never a funnier face was seen,
Never a leg so shanky.

Saturday month, the two, arrayed,
Went to the shrine to show devotion:
All of a once a lovely maid
Gave them a strange emotion.

Billika Bucher chased her thence,
Caught her, and, oh, would fain detain her;
Shikkamy Shaster showed more sense—
Hear what he did to gain her:

Straight to the shady shrine he went,
Folding his arms in true contrition,
Double his homely form he bent.
This was his odd petition:

"Father, beside this holy place,
Hear what a maid I saw before me.
Oh, such a face! Such easy grace
Brought a queer feeling o'er me.

"Thick as a thunder-cloud her hair,
Curved is her nose as is a parrot's,
Round as a moon her face, and fair
Fair with a tinge of carrots;

"Soft as a doe gazelle's her eyes,
Hands and feet are trim and tender,
Neck like a dove's in shape and size,
Waist as a panther, slender.

"Tell me, O Father!" thus he cried,
"Father of hope and sportive slaughter—
Tell me with whom does she reside?
Who can have such a daughter?"

Idol of idols answered: "Go—
Go to her uncle, lone relation;
Make your salam. His name is Jo,
Washing, his occupation.

"She with that uncle lives alone,
Washerman, nunky, soapy, suddy.
This is the name by which she's known—
Beautiful Muggama Chuddee."

Shikkamy Shaster made reply:
"Father, if you demand a martyr,
Marry the girl to me, and I Promise my head in barter."

Often he bowed as thus he vowed;
Suddenly moved the scarlet plaster;
Idol of idols howled aloud:
"Done with you, Shikkamy Shaster!"

Part II.

Quickly a month had passed away—
Pleasure had made it pass the faster;
Happy the man who claimed to-day
Muggama Chuddee Shaster.

Shikkamy Shaster's wedding day!
Never a day had shone so sunny.
Ready they stand to start away,
Feeling a wee bit funny.

Bidding adieu to all she knew,
Sadly to Jo, her ugly nunky,
Muggama Chuddee kissed a few;
Shikkamy felt too funky.

Nobly the steed he sits astride,
Billika next, and friendly peasants;
Merrily last of all the bride,
Bringing the wedding presents.

Happily thus the miles they pass;
Then, as they feel a wee bit weary,
Gayly the men bestride the ass;
She with the tail is cheery.

Suddenly Shaster fills with fears—
Surely he sees good cause to falter;
Straight in his only road appears
Idol of idols' altar!

Idol of idols grimly smiled,
Smiled with a face of scarlet plaster;
Shikkamy's ass with fear was wild,
Wild his unwieldy master.

Pious he always was and good;
Surely the vow was not forgotten!
No; for he felt the sheath of wood,
Hoping the blade was rotten.

"Oh! what a sinful wight am I!
Idol of idols, high and haughty,
How can I tell a fearful lie?
How can I be so naughty?"

Thus in his mind he seemed to say;
Then to his pair of glad companions:
"I to the idol wish to pray,
Rest you beneath the banyans."

Grimly he grasped his shiny sword,
Straight to the temple humbly stumbled,
Grimly the holy place adored,
Chopped off his head and tumbled.

After a while his wife, alarmed,
Muggama Chuddee, face of fairies,
Said to her friend: "He can't be harmed;
Terrible long his prayer is.

"Billika Bucher, say I grieve;
Run to the temple lightly, sprightly."
Billika Bucher took his leave,
Bidding adieu politely.

There she remained. But wond'ring, he,
Ever intrepid, ever dreadless,
Found his old friend in pieces three—
Bodiless, hatless, headless.

"Nobody could believe that he Could ever be so holy, lowly,
Thus to obey the god's decree,
He! such a roly-poly!

"Every soul will think I planned,
Cruelly planned a bad transaction;
Better to die than bear the brand,
Brand of an evil action."

Thus did he speak, his sabre drew,
Dealt his neck a blow so bloody;
Such that he fell in pieces two,
Calling to Muggama Chuddee.

Muggama Chuddee long had sat,
Sat for a long, long while in wonder,
Wondering what the two were at,
Vexed to be thus asunder.

Straight to the shrine she strode alone;
There the sight doubly worked her wonder:
Billika Bucher had fallen prone,
Shikkamy Shaster under.

Sadly she heaved her sweetest sigh,
Spoke to herself in lovely languor:
"Every soul will think that I
Slew them in hate or anger.

"Think of the female tongues let loose!
Jimminy! what will they be saying?
Better than hear their bold abuse,
Better myself be slaying."

Placing her neck the swords between,
Ready she stood her head to sever.
Suddenly such a sight was seen,
Such as afore was never.

Idol of idols, feared of men,
Down from his holy seat descended,
Struck to the ground the swords, and then
Highly the girl commended.

"Girl, I am amply pleased, and soon
Favor will have, and surely show it:
Muggama Chuddee, ask a boon—
Ask, that I may bestow it."

Muggama Chuddee, widowed bride,
Gladly replied: "O holy master!
If you are really satisfied,
Give me my Shikkamy Shaster!"

This was his answer: "Take their heads,
Join to his trunk each knobby noddle;
Quickly they'll leave their stony beds,
Quickly begin to toddle."

Muggama Chuddee, pleased, arose,
Rose in a state of hurry, flurry—
Hurry from which began her woes,
Trouble, and endless worry.

Whether through haste, or fun, or funk,
Thus she contrived new men to model,
Joining to Shikkamy Shaster's trunk
Billika Bucher's noddle!

Shikkamy Shaster's head devout
Billika's slender carcass carried!
Now came an awful ugly doubt—
Which of the two was married?

Each of the voices coaxing cried,
"Muggama Chuddee, rosy, ruddy!"
Angrily each his friend defied:
"Don't you touch Muggama Chuddee."

Here is a scene of endless shame;
Here is a scene of sad disaster;
Solemnly both have vowed to claim,
Muggama Chuddee Shaster.

Eagerly both have seized an arm,
Eagerly both are heaving, hauling;
Muggama Chuddee, all alarm,
Set up a squeaky squalling.

Here is an end. My tale is o'er.
Still are the rivals heaving, hauling;
Muggama Chuddee's arms are sore,
Sore is her throat with squalling.

Verily naught remains to tell;
Told is a tale of sad disaster:
How the catastrophes befell
Muggama Chuddee Shaster.

We have all heard of the doctor who was "death on fits," but it has not hitherto been known that he published his prescriptions. These, however, are undoubtedly "his'n":

For a Fit of Passion—Walk out in the open air. You may speak your mind to the winds without hurting any one, or proclaiming yourself to be a simpleton.

For a Fit of Idleness—Count the ticking of a clock. Do this for an hour, and you will be glad to pull off your coat and work like a man.

For a Fit of Extravagance—Go to the workhouse, or speak to the inmates of a jail, and you will be convinced.

For a Fit of Ambition—Go to the churchyard and read the gravestones. They will tell you the end of man in his best estate.

For Fit of Repining—Look about for the halt and the blind, and visit the bed-ridden, the afflicted, and deranged, and they will make you ashamed of complaining of your light afflictions.

For a Fit of Envy—Go and see how many who keep their carriages are afflicted with rheumatism, gout, and dropsy; how many walk abroad on crutches, or stay at home wrapped in flannel, and how many are subject to epilepsy and apoplexy.

The curious practice, says an English exchange, which has sprung up of late of having sets of china composed of pieces of different patterns and colors does not come from the fashionable, but from the trade side of the question. A few seasons ago one of the lady-leaders of fashion, while inspecting the stock in a pottery warehouse, was struck by the beauty and artistic effect of a variegated tea-set, and wished to buy it. The shopman explained that what she saw before her was not a tea-set, but only a collection of individual patterns of different sets. All in vain; the lady would have the collection as it stood, and bought it at a fabulous price. Her example spread, and so came into fashion the so-called "harlequin tea-sets," which it is now the right thing for every lady who has any any pretensions to bon ton to possess.

The King of Siam out-Mormons the Mormons by having six hundred commissioned wives, and two thousand four hundred wives by brevet, all of them living in polygamy in Bangkok. And the best of it is he is on good terms amiably with the whole crowd, all the members of the sect said to have much regard for him, as indeed he has for them.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday February 23, 1879.

Pepper-Pot.
Fried Mountain Trout.
Broiled Snipe on Toast. Fried New Potatoes.

Stewed Celery. Salsify.

Vegetable Salad.

Chocolate Ice Cream. Lady Fingers.

Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Apples, Pears, and Bananas.

TO MAKE PEPPER-POT.—Take a good stock, veal or beef; cut two pounds of tripe in small oblong pieces; chop four or five small potatoes, one onion, and ten sprigs of parsley very fine; add salt, plenty of pepper to make it hot, a little sweet marjoram and thyme. Boil about four hours, and add several very small dumplings about half an hour before dishing. Some prefer to make it with a fresh knuckle of veal and a beef bone, but the stock, as you always have it on hand, saves time.

A Hartford man gave his wife a $3,000 diamond ring for a Christmas present. It is not stated whether he is a plumber or an editor, but no doubt he is.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $3 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } - - - - - Editors.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1879.

If our Olla-Podrida of this week is not altogether a romance—if it is substantially true and the narrative be a recital of facts and not an effort of the imagination—then there is something rotten in this great California pumpkin of ours, and there exist some things not creditable to our civilization or to our legislative or judicial system. If this be a true story, and out of an insolvent bank a money-lender can gobble up thirty thousand acres of the best land in our State for one-fifth of its value, and then forever prevent its cultivation and settlement, thus creating a desert in Los Angeles and thus hindering our prosperity, there is something wrong. We suggest to the people of Los Angeles that if they stand supinely by and see Baldwin and others gather up their rich valley acres in tracts of fifty thousand, there will be no necessity for the city of Los Angeles, and there will be no enterprising population that will make a prosperous city possible. Baldwin's estate will be covered with sheepherders, or if cultivated will be cultivated by tenants. Those tenants will be poor, and in time will be ignorant. The next generation will be inferior to this, till the tenant-farmers of Los Angeles will be like all similar communities in their standard of intelligence, enterprise, and wealth. This character of population will cause the balance of society to deteriorate, until the valley will be avoided as the home of cultivated people. An hundred Lucky Baldwins owning the land of Los Angeles, living in San Francisco, spending their summers in the country and their money in the town, will depreciate the value of Los Angeles city property to a point where its rents will not pay its taxes. A million industrious, frugal, intelligent people occupying and cultivating the land of Los Angeles and its neighboring valleys will give value to town property and build up a community that it would be a pleasure to live among. Hence, we say to the inhabitants of that city and neighborhood, purchase this thirty thousand acres of land; subdivide and sell it to farmers. There is an immediate moneyed profit in the transaction; there is future prosperity to the country. It would make a splendid colony enterprise. It may be purchased at the marshal's sale. It may be acquired by the process of redemption. In conclusion, we desire to remark, in a friendly way, if there is not genius, money, and brains enough in Los Angeles to rescue this property from the land-pirate system, then Los Angeles is not worth saving.

This sand-lot business affords us a vast deal of pleasure; we watch the proceedings of Denis Kearney as we would those of any other curious specimen of natural history, expecting that he will do just the things that his birth, his associations, his education, and his surroundings compel him to do. We expect the ass to bray, the mole to burrow, the monkey to climb, the fox to intrigue, the skunk to smell bad, the jackal to steal, the serpent to wriggle, and the magpie to chatter. We know that ignorance, greed, insolence, cowardice, malevolence are inheritable qualities, inherent and irradicable in certain natures. We know that there are classes made to fawn, and flatter, and follow; that hope of office, opportunity of official plunder, and ambition will warp the minds of men. Never has there been a time in history when brazen-voiced audacity could not find a following. Just now we are intent upon the Chronicle, Call, Post, and Bulletin, and are following with unusual interest their little game. The Chronicle created Kearney, and lifted him into an undeserved prominence. The Bulletin and Call, fearing lest their rival should score a point, lifted up their voices and howled like the wild asses of the desert. For a time these rival journals howled in unison. Kearney is always an echo. First, he echoed the Chronicle; now he is echoing the Call and Bulletin. When he reflected the Chronicle his brass-bound mouth shouted denunciation to the railroad and the bonanza kings, and was silent upon gas and water. Now he is voicing the wrongs of the Bulletin, and Spring Valley Water Company is getting hark from the tomb. Now, for two Sundays, Kearney has denounced the thieving, hell-horn, hell-bound water rats, and passed water resolutions that have seen the editorial rooms of the Call and Bulletin; so Mr. Pickering styles him "our friend Denis," and Mr. Fitch writes him "Mr. Kearney," "President Kearney," and "Mr. President Kearney." The Call prints two columns of his water speech, and our friend Mr. Pickering, in one of his able editorials, entitled "Duplicity," says: "We are pleased to see that our wily newspaper contemporary, which has labored on every possible occasion to aid the Spring Valley Water Company in its exertions, does for once tacitly admit that the course of the workmen is right in trying to save the people from its rapacity; but we imagine this is done in order to try and get the Workingmen's party to nominate men for office who can be used by the Spring Valley Company. The trick is full of duplicity, as the people will see in due time." And our friends of the Chronicle—mirabile dictu!—make fun of Kearney, ridicule him and his sand-lot mob; entitle the remarks of this "white-plumed Navarre" of oratory a "funeral oration," "worked off in perspiration and pedestrianism," with the alien Wellock to "wet his whistle" while he read "a mused and voluminous manuscript" written by some one else. Kearney is called the "stout little President," with "Roman cloak of pickled olive tint, Cardigan jacket, and dirty shirt"—and so on down through a column of satire. The "Dictator" is laughed at and scoffed at, held up to ridicule and contempt, jeered at and spit upon through a whole column of vituperative wit, with editorial mention of the sand-lot meeting as "adroit, mealy-mouthed prevarications heard on the sand-lots." All this indicates that the wind from the sand-lot is blowing in another direction; that the Bulletin and Call intend to become the organs of the new organization; that the old Independent party, No. 33 Secretary, with its sleepless eye, is to be revamped under guise of the Workingman's party; that Dashblank is to be its candidate for Governor; that in the Bulletin editorial room is to be held its nominating convention. All this indicates the possibility of an existing conspiracy that shall injure the Republican party more than the Democratic, give the members of Congress and the electoral vote to the Democracy, and the city of San Francisco to the Bulletin.

In declaring that not more than fifteen Chinese persons (ambassadors and shipwrecked persons excepted) shall come to the United States of America upon one vessel the American Congress has taken a new departure with reference to immigration. Heretofore we have invited to our shores all people, and have trusted to our breadth of continent to absorb and harmonize all the discordant elements, of diverse civilizations and unassimilative races. This sentiment—the growth of humanity, policy, sentimentality, religious stupidity, and demagogism—came to be called "liberality." It became crystallized into acceptance, and we were taught by the churches, the politicians, and the dreamers, that it was selfish, undemocratic, wicked, and impolitic to pass any laws restrictive of immigration. True, we had found that we could neither absorb nor assimilate the Indian race, so we massacred it, and stole its lands. We found the negro race a difficulty, both social and political, and we went to war over it. All this did not deter some weak-minded people from continuing blind to the dangers of Chinese immigration. Our churches at the East, and some of the preachers who knew no better, thought the Chinese had souls to save, and that it was our duty to save them. Some of our rich people, recognizing that money could be made out of Chinese cheap labor, thought the material advancement of our State and their purses matters of large consideration. Some politicians, looking to the time when Chinese should vote, prated in a demagogical manner of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. Some dreamers, poets, humanitarians, and magpietists chattered of the earth being "the Lord's," and that any of his gypsy races should come here to enjoy its fullness. We here in California, being intelligent, observed the practical effects of Chinese immigration. We on this coast were wiser and better informed upon this matter than the reverend jackdaws of Eastern pulpits, or the shallow thinkers of Eastern stumps, or the smatterers of the Eastern press, or the well fed and cultured thoughtless, who saw no danger because it was the breadth of a continent away from them. The Pacific coast observed, then reflected, then spoke, then begged, then threatened. First our men of pioneer thought, then our politicians, then our clergy, then our sand-lot, then everybody; and the Congress of the United States has answered our prayers, conceded our arguments, or feared our threats—we care not which—in giving to the nation a law that more than any other law of this decade aids to save our civilization and preserve our form of government. If it had not done so the problem would have been worked out in violence and blood. Our Representatives in Congress have all of them done well. Mr. Sargent has done especially well. Senator Booth's speech was broad, massive, dignified, and effective. We thank him. Messrs. Page, Davis, and our other Pacific Coast Representatives we also thank. The Chinese was not a political question.

It was simply a question of national life and self-preservation. The value of this bill is great in another direction: it opens the door to a consideration of the proposition whether we may not profitably revise and make less "liberal" our naturalization laws as now applicable to European people. We can not much longer afford to allow the ignorant, the criminal, and the pauper outpourings of Europe to make our laws and control our political affairs. In continuation of this line of thought let our readers peruse the very able communication of Mr. Solomon Heydenfeldt, Jr., printed in another column.

The New York Times, of February 5th, under heading of an article entitled "Shall There be Another Monopoly?" suggests the formation of an alliance between the Southern Pacific and Texas Pacific railroads. The Texas Pacific, under the manipulation of Tom Scott, says the writer, has been losing ground in the Southern States; the Southern people have awoke to the realization of the fact that the pretense of a "Southern" road manipulated by the head of a great Pennsylvania corporation is a dishonest one; in a word, that the Texas Pacific road, instead of being Southern in its objects and interests, is totally at variance with both. The Texas Pacific is weaker to-day in Congress than it has ever been before; hence the writer concludes that Tom Scott would gladly effect a bargain with his principal competitors. In the meantime the Southern Pacific is gradually advancing eastward. It is progressing without aid from anybody. Nevertheless there are grounds of distrust and suspicion against the Southern road because of its alliance with the Central Pacific, and danger is scented, lest it shall be but a new monopoly, or a branch of the present one, "as odious in its methods and as injurious in its effects upon business interests as the monopoly formed by the Union and Pacific companies." Now, as to this railroad monopoly of which we hear so much, it must be considered from different standpoints. If we were writing this article for the New Orleans Picayune, we should favor the construction of a Southern Pacific road, independent and competitive, that should be managed in the interest of the cotton States, of which New Orleans is the chief commercial city. If we were writing for the St. Louis Globe, we should favor its ownership and control at St. Louis, and would have it manipulated in the interest and advancement of that locality. If we were writing for the New York Times, it would be the interest and advancement of the great emporium of New York that we would first regard. What would advance New York would, in our opinion, be the best thing to do. If we owned clipper ships Panama Railroad and steam navigation stock, we should feel sadly vexed that one or more transcontinental railroads should affect the values of our property. If we were doing business at Reno, or anywhere in the State of Nevada, we would grumble at paying freight for goods to San Francisco and back. If we wrote for the San Diego Herald, and thought Tom Scott or the devil could build a railroad to Horton's Addition, direct the oriental commerce from San Francisco to San Diego, and pile its wharves with the teas and silks and spices of India, we would favor Thomas and aid him to procure unlimited subsidies and indorsements from the General Government. But, we are writing for San Francisco. We live here; our property is here; our interests are here; and we have not attained that moral elevation and condition of self-abnegation to which most editors attain. We are selfish; we are for San Francisco; we are for its merchants, and its people, and its property; and because the Central Pacific is owned here and controlled here, and because its interests run parallel with the interest of San Francisco, and because it can not help itself without helping us, and because it can not make money without building up and extending and helping all the interests of this community, we are with it and for it—with it against San Diego, Reno, St. Louis, New Orleans, New York, Tom Scott, and the devil. We are desirous, and only desirous, to realize for San Francisco her destiny. We desire she should become a great, wealthy commercial emporium. We desire her port to be the only entrepot of the Asiatic trade. We desire all the business of the coast to centre here. We are not going to throw ourselves into any great moral contortion if the Central Pacific does not pay money into the national treasury as a reserve fund to pay bonds that will mature next century. We are in favor of letting the Central and the Southern Pacific Railroad Companies alone, so long as they are extending their roads. In this they are extending our trade jurisdiction; they are giving value to our city property; they are adding to our wealth; they are contributing to the realization of our dreams of commercial greatness for San Francisco; they are compelling the merchants of Nevada to purchase in San Francisco, where they ought to buy; they are preparing to let our merchants and traders supply Arizona that belongs to us, and whose trade ought to come here, and not go eastward. In a word, they are helping us, and we feel that it is our duty to kindly treat the ass that bears our burdens. When the roads are all done, all built, and the question of regulating fares and freights comes up, why, of course, we reserve to ourselves the privilege then of joining the mob for their regulation, confiscation, or whatever name popular virtue may then clothe itself in to steal them.

AFTERMATH.

If the Chinese bill fails by the Presidential veto, we advise the Republican party to consider whether it will be necessary to run any electoral ticket at all. A Republican candidate will not dare to pledge himself upon the issue, and none other can receive the votes of California, Oregon, and Nevada. To a solid Democratic South will be added the Pacific States. This Chinese question is destined, if not settled now, to become a national one. It is a narrow mind that does not see that it will array all the laborers of the nation against unlimited immigration. If the Democratic party shall oppose the Chinese inflow and the Republican party favor it, there will be no Republican party outside of New England. The cotton mills of Massachusetts and the clock peddlers of Connecticut may for a time impose upon the Eastern public the belief that this is a question of humanity or religious sentiment. We know that it is a question of cotton cloths and clocks. We have never heard any suggestion of a withdrawal of the Pacific States from the Union upon this question, but if our people should prevent the Chinese from landing what would the Government do about it?

Suppose a mob should burn an English or an American Chinese passenger ship, and suppose a jury trial for the crime, or a civil suit for damages, then what? Would the Government guard our port with armed troops? Would it use its small army to force us to receive Chinese coolies and Chinese prostitutes, gamblers, and opium-eaters? Who would compose the rank and file of the little army? Suppose the State of California should tax the Chinese on their trades and occupations, what would the Government do about it? Suppose instead of sending them to jail for violating our municipal ordinances we should set them to work in chain gangs, what would the President or Mr. Conkling do? Suppose the people of San Francisco and of California should quite resolutely and quite earnestly say: "This is a matter to us of life and death, of personal safety and self-defense, and we will risk our lives and our property before the East, and the Methodist Church, and the sensational clergy, shall dictate laws to our injury;" then what would the Congress of the United States think it best to do?

A large majority of the citizens of this State entertain most generous feelings toward the Chinese, and every day protect those at present among us against violence. We recognize their rights under the treaty; we use them in our houses and in all employments. We ask that no more be allowed to come. If Congress will not give us a law in this direction what will Mr. and Mrs. Hayes do if we kill the new-comers and burn the ships? Will they declare war against us and kill us? Now we do not intend to do anything of the kind; but if we did what would Mrs. Hayes, and Mr. Hayes, and Mr. Conkling, and Mr. Hamlin, and Henry Ward Beecher, and the Reverend Joseph Cook, and the clock peddlers of Connecticut, and the Methodist Church, and the people in Boston, do? Is there any known and practical mode of compelling us of San Francisco to admit to residence in our city a class that we will not have?

Suppose we get up a public sentiment here that will not allow houses to be rented to Chinese, nor anybody to employ them, and that we let the Chinese so severely alone that they can not even make wages or buy bread, will the people of the East pay the passage of an hundred thousand Chinese to come over and live upon them? Suppose we impose upon the Chinese and murder them until there are actual lawlessness and violence in our State, and the Legislature is in session, and it will not ask Mr. and Mrs. Hayes to interfere to suppress this little civil insurrection, how then about sending the army to us? We are not going to do any foolish thing. We are not going to become crazy over this question. There are a hundred ways that in this game with the pious wing of the Republican party we can beat it. We are right and the Methodist magpietists are not right. God will not answer their prayers, for they are but the ravings of fools. We shall keep cool and keep our tempers, and, just as sure as Republican Government survives and God lives, we will triumph, and the barbarous hordes of Chinese heathens shall not overcome us.

"Well, old man," said a friend of ours the other day to a friend of his, whom he had not seen for some months, "how is your rheumatism?" "Oh, it will not bother me much longer, please God, if this weather holds," was the thoughtful reply; "it is nearly cured now." "That's good news—devilish good. What are you using?" "Consumption."

The humorous verses in another column entitled "A Doleful Tale," though cut from Harper's Weekly, are not formally credited, as we are not informed from what publication the editor of Harper's Weekly cut them. We should say they were pretty certainly written in London, and in the Weekly they were illustrated with excellent wood engravings which, also, we judge to have been executed for an English periodical. If we are wrong in these matters we will cheerfully apologize whenever the Harpers will stop their system of importing the blocks of such papers as the London Graphic for use in their own journal without any hint to the reader that the admirable pictures so obtained are not original.

By the way, we are indebted to Harper's Weekly for still another bit of verse this week—the three stanzas called "The Fountain of Tears." They appeared in that journal December 3, 1870. As to their authorship we can only say that last October these stanzas (and three additional ones of notably inferior quality) were sent to us in manuscript, accompanied with a note signed "Emma A. Dervan," who gave her address as 35 Fifth Street, San Francisco. Mrs. (or Miss) Dervan writes: "I submit the inclosed to you, hoping you will think it worthy of insertion in your paper. Any reward that you may see fit to offer will be thankfully received."

It is not our habit to read the agony items in the daily papers unless they seem to contain some more than usually toothsome scandal, but here is a head-line that commands attention: "A Slighted Husband Kills Himself after Poisoning his Three Children." This certainly was most reprehensible. It is doubtful if the poisoning of one's own children is ever justifiable. Philosophers, we believe, accord a certain latitude of action with regard to the children of others, but hardly any conjugal slight short of a dead cut would justify the poisoning of persons not slighted, even if they were strangers and adults.

It is a common expression to say that politics is in a chaotic condition, but really there is no better expression to indicate the utter confusion of political affairs in this city. Kearneyism is a new element, and in the solution of the political problem an unknown quantity. It is new, earnest, and energetic. It has carried the city of Sacramento, the capital of our State. It has carried Oakland, the Athens and Hub. It has carried San José and Los Angeles, two wide-apart and representative communities. It has carried the city of San Francisco, which is the metropolis. To underrate the importance of the movement would not indicate political sagacity. Kearney is uneducated; his career is an accident; he may or may not be honest; his followers may or may not be workmen or tramps—at all events they vote, and Kearneyism is a power. The Democratic party is utterly demoralized; it is cowed down and frightened; its leaders have so far shown themselves to be political dung-hills; Kearney gaffs them till the blood runs; crows over them, and, from Senator Gwin down to Joseph Nougues, we have yet to see the Democrat who has the moral courage to assert himself against Kearney. In the meantime, Kearney kicks and cuffs, abuses and insults them, and declares that he will not even stoop to pick up the organization they have thrown away.

The Chronicle is souring on the drayman, and just to the extent that the acetic fermentation sets in at the Chronicle office, just to that extent do the Call and Bulletin sweeten on him.

Rumor says that John F. Swift is likely to become the Kearney candidate for Governor; that the Bulletin and Call will support a movement that shall acknowledge Swift for its Mirabeau with a slate for State and county names that Messrs. Fitch and Pickering shall aid to make up. This would be a formidable movement, and might be a success, sweeping both the Republican and Democratic parties clear out of sight of success. At present there is but one party in California. The Republicans are endeavoring to organize. M. D. Boruck is working like a beaver. Clubs are being organized, and the idea of a divided Democracy leaving a walk-over to the Republicans inspires certain ambitious politicians to bestir themselves for nominations, but the rank and file of the party are indifferent to its welfare, and if President Hayes should veto the Chinese bill it will be found very difficult to organize Republicans at all.

In the meantime Kearneyism is beginning to quarrel. The opposition in his own party is becoming very pronounced and active. Knight, the brains of his early movement, denounces Kearney as dishonest and mercenary. Hundreds of his most active followers have deserted him. In the quarrel between the Chronicle and Wellock he chooses to throw overboard a journal that has done everything for him, without which he would have been unknown, and adhere to an ally who has but one vote, and who is personally unpopular. It seems strange that Kearney should choose the alien and ignorant Englishman under these circumstances, unless there is some truth in the oft-repeated assertion, that he is in the power of Wellock, and afraid of him.

Kearney will meet another danger when the Convention adjourns. He must be either for or against the Constitution, and whatever position he takes he must win a victory. Like all new leaders, he can not survive a defeat. When his nominating conventions convene he must decide between a score of candidates for each office, and when they adjourn he will reap his first harvest of disappointed, angry politicians. Kearney should hold no nominating conventions. He must be dictator or nothing. An absolute monarch has no body of constitutional advisers; he has a council, and his decrees are absolute. He might nominate a ticket for State and municipal officers, and such is the nature of the mob, and such the condition of political affairs, that it is possible, and we had almost said probable, that it would sweep the county and the town.

In the meantime it is the part of dignity for the Republican party to mind its own business, perfect its organization, hold its conventions, and ignore Kearneyism altogether. It would be the dignified, decent, and honest course for the Democracy to do the same thing, acting as though there was no such scum as Kearneyism rising upon the bubbling Democratic pot.

Under English rule Malta is rapidly taking its place among the favored spots of the earth in respect of civilization and enlightened Christianity. Executions there will henceforth be conducted privately, and the hangman will no longer be permitted to add the weight of his personal influence to the heavy woes of the condemned by leaping on his shoulders to tighten the rope. This is a distinct advance toward mercy and good breeding; the culprit will not have so easy a death, but will be spared an affront to his feelings harder to bear than even the most protracted strangulation.

It is all very well for the Eastern States to laugh at the "mutterings of secession" which their ears have reached on the Pacific Coast, but if we can get no relief from this Chinese incubus the mutterings may be no laughing matter. And this we beg them to consider: in addition to several brigades of white militia—the Drathers—we can put into the field fifty thousand Chinese troops; whereas, taking their politicians, editors, and preachers all together, they can not possibly muster an effective feebleness of more than a half-million men of all legs; and if one Chinaman can't thrash ten of them while the militia look on and count the slain we underrate the speed of the celestial warrior.

In the Oakland ferry-boat disaster a man lost a portmanteau containing, he confesses, six hundred manuscript pages of dissertation on the Chinese question. The destination of that MS. was, without a reasonable doubt, the ARGONAUT office, and we lift our palms in gratitude to a merciful Providence who provided a collision in order to sink it. We shall never again look upon our beautiful bay without thinking of it as our waste basket, and our only regret—a tender one—will be that the writer survived his work. There is still a hope that he may drown himself trying to fish out his diluted arguments for the Call.

There is a town in Massachusetts—West Suffield—which exults in the possession of a stern Puritan who added a decent and godly gloom to death by haling one of his children into the room where its mother was engaged in dying, and diligently flogging it before her fading eyes until all was over. A certain levity has grown up about the death-bed in this frivolous age, and we note with satisfaction this attempt to dispel it and give to the transition from the sorrows of earth to those of heaven that air of seriousness which it had in the early days of the New England colonies.

It has been decided at Baltimore, by Judge Bond, of the United States Circuit Court, that under the laws of the United States stuffing a ballot-box is not a penal offense. It is at least not a very moral proceeding, and, except when performed in the interest of the Republican party, ought, we think, to be discouraged by unfriendly legislation by the States.

At the San Francisco Verein an American was trying to convince a German that the military establishment of the Empire was a costly toy. "Why," said he, "the new bronze steel artillery about to be adopted would itself entail an onerous taxation." "No doubt," assented the German, "the new guns will cost something in the end, but consider how gradual their substitution has been managed. First, there were the old-fashioned brass and cast-iron pieces. These were replaced by the Krupps, and these in their turn must give way to the new model. The expense of getting a perfect weapon is thus spread over a number of years."

General Grant says that the recent losses of France in men and territory were a small price to pay for getting rid of the Empire. It certainly is a good deal smaller to those survivors of the war included in the present boundaries than to the inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine and the fellows left dead upon the field of battle. The Republic came very cheap indeed, also, to General Grant. It does not seem to occur to most observers that the people who reap the reward of a nation's sacrifice of life are not the same people who made the sacrifice.

An anonymous correspondent—we do not commonly reply to anonymous correspondents, but make an exception in this one's favor, for he lives at San Rafael, and probably does not know any better—wants to know if an Irishman is not as good as a Chinaman if he behaves himself. We must have more data. What well-behaving Irishman is meant, and does the Chinaman mentioned behave himself? And what is meant by "good"? Being informed points we will cheerfully undertake to answer according to our prejudices.

A VOYAGE ROUND MY POCKETS.

Adapted from the French.

There is no use trying to hide the fact—last night I was horribly tight. Let him that is without sin throw the first bottle.

How came I so? At an improvised little supper at the Café Anglais—that I know. Afterward—let me see—afterward, I—I can really recall nothing of what took place afterward. A cloudy curtain has descended upon my memory, like the entr'actes curtain in a fairy extravaganza.

Something did happen—must have happened; that everything proves, especially the fact that I slept in my boots, and have a terrible pale and tired-looking face.

Nice goings-on, indeed. A man of twenty-eight overtaken by champagne like a school-boy out for a holiday! Disgraceful is no name for it.

How on earth am I to find out what happened last night? Suppose I ask the servant! But no; all he could do would be to say at what time I got home this morning. Cuvier, they say, from a single bone could reconstruct an antediluvian animal; let me see if from such point of departure I can not reconstruct my existence during the last twelve hours.

But where to look for the bone? Happy thought! My pockets * * * I tremble; what shall the harvest be? My purse is—empty. Devil! Ha, what papers are these? Bill from the Café Anglais; this must be the most important document. "Salon No. 14"—I could have betted upon it; 14 is my favorite room. "Total, 820 francs." We must have been going it, though. How many of us were there, and who were we? Probably some of the boys, but which of them? Let me see if I can identify them. "Huitres Portugaises"—that stands for Lucien: Arcachon oysters, he pretends, are the only ones fit to be eaten. Lucien was there, ten to one. That's one. "Polage à la purée de gibier." If I am not mistaken that soup—I mean that conflagration—was suggested by Maxime. That's two. "Filets de sole à la Joinville"—Fernand, who is a thoroughbred Orleanist. "Canetons de Rouen à l'orange"—pre-cisely: Polastron comes from Rouen. "Salade de légumes à la Russe"—Semenoff was there, too. "Bombe à la cardinal"—who the devil was he, anyhow? Let-me—see. I have it: Marcel is Cardinal Donnet's cousin.

Lucien, Maxime, Fernand, Polastron, Semenoff, Marcel, and myself—the party is made up. Any women? Probably there were. Certainly there were, or else these photographs lie most foully in their cards. It is all the fashion for superperesses to distribute their photographs by the pack. That's Henrietta, with her galvanized smile. This is the eternal Jenny, in powder, and smiling over her weather shoulder at the risk of dislocating her neck. And this is—who is she? I don't know that I ever saw her. Singular!

Not so bad-looking is No. 3; in fact, she is rather inclined to be good-looking. Head small and cast in the modern mould; no forehead, very little nose, and a mere suspicion of mouth. Nothing but eyes, but they are glorious. And what lashes! Fair, I take it; and I'm glad she is, though I don't know why. Those little curls on her forehead must look like golden smoke.

Young—a mere child—seventeen at the most. Modest, I judge from her dress, which is puritanically plain and high. What a figure! Our forefathers would have compared her to a willow, but our forefathers never were particularly strong in the matter of similes. No ear-rings, no bracelets. Who the deuce can she have been? Where did she come from, and how did she get there? It is evident that she sat by me—in my quality of Amphitryon I can have permitted nothing else. I must have talked with her—made a fool of myself, offended her probably, and then got drunk to drown my sorrow.

Well, in salon No. 14 there were nine of us—three of the sex to which we owe our mothers. So much for the actors; but where is the drama? Let me proceed on my journey through my pockets.

Two cards—"R. de Fayet Moret, lieutenant aux chasseurs à pied," "Jules Buthot, capitaine du 12^e de ligne." What is the meaning of this. I never knew so many officers in my life.

I have it—there has been a quarrel and we have exchanged cards. That's the drama; one duel, at least; possibly two. But what with, what about, with whom? What was the provocation? I know that I am abominably quarrelsome when I'm tipsy; but was I challenger or the challenged? That left cheek of mine does look a little swollen; a blow, doubtless. O Lord! There is a penciled memorandum on the pasteboard of the lieutenant, "Bois de Boulogne—10 o'clock."

Phew! Have I time to get there? O, horror! It is on the stroke of noon. I am a dishonored man—posted as a coward by this time; and who will believe that I overslept myself? I have hardly courage to take another step; but on—on. Let me know the worst.

A handkerchief—fine cambric—a baronial crest in the corner. Young man, you're on the high road to the gallows, now; pocket-picking or highway robbery, sure.

(Oh, my poor head, my poor head!)

And where did that nosegay at my buttonhole come from? The little pansies are drooping and the thread is untied. I never can have bought such a trumpery thing from a flower-girl; it was given to me or else I took it. It was given to me, of course. This is the sequel of the story of that little blonde. She gave it to me, knowing I was about to fight—probably to fight for her. That must be it.

My apprehension redoubles. A while ago I wished to know all; now I fear to learn too much. What if I found—Why, confound it, this isn't my overcoat!

My overcoat is chestnut-colored and this one has the hue of the Corinthian grape!

I have been traveling round some one else's pockets!

But this not being my overcoat it follows that—

The duel isn't mine;

The bill wasn't mine;

The photographs aren't mine;

The cards weren't given to me;

No more was the bouquet.

And the pretty blonde—she isn't mine.

For did I steal the handkerchief.

For—good God!—I must have stolen the overcoat!

THE VALUE OF THE CAT.

All wild fur-bearing animals are becoming extinct. They are fast disappearing before the march of civilization. Where is the future supply of furs to come from? Evidently, if furs continue to be worn, recourse must be had to breeding in captivity or domesticating the animals which bear them. But, it will be answered, they do not thrive, few of them will live in captivity, and most of them are untamable. What then can be done? Nothing is left but to evolve the familiar domestic cat up to his highest capacity as a fur producer. Here man can improve upon nature. If he desires a pig with a small head, in the course of a few generations the pig has, so to say, that kind of a head put upon him. By a judicious selection of animals for breeding, wonderful changes and improvements have been made among other domestic animals. Our horses, sheep, dogs, and poultry, all bear witness to the power of man to produce among them great changes in form and stature, appearance, disposition, and intelligence. Had the marriages of mankind, during the last thousand years, been governed by the same exercise of reason which has compelled such marvelous improvements among the domestic lower animals, what a noble race of men would fill our shoes to-day!

But while the efforts of breeders have given us a "Rarus" and a "Plymouth Rock" the cat has suffered from neglect. Left to the influence of natural selection, he has degenerated. Civilization has not improved him, save perhaps to soften the ruggedness of his disposition and to add greater flexibility and wider compass to his voice. In the vocal cultivation of the animal his physique has been neglected. He has been bred a mere musician, and has degenerated in all truly valuable qualities. Such eminent naturalists as Temminck and Ruppell traced his descent from the Egyptian cat (felis maniculata), an animal two feet and five inches in length, and sporting a nine-inch tail. This ancient Egyptian was nine and a half inches in height at the shoulder. Compared with one of his ancestors of old Nile, the best of corner grocery Toms would look a kitten. The time has come to change this state of things. In view of what may be done in the fur trade, it is worth while to see what may be made out of the cat.

In California, wool-growing has been in general profitable, but it has its uncertainties. Stock-men may soon find the production of fur more lucrative. In Holland, careful breeding has given the cat a covering of fine and salable fur. The skins are sold at half a guinea each. Of the scrub race on this coast, California has probably upward of a million. It would be difficult to estimate the vast number which are annually slaughtered for their tallow. This single product of our cats is all they yield of any commercial value at present. An importation of Dutch Toms to begin with, crossed with carefully selected native stock, would, in a few years of our glorious climate, give us a grade of cats in fur and flesh the peers of that boasted race, the pride of the Flemish heart. Let us not breed for fur alone, but aim at a thorough development of all valuable qualities. Tallow they have now, while flesh, bone, and fur are lacking. These will follow from the infusion of the Holland strain. With proper care and attention there could scarcely be a limit to the cat's development in this air and sunshine. His increase is so rapid when encouraged that we may soon have ten millions, and in a few years probably one hundred millions, in this State. The owners of our furred stock should be entirely utilitarian in their aims. Breed out the voice, breed in the tail, should be their motto. The more tail, the more fur. The unhappy controversial disposition of the animal will require correction. Its manifestation usually results in more or less injury to the fur.

Besides the fur and tallow, the bones and flesh can be utilized. Catbone is tougher and more elastic than whalebone. It is owing to these properties of his bones that Tom is enabled to drop safely off the roof of a church, and walk sedately home with an unruffled air of philosophic piety. His meat is similar to that of the rabbit, but more delicate, and the anatomical resemblance of the two animals is great. The fur of the cat is much like the ermine; therefore, when the market for fur is inactive, we can export whalebone; should whalebone be quiet, we furnish an excellent article of canned rabbit; should rabbit become dull, we ship whalebone and ermine again, etc. It is this very variety of the products which the cat can be made to yield that makes him of so great prospective value.

Perhaps the best use of the cat may be found to lie in his capacity to generate electricity. If stroked rapidly with the hand in a dark room, he fairly sparkles with the fluid. By means of carefully adjusted stroking machinery, running at a high velocity, a single old Tom generator might be made to brilliantly illuminate a whole block.*

It is rather early to discuss the proper seasons for gathering the fur and the best means of divesting the animal of his covering. This must remain a matter for future investigation and experiment. It is known, however, that the cat's vitality is not impaired by the growing of three perfect skins each year. Possibly it would not be too great a tax on his powers to take off four. The frequent skinning of the quadruped is said to injuriously affect his temper, and the process may be one of some difficulty. The pelts obtained from the living cat are known to be far superior to those which are taken from him after death.

WM. A. LAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

* For this valuable suggestion the writer is indebted to Professor Benjamin, of the San Francisco Academy of Sciences.

It has been truthfully remarked that one of the most important social accomplishments is that of entering a room gracefully. A writer in the London Saturday Review begs to differ here, and declares that the ability to leave one, easily and judiciously, is superior. He thinks it painful to see people anxious to beat a retreat from a call or visit, and yet apparently as unable to escape as rats in a trap, although nothing bars their egress, and all persons would gladly dispense with their company. A bulky essay might be written on the art of going away and the difficulty in bidding farewell to a host in a manner that will convey to him the impression that you have enjoyed yourself. The subject is commended to the consideration of those eminent students who make social conventionalities a study.

THE TRAMP.

In the gathering darkness of a chill November evening a dejected-looking tramp came slowly down a street in San Francisco. His appearance was forlorn enough to have created pity in the most obdurate heart; but although he brushed against several persons hastening by, they were too much absorbed in their own interests to notice him.

As he neared a large house—the residence of some prosperous merchant or successful speculator—the glare from one of its lower windows suddenly caught his eye, and, turning aside, he looked into the apartment. It was a dining-room, about which the gaslight and a bright fire in the grate diffused warmth and cheerfulness, while the abundance of food on the dinner-table mocked the wanderer's hunger and misery. Placed in so striking a contrast with this scene of warmth and plenty, his condition grew even more pitiable and desolate. Not long, however, did his famished gaze peer through the window, for a servant—unaware of the stranger's presence—closed the inside blinds.

The wanderer was now quite in darkness, the feeble rays of the street lamp being lost in the gloom before they could reach his position in the shadow of the front steps, and the moon not yet visible.

Heeding neither the sound of voices nor the rattle of knives and forks in the room, and oblivious to being alone in darkness, he still lingered at the window, his aching head pressed against the glass. A strange numbness seemed to paralyze his limbs, but his thoughts were free. Back, on swift wings, they carried him over all the weary journey, upon which he had started in obedience to the resistless migratory impulse of his nature. Not as a passive spectator did he see his life pass panorama-like before him; but as a living participant he reentered upon all its vicissitudes. Involuntarily he shuddered at the recollection of the dangers which had threatened his life, and of his miraculous hairbreadth escapes! Now he was stealing a ride on a farm-wagon, or crouching unseen on a steamer, or clinging (half-asleep) to the under side of a freight car, all to expedite him to his unknown goal.

In his trance-like state he seemed to be with his wayside companions again, adding his voice to the lively hum of theirs. But more often, weary, and deserted by his false friends, he took his solitary way over barren tracks and forsaken regions, to fall fainting on hot, sandy plains.

Though only a tramp, he was endowed with æsthetic faculties, and he loved to linger among the beauties of nature or works of art. In such contemplation he could forget his cares and exhaustion. Even as he stood by the darkened window the memory of those happy moments, so few and so brief, overpowered his senses, and he dreamed of a brook whose banks were decked with fragrant wild flowers. But the harsh recollection of stern hardships and cruel deprivations dispelled the restful illusion, and relentlessly his thoughts hurried him on.

Again he seemed to stand at the door of a farm-house, or by an open kitchen window in the city, trying to get a morsel of food. Distinctly, as if the voices then jarred upon his ear, he heard the coarse and unfeeling denials of his prayer for bread. He felt only too painfully the wet dish-cloth flash in his face as a rude menial bade him depart. And yet none were too poor to spare what would have satisfied his hunger—that hunger, the keenness of whose pangs was never dulled.

On, on flew his thoughts, and full well he remembered the nights passed under steps or in woodsheds; but no memory of peaceful slumbers soothed his spirit. Sleepless and in pain had he spent many a night whose morrow brought naught save renewed exertion and additional fatigue to his tired frame.

And now, as once again the silent majesty of night surrounded the outcast, a strange presentiment warned him that his wanderings were nearly ended; the goal was almost reached. Lower on his breast sank the wanderer's head, and drooping were the wings of thought. The images of his retrospect began to fade; they became entirely indistinct. Colder and stiffer waxed his body, and the hour grew late. No footfall now echoed on the chill night air. The clouds had parted, and high in the heavens the moon beamed with a clear, cheerless light, while the very stars shone with a glitter of cold steel.

Night melted into the gray dawn, yet the traveler stirred not; and in the morning, his last breath a white frost on the glass, was found the rigid, lifeless wanderer—a fly, frozen dead on the window-pane.

FAIRFIELD.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

An observant spectator will notice that the first-floor windows of a large house at the corner of Norfolk Street, London, present a peculiar appearance. The shutters are up, and they are covered thickly with dust, while through the chinks can be seen the blinds, also thick with dust, and mouldering away with age. These shutters and blinds have been in exactly the same position untouched for more than forty years. During that time no human foot has entered that room. And the reason is: Forty years ago Lord Dysart was engaged to be married. The day was fixed, the wedding morning arrived, the breakfast was laid out in the spacious and handsome room, when it was discovered that the bride was missing. A note in her handwriting was found, addressed to the bridegroom, briefly informing him that she had eloped that morning with his best man, a gay and gallant captain of dragoons. The jilted bridegroom did not say much, but he went alone to the room in which the wedding breakfast was laid out, with his own hands put up the shutters and drew the blinds, locked the door and took the key. He gave orders that the doors should be nailed up and barred with padlocked bars, and that no one should enter the room again. When the house was let it was stipulated that the room in question should remain untouched, and the sum of £200 per annum was paid to the tenant to compensate him for the deprivation of the use of the room. The room has never been entered since the day he closed it, and there are the "wedding meats" mouldering silently away, and the ornaments crumbling into the dust in the funereal gloom.

You can not dream yourself into a character; you must hammer and forge yourself one.

INTAGLIOS.

In a Garret.

This realm is sacred to the past;
Within its drowsy shades are treasures rare
Of dust and dreams: the years are long since last
A stranger's footfall pressed the creaking stair.

Along the low joists of the sloping roof
Moth-eaten garments hang, a gloomy row,
Like tall, fantastic ghosts which stand aloof,
Holding grim converse with the long ago.

Here in the summer, at a broken pane,
The yellow wasps come in, and buzz and build
Among the rafters; wind and snow and rain
All enter, as the seasons are fulfilled.

The mildewed chest behind the chimney holds
Old letters, stained and nibbled—faintly show
The faded phrases on the tattered folds,
Once kissed, perhaps, or tear-wet—who may know?

I wonder if the small, sleek mouse that shaped
His winter nest between those rugged beams,
Was happier that his bed was lined and draped
With the bright warp and woof of youthful dreams?

Why rob these shadows of their sacred trust?
Let the thick cobwebs hide the day once more;
Leave the dead years to silence and to dust,
And close again the long-unopened door.

Free Will.

Strength of the beautiful day, green and blue and white!
Voice of leaf and of bird!

Low voice of mellow surf far down the curving shore!
Strong white clouds and gray, slow and calm in your flight,
Aimless, majestic, unheard,

You walk in air, and dissolve, and vanish for evermore!
Lying here midst poppies and maize, tired of the loss and the gain,

Dreaming of rest, oh, faint
Would I, like ye, transmute the terror of fate into praise.

Yet thou, O Earth! art a slave, orderly without care,
Perfect, thou know'st not why.
For He whose Word is thy life has spared the gift of Will!

We men are not so brave, our lives are not so fair,
Our law is an eye for an eye,
And the light that shines for our good, we use to our ill.
Fails boyhood's hope ere long, for the deed still mocks the plan.

And the knave is the honest man.
And thus we grow weak in a world created to make us strong.

But woe to the man who quails before that which makes him man!

Though heaven be sweet to win,
One thing is sweeter yet—freedom to side with Sin!
In Man succeeds, or fails, this great creative plan;
His liberty to sin.

Makes worth God's winning the love even God may not compel.

Shall I, then, murmur, and be wroth at Nature's peace?
Though I be ill at ease,

I hold one link of the chain of His happiness in my hand.
JULIAN HAWTHORNE.

Sonnet.

Vainly my heart had with thy sorceries striven;
It had no refuge from thy love—no heaven
But in thy fatal presence—from afar
It owned thy power, and trembled like a star O'erfraught with light and splendor. Could I deem How dark a shadow should obscure its beam?
Could I believe that pain could ever dwell
Where thy bright presence cast its blissful spell?
Thou wert my proud palladium; could I fear
The averting Destinies when thou wert near?
Thou wert my Destiny; thy song, thy fame,
The wild enchantments clustering round thy name,
Were my soul's heritage, its royal dower,
Its glory, and its kingdom, and its power!
SARAH HELEN WHITMAN.

The Fountain of Tears.

If you go over desert and mountain,
Far into the country of sorrow,
To-day and to-morrow and to-morrow,
And may be for months and for years,
You shall come, with a heart that is bursting
For trouble and toiling and thirsting—
You shall certainly come to the fountain
At length—to the Fountain of Tears.

Very peaceful the place is, and solely
For piteous lamenting and sighing,
And those who come living or dying
Alike from their hopes and their fears;
Full of cypress-like shadows the place is,
And statues that cover their faces;
But out of the gloom springs the holy
And beautiful Fountain of Tears.

And it flows, and it flows, with a motion
So gentle, and lovely, and listless,
And murmurs a tune so resistless
To him who hath suffered and hears—
You shall surely, without a word spoken,
Kneel down there and know your heart broken,
And yield to the long-curbed emotion,
That day by the Fountain of Tears.

Eventualities.

O sluggish and silent sea,
Where never a bark hath sailed;
O shores of the realm to be,
When the summit of hope is scaled;
In the vastness of Time, shall we,
When the day star on high hath paled,
Abide by that desolate sea,
Where never a bark hath sailed?
From the German of Heine.

If It Could Be.

If I could hold your hands to-night,
Just for a little while, and know
That only I, of all the world,
Possessed them so.

A slender shape in that old chair,
If I could see you here to-night,
Between me and the twilight pale—
So light and frail,

Your cold white dress its folding lost
In one broad sweep of shadow gray;
Your weary head just drooped aside,
The sweet old way,

Bowed like a flower-cup dashed with rain,
The darkness crossing half your face,
And just the glimmer of a smile
For one to trace.

If I could see your eyes that reach
Far out into the furthest sky,
Where, past the trail of dying suns,
The old years lie;

Or touch your silent lips to-night,
And steal the sadness from their smile,
And find the last kiss they have kept
This weary while!

If it could be—oh, all in vain
The restless trouble of my soul
Sets, as the great tide to the moon,
Toward your control!

In vain the longing of the lips,
The eye's desire, and the pain;
The hunger of the heart. O love,
Is it in vain?

PRESIDENT COFFEE, PURE MOCHA COFFEE, PURE JAVA COFFEE, Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS, MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS
welcome to inspect collection.W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,
DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.WM. F. SMITH, M. D., OCULIST,HAS RETURNED TO THIS CITY,
and will resume practice immediately. Consultation Rooms as before, No. 331 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.
(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.GEORGE BARSTOW,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, No. 309 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS, DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.J. J. CLARKE, M. D.
No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER

NAPA, CALIFORNIA.
FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—
is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper,
both in the quantity and quality of reading matter, and in value as an advertising medium. The DAILY REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa County, and both
Daily and Weekly have a large circulation.
Daily $5, and Weekly $3 a year.
G. M. FRANCIS.....H. S. SPALDING.

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 322 California Street.

CALABASAS LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND

Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.

For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus,
or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange,
San Francisco

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE and highly concentrated Extracts of FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors,
held on the 7th day of February, 1879, an assessment (No.
22) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel
Building, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twelfth day of March, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the first day of April, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment,
together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JOHN CROCKETT, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan
Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the seventh day of February, 1879, an assessment (No. 37) of one dollar per share, was levied on
the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in
United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the eleventh (11th) day of March, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the thirty-
first day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 12 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Wednesday, February 12th, 1879. Transfer books closed on Saturday, February 8, 1879, at 12 o'clock M.

Office, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLIcation of the Brooklyn Land Company to be disincorporated.—Notice is hereby given, that the application of the Brooklyn Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, to be disincor-

porated, has been presented and filed in the County
Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that Monday, the 10th day of March, A. D. 1879, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, at the court-room of said court, in said City and County of San Francisco, has been fixed and appointed as the time and place for hearing the said application. THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
[SEAL.] By JOHN H. HARVEY, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARTHA A. SHORE, plaintiff, vs. NELSON A.
SHORE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Nelson A. Shore, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made—that the care, custody, and control of the minor children, issue of said marriage, be awarded to plaintiff—and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

[SEAL.] SAWYER & BALL, No. 502 Montgomery Street, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELAN-
GER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to
MARY BELANGER, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce
dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By Jno. H. Morris, Deputy Clerk.

Jno. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LI-
CENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out
of this county, but in this district, within twenty days—
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, setting aside the deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1858, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator
with the will annexed of the Estate of JOHN BLISS,
deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within forty days after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco.

Dated February 13th, 1879.

WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of John
Bliss, deceased.

PHILIPS & ELLIS, 66 Nevada Block, Attorneys for Estate.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, February 12, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 40) of one dollar per share, was declared, payable on THURSDAY, February 14th, 1879. Transfer books closed until February 11th, 1879.

Office, Room 37, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, Cal.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 20, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I remember that when Rose Michel was first produced, all Paris was attracted to witness this really remarkable play by the extensive circulation of a very clever newspaper yarn. The author gave out, as you may remember, that previous to its rehearsal he had spent many weeks in looking up the chum of his boyhood, on account of a certain genius the said chum had for startling the police by shrieking "assassin!" from some ambush, in a weird, strange voice, suffocated with anguish. Its effect was said to be something supernatural. The story goes that he found the chum, who had developed meanwhile into a grave and sedate physician; and, after a perfect siege of persuasion, induced the retired alarmist to instruct the great Mlle. Fargeuil in this singular and thrilling cry. I can not imagine a sedate physician doing anything so absurd; but, at all events, the hoarse "assassin! assassin!" of the first "Rose Michel" was an extraordinary success, and became as famous as the chameleon changes of Croisette in the Sphinx. I heard a sage little critic of latter-day fiction remark the other day that she did not like the deeply involved mysteries of some of the great novelist's plots, because when they were unraveled they never really amounted to anything. I think Rose Michel, with all its strongly drawn characters, its absorbing interest, its thrilling situations, has yet something of this fault.

It is a very admirable line of action in "Rose Michel," or any other woman, to hold her tongue; but I generally observe that after all, dear Madge, the consequences are quite as disastrous as when she speaks. It seems rather ridiculous for "Rose" to go through all those acts of misery and terror until she becomes a Conscience in capital letters, only to avoid predisposing her daughter's young man against the family of his future wife. But "Rose Michel" is a heroic martyr, even though her cause be little. I am always astonished when I come across a French woman, either in book or play, who has any very deep feeling of any sort. It is a bit of race prejudice, perhaps, for where do they find their petroleuses, their Madame Defarges, and other cheerful personages peculiar to them? When their stronger passions turn to good instead of bad they are like "Rose Michel." I think it Rose Eytinge's best part. This is one of the plays in which she is exquisitely natural. This is one of the greatest charms of her acting—a charm which is utterly impossible either in the heroic drama or tragedy, since no heroine the world ever saw made a custom of going about on every-day stilts.

Rose Eytinge seems to have brought only half the play with her when she left little Carrie Wyatt behind. How charmingly they played together the tender little scene between mother and daughter. How pathetically Carrie used to lift those great, brown, plaintive ox-eyes and that funny little snub nose to the handsome face above her, and how thoroughly artistic was and is Rose Eytinge in all the affecting little by-play of the scene. Carrie Wyatt was as promising as Lottie Cobb was until she became as stilted as Lottie Cobb is. But, then, I am not easy to satisfy, for I have been wishing for Barton Hill back again, too. It is a little unfortunate that he should be absent just when he is most needed. His "Pierre Michel" was something to live in the memory, while in the present cast Mr. Cyril Searle undertook the part. Poor young man! He has been so dreadfully cut up that one hates to say any more about him. It was not quite so bad as "Antony," but the "long perspective of his style" in it was something amazing. It was quite an experimental affair. First he tried it one way and then another, and the changes were made with a sleight-of-hand quickness which would be really admirable in another branch of the show business. Still, for all that, as he is essentially modern, "Pierre" was a marked improvement on "Antony." If they gradually get him into pantaloons parts, where, it is very evident he belongs, he may come to be acceptable. I fancy he is rather good-looking under favorable circumstances. Felix Morris made quite a hit as "Moulinet," the fond, foolish poet. He has an unfortunate propensity for repeating himself, which makes him use the vacant stare too often; but he is almost the only one in the company, unless it be Welles, who bestows upon his part any real study; and Welles, as yet, is not artistic, while Morris is. Say what they will of genius, there is a charm to art and finish which the rudest understanding does not fail to enjoy, even though it do not comprehend.

There is one blessed good thing about the California Theatre: there is always something to look at. The scenery is faultless. Rose Michel was beautifully mounted, especially the set

"Where the lamps quiver
Far over the river,
With many a light."

Rose Eytinge gives good-bye without playing The Geneva Cross or Led Astray, but presents her terrible picture of "Nancy Sykes," with which she captured the London critics but not the London shillings.

Jack wanted me to go to the Minstrels the other night—not the Rentz Minstrels—but I refused. I will not go into a chain-hung, frescoed, crimson-cushioned little bijou of a house to see negro minstrels. Jack went himself, and reported to me a good band, having, of course, absolutely nothing under the sun, but doing everything they had to do exceedingly well. There is a man called Wilson, who is funny; and a man called Barlow, who is an excellent dialectic comedian, and has "Old Black Joe" down to a fine point; and a man called Eddie Fox, who is an eccentric violinist; and two men called something else, who gave a double song and dance in a very superior manner; also, the whole troupe gives some very good music in very good style. What more can any one ask who loves minstrelsy! But I last saw Clara Morris on that stage, not in one of our great parts, but making a small part great. Mons. Alphonse has been made over, as we say of our old frocks. The change was not perceptible, save that "Mons. Alphonse" was called "Octave," but when I saw it last there was Clara Morris to play "Raymonde." For compensation we had that charming child, Fay Templeton, who, however precocious she may have been, never lost the beautiful grace of childhood. Mons. Alphonse is but a sketch—I believe its entire action is supposed to take place in four or five hours—but it is a very touching little play, and its humor is very French. In fact, a little miss of ten years was so mystified by the frequent bursts of laughter that she kept her embarrassed mamma inventing all sorts of plausible explanations, greatly to the delight of her neighbors, who enjoyed it quite as much as they did the perplexities of the "Admiral" and "Mme. Guichard."

On dit that they tried to induce Clara Morris to play an engagement at the big Grand Opera House, but she is wise in her day and generation, and refused. So they took the regular company over and opened to a full house in Almost a Life. They call it Within an Inch of his Life now, but they have a mania latterly for changing names in this company, and the new name is never an improvement. I am going again, to see the play in earnest, for a hurried glimpse gave me but an imperfect idea. I gathered that it was a stock company play, rather than one suited to the all-grasping star. A murder is committed, of course. All other crimes are so extremely venial nowadays that it is almost impossible to harrow up an audience with anything else. As a matter of course James O'Neill, whatever his alias for the night may be, is suspected of having committed it, and is thrown into prison. The number of times that he has been suspected and thrown into prison—in mimic play—since his advent in the Celebrated Case is something inconceivable. He never knows his lines any more excepting in a prison scene, and in that it has almost become possible for him to speak extemporaneously. Mr. Lewis Morrison plays the part of an idiot who, in the last act, exclaims: "I must speak or I shall go mad," which is a specimen of the refreshing ingenuousness of an idiot.

The mystery of the murder, unlike that in the Celebrated Case, remains not only unrevealed, but unsuspected, until the last act, even then it is almost as astonishing as the Moonstone robbery. I have always thought that the Celebrated Case began at the wrong end, and since the production of Almost a Life I am sure of it. We were to have had this play at the California with the New York company and Maud Granger's dresses, but its production at the Grand will probably change the programme. It would possibly have been no better, for it is played at the Grand with even excellence, from Rose Wood down.

I think the Rentz Minstrel engagement something of a fiasco, and I am glad of it, for the sooner Livingston, or Kennedy, or whomever the place belongs to, gets the theatre back to its standard the better for themselves it will be.

I have always observed that, when there is any superlative genius in one of the lower theatres, it is sure to emerge from the mire at some time or other; circumstances may place it there in the beginning, but it is bound to rise. If a woman be intelligent enough to be interesting, and beautiful enough to be admired, it is in human nature to seek that admiration of women as well as of men. I asked Jack last year, when he came home from the Rentz Female Minstrels, what he thought of them. His reply was characteristic. "Betsy, they look like any of the spectacular girls, from their boot-heels to their necklaces, but they have faces on them like pine knots." Jack is always more perspicuous than elegant, and I always believe him. It is not the correct thing to mention the Rentz Minstrels, but, dear me, Madge, you know we always do want to know what they are like. Hence, I give you the report verbatim.

Eliza Weathersby's "Froliques" have made some changes in their dresses, and have introduced some new songs, but they cling to Hobbies, as people always do. Hobbies do not always pay so well as in this case, however; so they are right. But, although Goodwin is the subject of much conversation, there is no more news for you yet about these people. Adieu. BETSY B.

The fourth and last of the Steinway Hall assemblies took place on Tuesday evening, and was a very recherché affair and a most successful finale to this charming series of parties. Owing to the unusual number of Germans given here this season, it was wisely decided by the managers to have general dancing throughout the evening. The guests were received by Mesdames Sanderson, Freeborn, and Castle, the fourth patroness (Mrs. Cornelius Cole) being prevented by illness from attending. A more than usual number of beautiful toilets were seen on the occasion, but among such an unlimited display of silks, velvets, and jewels, we dare not particularize beyond the patronesses: Mrs. S. W. Sanderson wore a rich toilet of white silk and duchess lace, with diamond ornaments. Mrs. Wm. Freeborn appeared in a superb costume of pink gros-grain silk, point lace, and diamonds. Mrs. Michael Castle looked lovely in white silk, point applique, and diamonds. Among those present were Captain and Mrs. Field, Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Giffen, Mr. and Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph B. Crockett, Mr. and Mrs. Ben Holladay, Jr., Mrs. J. C. Flood, Mrs. Matthias Gray, Miss Schaffer, Misses Corbitt, Miss Van Clief, Miss Wilkins, Miss Sedgwick, Miss Mung, Misses Cole, Miss McMullen, Miss McDougall, Miss Sharon, Miss Woods, Misses Belden, Miss Flood, Miss Crockett, Miss Donahue, Miss Bancroft, Miss Bradley, Miss Hale, Miss Beaver, Miss Irwin, Miss White, Miss Crocker of Sacramento, the Honorable Cornelius Cole, Lieutenant Anderson, Lieutenant Crozier, Lieutenant Blume, Messrs. Cole, Currier, Talbot, Crocker, Sheldon, Glenn, Redington, Gilmour, Pinkard, Balfour, Nutall, Forman, Alexander, Beazley, McDowell, Honore, Sims, McAfee, Hussey, Skae, Coleman, Adams, Reed, and Tevis.

A PASSION PLAY.

In the early ages of the world's history, dramatic representations of the acts, loves, and sufferings of the gods, demi-gods, and heroes were among the most powerful aids to religion and the most cherished amusements of the people. The awakening of the earth from the icy sleep of winter by the renovating power of the sun, whether typified in the persons of Osiris, Ormuzd, Buddha, Christna, Bacchus, Brahma, or any other of the numerous avatars who "for us men and for our salvation descended from heaven," has always possessed a strong dramatic charm, and its impersonation has ever been the centre of interest to all people in every age. The monks of old, when the religion of Christ began to push the elder deities from their thrones, failed not to copy this, as well as other features of the old religious and "miracle plays," as they were called, and they proved potent persuaders to devotion. In fact, the Rev. Robert Taylor, in his "Diegesis," has not scrupled to assert that the entire scheme of Christianity is built upon the dramatic and astrological myths acted all over the eastern countries by strolling bands of "Therapeuts" or "Essenes," from the college of Alexandria, in Egypt, a sort of pagan monks, who combined the offices of prophet and priest with those of actor and quack doctor. Be that as it may, sacred dramas continued to instruct and minister to the enjoyment of the people all through the Middle Ages, and even at the present day the performance of such pieces is sanctioned by the Church and supported by the people on the continent of Europe, as at Ober-Ammergau and other places. Some weeks ago a play of this nature was read by the author, Mr. Salmi Morse, to Archbishop Alemany and many of the heads of the Catholic Church in California, who, one and all, pronounced the work to be good, pure, and free from all taint of irreverence. Many Jewish and Protestant leaders of the people were also consulted, and a like verdict was obtained. Whether our public will take kindly to the introduction of sacred personages upon the stage, each "in his habit as he lived," remains to be proved. The "unco guid" will lift eyes to heaven in holy horror, and timorous Christians of Mr. Feebleheart's kidney will "tremble afar off" at the audacious attempt; but, for all that, should the play prove to be worthy of the tremendous subject it purports to represent, and should it be rendered with fitting preparation, and an earnest desire to attain as nearly as possible to the sublimity of its awful theme, we can see no reason why sacred personages of Holy Writ should not be portrayed by flesh and blood as well as by marble and paint. Surely the pure precepts of Jesus will lose none of their beauty by coming from the mouth of a cultivated speaker, who will deliver them with "due emphasis and discretion," instead of being stammered forth by some callow fledgling preacher fresh from college, or some shining-pollid elder, whose faith may be strong, but whose lungs are weak, and in whom sound doctrines may be plenty but sound teeth may be scarce. We who boast ourselves superior to prejudice, to whom art is art whether it be sacred or profane, and poetry is poetry whether the subject matter be "Comus" or "Paradise Lost," can see no impiety in dramatizing the sublimest tragedy that ever shook the listening world, and, provided that the Passion Play be rendered truthfully, reverently, and, above all, artistically, we heartily wish it success whenever and wherever it may be given to the public. PHILO JUDEUS.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

Book-Cover Reviews.

From the house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. we have receive a most valuable addition to our library—especially valuable to us, as it discourses of the proper mode of rearing children. We are up in puppies, colts, Alderney calves, fancy chickens, white mice, canaries, squirrels, kittens, gold-fish, and other pets of the home and farm, but our experience in family government has been very limited. This work is entitled "Aids to family government, from the cradle to the school, according to Froebel, by Bertha Meyer; translated from the second German edition by M. L. Holbrook, M. D.; to which has been added an essay on the rights of children and the true principles of family government, by Herbert Spencer. 'Come let us live for our children.' Published by M. L. Holbrook & Co., New York." All this is on the title page. Of course we have not read the book; our mode of book reviews does not contemplate that labor. We would not epitomize its contents for fear of spoiling the sale of it, and we do not intend to encourage the display of that kind of learning that is only familiar with books through the reviews. Sam. Williams is ruining all the young girls who have a taste for reading by tempting them to an immodest display of their blue stockings, by airing their reading as they get it at second-hand from the Bulletin. The author of this book is Bertha Meyer—we presume Miss Meyer, for it is said that old bachelors know all about matrimony, and old maids all about children. She is evidently strong-minded, and therefore presumptively childless. She demands for women "increased culture and elevation of character," and for children, "a broader culture and a more perfect education;" and so she would take all the German, Irish, and Yankee babies from their respective cribs, cradles, and sap-troughs, and from the time they begin to suck their little fists she would develop in them a taste for sucking in that higher culture for which Boston is so pre-eminently distinguished, and of which our Board of Education is so tenacious.

We do not accept the doctrines of this German school as at all practical in developing a nation of workers and thinkers, a people of workers and readers. We are not quite willing to adopt as the motto of our lives: "Come, let us live for our children," as we have none, and are not at all disposed to live for the children of anybody else. Let the children live for themselves; let the next generation take care of itself; let those minds that are eager for a higher and better education climb for it. We pronounce the greater half of all this educational nonsense sheer, unadulterated humbug and sentimentalism, calculated to make labor to be despised, to raise the working class out of its place, to foster and encourage the idea that it is only respectable for boys and girls to live by their wits; and we assert that the tendency of all this superlative educational nonsense is to idleness, crime, vagabondage, poverty, and a low estimate of female virtue.

THE ÆSTHETICS OF FRAGRANCE.

Among the many delights that Nature has given us there is none more subtle and exquisite, even though evanescent, than flowers—so beautifully called by the poet, the "footsteps of the angels." It matters little that dry science pronounces them only developments from the feeblest leaves, which, as they decayed, displayed color—the result of decay, rather than of vigor—the poetic mind, that alone comprehends the highest secret of the Beautiful, sees in them, even if the later, still the most lovely thought of a beneficent Creator. Who is there that has not the recollection of some special flower that is blended with his earliest associations? To him, the art that preserves the fragrant reminiscence and embalms it in a lasting and convenient form, must be a precious one. And, apart from mere sentiment, there is ample proof that perfumes are more than merely pleasant to the senses; they are often actual preventives of disease. During the prevalence of cholera in London and Paris some years ago, it was a notable fact that nearly all those engaged in the making of extracts and essences escaped contagion. The manufacture of perfumery is mentioned in the oldest chronicles. The Hebrews of ancient times were particularly lavish in their use, making them important constituents in all their religious rites as well as their social festivities, and in Exodus the "art of the apothecary" is mentioned with special honor, Moses himself officiating at the burning of choice perfumes. But their greatest popularity was reached when, in the old Roman and Athenian days, it was the custom to anoint the body two or three times a day, besides using baths, pastilles for burning, and various other luxuries of the kind, and men's brains were daily taxed in unending endeavor to invent new delights for the fastidious and voluptuous nobility, until Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, found it necessary to enact prohibitory laws against their extravagant use. Alcoholic perfumes were originated in the fourteenth century, the first made being Hungary Water, a perfume distilled from rosemary, and made by Elizabeth, Queen of Hungary, in 1370, after a recipe obtained from a hermit, and the use of which, it is said, preserved her beauty to a great age. The idea probably took its rise from the practice of infusing their drinking wines in violets, roses, and hyacinths to give them an additional bouquet, which was common with the wealthier classes. From this beginning we have now the almost innumerable varieties of extracts that adorn our tables. The French supremacy in the manufacture of perfumery dates from the marriage of Catherine de Medici with Henry II., when that queen brought with her from Italy the famous Florentine chemist, René. From Cannes we have the rose, tuberose, cassia, jasmine, and neroli, or oil of bitter orange; from Nismes, thyme, rosemary, aspic, and lavender; from Nice, violet and mignonette, and from Sicily, orange, lemon, and bergamot. Some of the perfumes derived from animal sources are musk, civet, ambergris, and hartshorn. But France and England monopolize the making of these luxuries only by virtue of long experience. We have in America, in our Southern States, and preeminently in the flora of our own coast, far greater possibilities than any other country can show. Our climate, so favorable to the growth of all vegetation, is the hospitable home of every blossom known to the botanist, from the pale, delicate blossoms of the north to the heavily-scented blooms of the tropics. As an instance of the capabilities of our flower fields, it is only necessary to point to the famous Yosemite cologne which is made by our well known chemist, Slaven, of the Baldwin Pharmacy, the fame of which has already extended beyond the seas. Besides the manufacture of this delightful specialty, this house, which takes the lead in the more artistic and dainty adjuncts of the toilet, is deserving of the thanks of all refined persons for having brought the price of the fine imported perfumes to a figure that makes it possible for almost every one to indulge in them. The Lubin's Extracts, so long sold for a dollar and a quarter a bottle, have been reduced by them to seventy-five cents, and more recently still to sixty-five cents. In this instance notably, as in that of other leading merchants of the present day, in every other line of business, we see the tendency of advancing civilization, which brings in its train an increased sentiment of brotherhood, to equalize the pleasant things of life so that all may be able to share them alike. To all the profusion of past ages to which we have alluded, it is not necessary to remind the reader that it was only permitted to the wealthy and noble classes to indulge in these luxuries. The means to procure them, were waiting to the lower classes, and the aping of the extravagances of the rich, in ever so small a way, would not have been tolerated by laws and opinions that bore with iron weight on the body of the people. Now, on the contrary, the wife of the mechanic may save from the slenderest income sufficient each month to keep her toilet table supplied with sweet-scented soaps and powders for her babies' use, and dainty perfumes for her own, by practising the slightest of economies in other directions. All these refinements tend to not only make life pleasanter, but to refine the character as well, and by constant association with them, raise each succeeding generation higher and higher in the æsthetic scale.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

A REMINISCENCE OF '49.

The writer of this article was master of the schooner Honolulu in 1849. He had the honor of taking the whole of the southern delegation to the first Constitutional Convention from Monterey down the coast as far as San Diego. Many of those members are now dead. Among the most prominent were Don Pablo de la Guerra, Don Manuel Dominguez, Don Diego Scott, Mr. Covarrubias, and many other gentlemen—twenty-seven in all. As is usual in all cases on the arrival in a port of entry, I had delivered my ship's papers to Mr. Halleck, the Collector at Monterey, who had put them in his pocket, and shortly afterward taken passage on the California, for San Francisco, carrying my papers with him. When I got ready to sail, and had notified the passengers of time of sailing, I went in search of my papers to the Secretary of State's office. After inquiring for the papers, I was told I could not go without the ship's papers. I expostulated with him, stating the great injury it was to my owners (Salmon & Ellis, San Francisco), as I would lose twenty-seven passengers at $50 each. The answer I got from Captain Halleck was: "Go at your peril." I said: "I'll be d—d if I do not go!" Orders were given to a tall, red-headed major to turn me out. This I avoided by keeping my face towards the major and two others, threatening to knock down any one who touched me. From the government office I went to Mr. David Spence's residence, to notify the passengers of immediate departure. I got all on board safe, and fearing that Captain H. would carry out his threat to stop me, I called the steward, and told him to give the passengers lunch below, and by all means hold out every inducement to keep them below, even with fine French brandy and English ale. In the mean time I informed the chief officer how I intended to proceed, and gave orders to loose or cast off the gaskets, all but two on each sail, heave the anchor, close up, and then up sail quick. I took the helm, and also assisted to hoist the main sail. I was off under whole sail, when lo and behold, a smoke from the mouth of a cannon, and a ball dropped so close to the stern that it splashed the water all over me. The wind was from the northwest, and I kept her off a slashing full, when there came another ball, passing over the vessel in close proximity to the mainmast, and expending itself ricocheting on the water. I now felt safe, knowing I was nearly out of their reach. Sailing free to the southeast beach I got off, anyhow, but not without scaring the passengers. They did not know the meaning of it until we were perfectly safe from any injury that Captain Burton's gun could do. DAVID P. MALLAGH. SAN LUIS OBISPO, February 3, 1879.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening

WASHINGTON'S NATAL DAY,

Two grand Holiday Performances.

SUSTAINED INTEREST IN

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S FROLIQUES

AND MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR., IN

HOBBIES!

THE BURLESQUE SUPER-EMINENT.

The performance will commence with the farce of the

GREEN-EYED MONSTER.

Monday, February 24, 1879, fourth and last week of

HOBBIES.

Seats now secured at the box office six days in advance.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY. BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

This (Saturday) evening, February 22, and every evening until further notice.

Gigantic Hit—Hundreds turned away—Most Brilliant Success ever known of

MADAME RENTZ'S

CELEBRATED FEMALE MINSTRELS,

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMBINATION.

30 ARTISTS 30

Presenting the grandest and most sensational entertainment ever given—the beautiful Ladies' Minstrel First Part, followed by the unequalled O.L., concluding with the latest sensational burlesque.

PIPPINS.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

Monday, February 24th, entire change of programme.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

TREMENDOUS SUCCESS OF

BARLOW, WILSON, PRIMROSE & WEST'S MINSTRELS,

Acknowledged to be the most brilliant and artistic combination before the public.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, February 22, and every evening, including Sunday.

MILT. G. BARLOW, the great Comedian.

GEO. WILSON, the unapproachable Character Actor.

PRIMROSE AND WEST, the unrivaled artists in Song and Dance, and Champion Clap Dancers of the World.

EDDIE FOX, the Minstrel Paganini.

THE QUEEN CITY QUARTET,

The Best Glee Party in the World.

WEDNESDAY MATINEE AT 2 O'CLOCK.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER. F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, February 24, Benefit of the WORKINGMEN'S CLUB.

Tuesday, February 25, Benefit of the OLYMPIC CLUB.

Wednesday and during the week, including Sunday evening and Saturday matinee, the great successful drama,

Within an Inch of His Life.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLER.....MANAGERS. BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Commencing Monday, Feb. 24, and ending March 1, Farewell Week of Mr. and Mrs.

W. J. FLORENCE,

Who will appear in a round of their favorite plays, including

DOMBEY & SON,

TICKET OF LEAVE MAN,

RETURNED VOLUNTEER,

NO THOROUGHFARE,

THE MIGHTY DOLLAR, etc.

Monday, March 3, the

UNION SQUARE COMBINATION

In the great New York success,

MOTHER AND SON.

Seats at the Box Office.

A CARD TO THE LADIES.

The success and intrinsic merit of an article are best indicated by the amount of abuse it receives from proprietors of similar articles. For some time past CAMELINE has been the object of malicious attacks under the head of "Cameleon vs. Creme de Lis." The proprietor or agents of "Creme de Lis," with the intention of deceiving the public, have attempted, in these advertisements, to confound CAMELINE with an obscure and rare chemical substance of somewhat similar name, in no way connected with or entering into its composition, and the name of this chemical has in these advertisements been distorted for the purpose of increasing the deception. We have nothing to say in this connection in regard to the comparative merits of CAMELINE and Creme de Lis, concerning which ladies are best competent to judge, but for the purpose of sustaining our assertion that CAMELINE is perfectly free from objectionable or deleterious substances, we herewith append the opinion of a number of prominent physicians of this city.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 1, 1879.

The undersigned, physicians of San Francisco, are familiar with the composition of the principal articles used for the complexion, and freely certify that WAKELEE'S CAMELINE is free from all poisonous or injurious substances:

L. C. Lane, M.D., Wm. Hammond, M.D., E. H. Toland, M.D., W. F. McNutt, M.D., R. A. McLean, M.D., A. J. Bowie, M.D., Chas. B. Brigham, M.D., J. C. Shorb, M.D., Benj. D. Dean, M.D., F. A. Holman, M.D., Henry Gibbons, Jr., M.D., Jul. Rosenstem, M.D., J. J. Clarke, M.D., D. L. Whitney, M.D., W. H. Bruner, M.D., Thomas Boyson, M.D., A. M. Loryea, M.D., C. G. Kenyon, M.D., Cephas L. Bard, M.D., Isaac S. Titus, M.D., Chas. C. Keeney, M.D., Harry L. Sims, M.D., A. M. Wilder, M.D., J. H. Stallard, M.D., Geo. M. Powers, M.D., Chas. McQuesten, M.D., Benj. R. Swan, M.D., James O. Shafter, M.D., L. L. Dorr, M.D., Wm. Carman, M.D., Jas. W. Keeney, M.D., Washington Ayer, M.D., Gustav Holland, M.D., J. L. Meares, M.D., Geo. F. Cooper, M.D., Thomas Price, M.D., Samuel W. Dennis, M.D., H. Gibbons, M.D., J. M. McNulty, M.D., Thomas Bennett, M.D.

VITAL HUMAN MAGNETISM

Nature's Chief Restorer of Impaired Vital Energy.

BY THIS MYSTERIOUS GIFT OF GOD TO MAN, THE MOST SHATTERED CONSTITUTION CAN BE BUILT UP IN THREE WEEKS; ACUTE CASES CURED IN A FEW MINUTES. ALL PAINS AND PAINS INSTANTLY DISAPPEARING, AND HEALTH RESTORED.

Now, I don't say that I can cure every disease or every case, for that would be absurd, and would evidently rob the grave. But I do say that I am constantly curing cases in which other methods utterly fail, and so confident am I (from past experience, having made over 3,000 cures in this city in the last year) that I here openly challenge any physician in the city of San Francisco, or in the United States, in the sum of to effect a permanent cure in nervous diseases, broken-down constitution, loss of vitality, etc., in man or woman, by the use of medicine, in so short a time as I do, simply by the influence imparted through my hand. The influence thus imparted has the property of affecting the action of the vital forces and instantly setting the wheels of life in motion, giving the nervous feeble patient a new life-power immediately, and thus enabling him, or her, to set at defiance the whole Army of Gen. De Bility. I do not confine myself to specialties, but treat all manner of diseases without any medicine whatever.

One Thousand Dollars ($1,000),

Read the following testimonials emanating from worthy members of the profession. I could give over 3,000 in this city, but space on my part, and patience on the part of the reader, will not permit:

TESTIMONY OF DR. DAVIS.

This is to certify, that I have been suffering from nervous prostration for some months past, until I applied to Dr. McLennan. After four days' treatment I was entirely relieved. I have now a good appetite, and feel well. I consider Dr. McLennan a marvelous healer. (Signed) C. E. DAVIS, M. D., * November 18, 1878. St. Helena, Cal.

PARALYSIS CURED.

To whom it may concern.—This is to certify, that on the 15th of April, 1878, I had a stroke of paralysis of my left side, extending from my shoulder down to my hip. I found no help until I came to Mr. McLennan, 220 Stockton Street, who gave me instant relief, and saved my life. His power as a healer is wonderful. (Signed) J. L. WILBERT, Deotist, 18 Third St., S. F.

December 3, 1878.

The above speaks for itself. Dr. Wilbert is well known in society here, and is second to none in his profession. He may always be seen at his magnificent operating parlors and laboratory, No. 18 Third Street.

NOTICE.—To avoid confusion and interrupting my appointments with patients, I devote Wednesday of each week in giving free examinations, on which day ladies will please come from 10 to 2, and gentlemen from 4 to 7 P. M.

J. D. MCLENNAN, Vital Magnetic Healer, Temple of Health, 220 Stockton St.

NEW AND STANDARD BOOKS.

The Ancient Egyptians, their Manners, Customs, Laws, etc. By Sir J. Gardner Wilkinson. Edited by Samuel Birch, LL. D. With several hundred illustrations, colored plates, etc. 3 vols., royal 8vo, cloth$33 00 Switzerland, its Mountains and Valleys. With 418 illustrations, engraved by A. Closs. 1 vol., imperial 4to, richly bound in fine cloth, $18; full morocco, full gilt25 00 Diderot and the Encyclopedists. By John Morley. 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth2 50 New Greece. By Lewis Sargeant. Demy 8vo, with two maps, cloth3 50 Macaulay's History of England. Harper's elegant library edition. Crown 8vo, gilt tops, superfine paper and cloth binding, 5 vols.10 00 Scientific Memoirs. By John W. Draper, author of "The Intellectual Development of Europe." 1 vol., 8vo, cloth3 00 Complete set of the "Overland Monthly," 15 vols., bound, entirely new set, have never been read.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY

MASONIC TEMPLE

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Halifax.*

III.—MOMOTARO AND THE TREASURE.

A long time ago there lived in a certain country place an old couple who had not been blessed with any children, and who grieved over their lonely lot in their old age. They were kind-hearted and devout old bodies, and their neighbors were sorry for them.

One day Granny went to the stream to wash, and saw floating by a fine, large, ripe peach, which she appropriated. Instead of greedily biting it to try its flavor, she took it home to the old man, and he took a knife and divided it, to give her half, when out jumped a fine little boy. They were delighted, and thanked the Kami (Sintoo deities) and the Hotoke (Buddhist deities) for sending them at last a child that would take care of them in their old days. They named the boy Momotaro (momo means a peach; taro is a common affix to names), and under their care he grew to be a fine man.

Wishing to make the old people some return for their care of him, he bethought himself of going on a pilgrimage to certain shrines and consulting the augury. When he returned he had a dream which decided him in his choice of what to do.

There was an island not far from the shore inhabited by demons, and known as Onigashima (Demons' Island), where it was said there was great quantities of precious things hid in caves, closed by strong iron doors, and guarded by a demon sentinel. Now, in his dream, he thought he had been to this island, and had beaten the wicked demons and taken their treasures, and that he was assisted by the Kami, in the forms of animals. Momotaro devoted himself to practicing and perfecting himself in the use of an immense club and other weapons, and then told his adopted parents of his plan. They were loth to see their boy rush into such danger, but at last, thinking that the deities, who had sent him to them in a peach, would assist him, as in the dream, they gave their consent, and prepared a lot of dango (dumplings) for him to take with him on his expedition.

When he had said "good bye" to the old people, his favorite dog ran after him, barking and gamboling round him, and asked to be taken to the Onigashima, where he would help; and begged a share of the dango. So the pair trudged along for some time till they met a monkey, who said: "Good day to you, Momotaro; and where are you bound to with all these heavy weapons?" Momotaro said he was going to kill the Oni, and take the treasure to the old people as some return for their care of him. "Then," said the monkey, "I will join you and lend you a hand." Momotaro was so glad that he gave the monkey quite a lot of his dango, and they were so nice that the monkey called to his gay friend, the pheasant, to have some. The pheasant, hearing where they were all going, offered to accompany and help them. So away they went together—man, dog, monkey, and pheasant.

When they reached the shore there was only one boat, and it was fastened to a stake out in the deep water. But the monkey called "doggy," and, telling him to swim out, perched himself on doggy's back, and thus entered the boat and gave the rope to doggy, who swam back, dragging the boat after him. They all got in except the pheasant, who flew across to find a place where the demons would not see them, and where the boat could land; for if they lost their boat they would not be able to get back with the precious booty. Safely landing, they approached the entrance to the great cave that the pheasant had spied out, and Momotaro rapped on the iron door with his club, but there was no answer; then, getting impatient and angry, he broke the door open and entered—not a cave, but a beautiful palace, where lived the chief of the demons.

The pheasant flew about, the monkey clambered on the roof, and the dog crept under the floor to spy out where the treasure was kept; and they all soon returned with news for Momotaro, who at once went straight to the apartment of the big demon, and beating the small demons, that were the servants, they ran away, and he burst into the room in which the big demon was seated. When the great demon found that his people were beaten and had run away, he was angry; but while Momotaro beat him, the dog bit his heels, and the monkey jumped on his back and put his paws over his eyes so that he could not see, while the pheasant flew after the runaways and pecked out their eyes. So the demon begged for his life, which Momotaro promised to spare if he would give him the most precious treasures on the island. Then the blind demons were made to carry them to the boat, and our hero returned with his three friends, all right merry.

When the old couple saw the treasures Momotaro had brought from the Demon's Island, they were happy; and Momotaro, out of gratitude, kept the dog, monkey, and pheasant with him as his very good friends all his life. With part of the treasure he built a magnificent palace, and also distributed large sums in charity. He likewise built a handsome and comfortable residence for his adopted parents, where they retired for the remainder of their days. The pheasant told him of a beautiful princess living in a garden not far away, and here Momotaro sent his mother to obtain her for his wife. Momotaro's fame as a powerful warrior was great, and the princess was glad to have so fine a husband. Thus every one was made happy.

IV.—THE KIND-HEARTED MAN AND THE SPARROW.

A long time ago there lived in the hills not very far from the city of Kiyoto (the old capital of Japan) a poor old man. One day the old man saw a crow pursuing a young sparrow, and, chasing the crow away, he saved the sparrow's life. It is the duty of every good Buddhist to save life; and this old man was not only kind-hearted, but also devout. He bought a cage for the bird, and fed it daily. By and by it became quite tame, and would, when the door of the cage was opened, fly to and fro, enjoying its liberty, but always returning to the cage for protection from its enemies, the cats, martens, and rats.

Now, this good old man's wife was a very wicked old woman, and her unkind heart often gave the old man much sorrow. One day, while he was out working, the door of the cage being open, the sparrow flew out, and was caught by the old woman pecking at a bowl of starch which she had just prepared for some clothes she was washing. In her anger she caught the poor little innocent sparrow, and, with her scissors, cruelly cut its tongue and turned it loose, frightening it away.

When the old man returned and found his little pet gone he was much grieved; but the old woman soundly rated him for his soft-heartedness, and told him what she had done, and the cause of her anger. But he was so sorry that such a trivial fault should have brought down such cruel punishment, that he at once went in search of the bird, calling it as he searched through the woods. Passing through a bamboo grove, he came to a beautiful garden with a nice house in it, standing amid flowers, and a beautiful young lady ran out joyfully to meet him, crying, "You dear old, kind daddy! I am glad you have found me out!" The old man, after some explanations, recognized her as his lost sparrow thus transformed; and she led him to the house, where a feast was spread for him of all sorts of good things, and she and her companions amused him with dancing and singing till it was late, and he was induced to remain for the night, although fearing the scolding that his wife would give him when he went home.

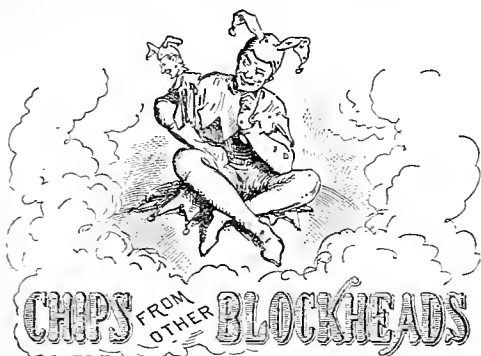

The next morning the old man took his leave of the sparrows, and thanked them for their treat, and when going away was asked to accept a present, being given his choice of a heavy basket or a light one.* Being old, and by no means covetous, like his wife, he excused himself and chose the light one. He soon found his way out of the forest and hastened home with a light heart. After resting himself he opened the basket, and, to his great delight, found it full of all sorts of beautiful things—gold coins, coral, silks, and many other articles of value.

Now, the old woman, seeing this and hearing her husband's story, dressed herself up and went in search of the sparrows. From the old man she inquired the path, and found the house, but not till after a weary search. The sparrows consulted together, and, as they could not turn her away, were fain to give her a little wine and some trifle with it, thus hoping soon to get rid of her; but as she seemed disinclined to move, it was thought she would take herself off if they gave her a present. Accordingly, she was given her choice of a light or a heavy basket, and after examining several, she chose the heavier. Being a greedy woman, she tried to peep into the baskets to find out which had the nicest things, but she was unable to see into them. After another weary tramp with her heavy basket she arrived at home, her covetous old eyes expecting to see more and better things than the old man's basket had contained, the basket being larger and very much heavier. When she unfasted the lid, off it flew, and out jumped serpents, skeletons, goblins, and other horrible things, which greatly frightened the naughty old woman, and which she well deserved for her greed and cruelty.

*It is customary with the Japanese to present parting guests with a gift—sometimes the guest's share of the remainder of the feast. According to the Buddhist faith, good works bring their return in this life if done without hope of reward, such as kindness to dumb animals, etc.—T. E. H.

Under the head of "Don't Do It," the Baltimore Every Saturday gives the following good advice—which will, of course, be scrupulously followed: "Young man of nineteen summers whose lip still shows the down of unrazored innocence, and who still canst borrow a V with the intention of repayment; young woman who amid the bustle of fashion still preserveth a sweet simplicity of manner and of dress, if ye feel the divine afflatus of primitive poetry rising within ye and running pen-ward—don't do it. Pause and listen to the words of wisdom from the lips of experience. If you honestly love poetry as an art, and not as a means of gaining cheap praise and coddling your vanity—leave it alone. For one great poet arising once a century there are perhaps a thousand versifiers. The result of which is that the true poet is crowded out of timely recognition by the mere rhymers who preoccupy the field; and moreover, the amount of vapid thought, false metaphor, and mangled metre daily printed is appalling and alarming. Pause before you commit a crime against the literature of your country. Remember there is hardly one great poet of any nation who has not condemned all poems penned by himself before the age of thirty. If you feel rhymes coming into your pretty head, dear Isabelle Eliza Jones, take a run in the fields and shake off the incubus, or glide into some shop where you are well known and indulge in a deep flirtation with the sprucest clerk. If, however, you must put your rhythmic eccentricities on paper, don't send it to the patient and long-suffering editor, but wrap it up tenderly in a rosy ribbon and plant it in the northeast corner of the garden; dig it up in a year, and if any unprejudiced person can decipher it, that is a sign of its eternal value as a poem. If not—then vice versa; which last is Latin, and means, being interpreted, verse-making is a vice. But let us be serious. We mean what we say, and we speak to the youth of both sexes. Horace, the wisest and wittiest poet of the world, in his lecture on poetry advises the blooming youth and budding maiden to wait nine years before publishing a poem. This accords very well with our previous remark in regard to thirty as the fit age for beginning the composition of poetry. If you are really a poet, you will be greater for the waiting and the careful study of great models. If you are not, you will be wise enough at thirty to suspect yourself of an intellectual folly in your early aspirations."

"Fair scene of peace and sunshine," writes a European correspondent from the Rhine, "noble purple mountains, whose crests are reflected in the magnificent stream, who has ever seen you that has not a grateful memory of those scenes of friendly repose and beauty? To lay down the pen and even to think of the beautiful Rhine land makes one happy. At the time of summer evening the cows are trooping down from the hills, lowing and with their bells tinkling, to the old town, with its old moats and gates and spires and chestnut trees, with long blue shadows stretching over the grass; the sky and river below flame in crimson and gold, and the moon is already out, looking pale toward the sunset. The sun sinks behind the great castle-crested mountains, the light fails suddenly, the river grows darker and darker, lights suddenly quiver on it from the windows of the old ramparts, and twinkle peacefully in the villages under the hills on the opposite shore." All of which is very fine, but no finer, perhaps, than it was when written by Thackeray.

A man's character is like a fence—you can not strengthen it by whitewash.

Tacks and hypocrites point heavenward when they mean the most mischief.

Palestine was the land that flowed with milk and honey; but, alas! it grew no buckwheat pancakes to use them on.

We would not wish Eli Perkins dead, but we would like to hear that he has commenced to light his fires with kerosene.

A Connecticut man recently said: "Lend me a dollar. My wife has left me, and I want to advertise that I am not responsible for her debts."

The sword of Bunker Hill was raffled off at a church sociable, the other evening, at a Western town. Old Hill was given a vote of thanks.

Mr. Talmage having claimed that hell has four gates, the Buffalo Express hopes "they open outward, so as to give easy egress in case of fire."

A recent poem by Kate Putnam Osgood is entitled "Ten Years After." After what? Jacob was ten years after Rachel—and got her. We await further news from Kate.

Only a little while ago Edison was lauded as the greatest inventor of the age. Now the papers swear he couldn't invent an improvement on the bone handle of a jack-knife.

At dinner the host introduces to the favorable notice of the company a splendid truffled pheasant amid murmurs of admiration. "Isn't it a beauty?" he says. "Dr. So-and-so gave it to me—killed it himself." "Aw, what was he treating it for?" says one of the guests.

A man went into a clothing store the other day, and after picking out some very fine cloth, said: "I want to make my father a present of an overcoat. Just measure me for it. Of course, it will be too big for him, but it's pretty good wearing cloth, and as the old man's in bad health I'll have to wear it sooner or later, any way. Just make it a little broad across the shoulders."

Jakey Kline:

You're a dainty little creature,
Caroline, Caroline;
And I love your every feature,
Caroline, Caroline;
But your father is a snooze,
And wears number 'leven shoes,
Which he knows well how to use,
Caroline, Caroline;
So to call I must refuse, Caroline.

Caroline:

You're an awful story teller,
Jakey Kline, Jakey Kline;
You're a base, deceiving feller,
Jakey Kline, Jakey Kline.
If you'll come around to-night,
'Neath fair Luna's mellow light,
When our dog is loosened tight,
Jakey Kline, Jakey Kline,
I'll assure him of a bite of Jakey Kline.

Two old-fashioned, well-bearded, professional hunters after bargains embarked at Hamburg for London, to attend one of the great annual jewelry auctions. The steamer had scarcely lost sight of land when a terrible storm arose. The waves beat over the decks with frightful force, and even the captain feared that the ship would founder. The two familiars of the auction room prayed and wept fervently, and at the instant of their extreme despair the man on the look-out yelled at the top of his voice:

"A sail! a sail!"

One of the suppliants thereupon jumped to his feet, and turning to his brother-voyager, exclaimed, in deprecatory accents: "Mein Got, mein frent, 'a sale! a sale!' und ve are here mitout a catalogue!"

When the Hawkeye man had just finished convulsing his hearers with an account of a youth's experience with his first moustache, a young man leaned over to his girl, and whispered:

"That's true to life, I can tell you."

"How can you tell me?" inquired his girl.

"How?" he repeated in a whisper; "why, by experience; that's just the way I felt when I first got shaved."

"When was that?"

"Oh, before I raised my moustache," he returned.

"What moustache?" she queried, a little surprised.

"What moustache do you suppose?" he retorted, turning red.

"Why, Charlie," whispered the girl, "I never saw any moustache. Do you mean that?"

"Never mind what I mean," hissed the young man, baring his clenched teeth. And he stared very hard at the girl for all the rest of the evening, but somehow could not find anything to laugh at.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

— AND —

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

— AND —

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL

SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

ud 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,

SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

WINTER ARRANGEMENT,

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1898.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for Summer, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, YUMA, and Texas Hill (64 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1898, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave SAN FRANCISCO: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays included, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs' Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted).

(Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BRAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

— FOR —

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for

YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

February.....18 March.....15 April.....16
May.....16 June.....17 July.....15
August.....15 September.....16 October.....15
November.....15 December.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1, September 29, October 27, November 24, December 22, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,
WHOLESALE GROCERS,
Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1899, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:

Overland Ticket Office at Ferry Landing, Market St.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 12.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. [Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.]

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.), Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Fallside (Bureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Ione at 3.40 P. M.

(Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, ARIZONA Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Stages for Prescott and Colorado River Steamers), connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Texas Hill (64 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.

(Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To Alameda.	To Folsom.	To East Oakland.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To Del Norte Street.	To Del Norte Street.
A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.
6.10	7.00	8.00	8.10	9.00	10.00	11.00	12.00
7.30	8.20	9.20	9.30	10.20	11.20	12.20	1.00
8.50	9.40	10.40	10.50	11.40	12.40	1.00	1.30
10.10	11.00	12.00	12.10	1.00	2.00	3.00	4.00
11.30	12.20	1.20	1.30	2.20	3.20	4.20	5.00
12.50	1.40	2.40	2.50	3.40	4.40	5.40	6.30
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00
9.10	10.00	11.00	11.10	12.00	1.00	2.00	3.00
10.30	11.20	12.20	12.30	1.20	2.20	3.20	4.00
11.50	12.40	1.40	1.50	2.40	3.40	4.40	5.00
1.10	2.00	3.00	3.10	4.00	5.00	6.00	6.30
2.30	3.20	4.20	4.30	5.20	6.20	7.20	8.00
3.50	4.40	5.40	5.50	6.40	7.40	8.40	9.00
5.10	6.00	7.00	7.10	8.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
6.30	7.20	8.20	8.30	9.20	10.20	11.20	12.00
7.50	8.40	9.40	9.50	10.40	11.40	12.40	1.00

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & CO.

12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

GROVER & BAKER

ELASTIC STITCH

SEWING MACHINES.

GROVER & BAKER SEWING AND

Embroidering SILKS, Pure Dye, Full Weight. To the trade and at retail.

J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS

BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,

STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND

the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARCOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.

No Pulling Out Buttons.

No Rubber or Elastic.

The Most Durable.

The Most Comfortable.

For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO

THE

Automatic

SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.

C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - $4

Suits, - - - 15

Overcoats, - 15

Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin

Pants, - - $7

White Vests, fm 3

Fancy Vests, - - 6

Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,

And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,

320 POST STREET

San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 327 Entrance south side of Court.

A. D. SHARON.

NEW STORE

McDONALD

& WILLIAMS

MERCHANT

TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worstedes, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Ouatines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, full lines of all the materials necessary to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose offering to the public at the following low prices:

Pants, from$5

Suits, from20

Overcoats, from15

Usters, from15

Dress Coats, from20

White Vests, from 3

Silk and Wool Vests, from 6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Samples and Self-measurement Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

TO OWNERS

—OF—

REAL ESTATE.

PERSONS OWNING REAL ESTATE that has heretofore been assessed in the former owner's name, or misspelled, or otherwise misdescribed, are requested to appear personally, or send their Deeds to the Assessor's office (New City Hall), and have the proper changes made for the Real Estate Roll 1879-80. Immediate attention is necessary, as work on the Roll will commence in a few days, after which it will be too late for any alterations.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,

City and County Assessor.

司公市噤

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3 AND 4, SHERMAN'S BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco. P. O. Box 770.)

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 9.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 1, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

MOUND-BUILDERS.

